and always there. Time was—and I hope the time has gone forever—when there were professed ministers of Jesus Christ whose hearts were in the hunting-field. Do you wonder that their ministry was a scandal? Others have been naturalists first and divines afterward. Do you wonder that their ministry proved to be a failure? Time was, and time is, I am sorry to say, when many professed ministers of Christ have their hearts more set upon criticising the Gospel than preaching it; they are more at home in scattering doubts than in promoting faith. They preach what they are not sure of, and what they have no interest in. It is not their meat to do the Lord's will, for He never sent them. They get their meat by preaching, but it is not their meat to preach. Surely it must be misery to them to have to tell out an old tale which in their souls they despise. Wretches that they are! I cannot call them better. It seems an awful thing to me that a man should profess to be a servant of Christ and not put his heart into the Redeemer's service.

I think the Lord forgot to eat bread that day partly because of the enthusiasm which filled Him in the pursuit of that soul.

THE CHAMOIS-HUNTER

quits his hard couch long before the sun is up, and climbs the mountains. He watches from the first gray light for the creature which is the object of his pursuit. Ask him how it is when he returns late in the evening that he has had nothing to eat all day long. He answers: "I never thought of it; I saw a chamois on a distant crag and I hastened after it. I leaped the ravines, I climbed the steep faces of the rocks, I sprang down again; I was almost on my prey, but it was gone. I crept up within range again, holding my breath lest the scent of me should alarm the watchful chamois. It was not until I began to lift the game to my shoulder that I be thought me that I had neither eaten nor drunk that day." You understand what this enthusiasm means, and how it refreshes the hunter. Thus the Master was so taken up with soul saving that He had meat to eat that others knew not of.

Moreover, the Master had not only felt the enthusiasm of pursuit, but He was moved greatly by the sympathy of pity. The man that hunts the chamois has no sympathy with his prey, the man who would take his salmon has no pity for the creature; but he that labors to bless souls is full of tenderness. How mothers can and do endure with sick children! They feel that they cannot sleep while the dear one tosses to and fro in fever, or moans in pain. They have lost all care for eating while they guard the brittle thread which threatens so soon to snap. Thus was our Saviour carried away with pity for lost souls; He knew the danger of that Samaritan city, and that thought caused Him to forget to eat.

I do not know anything that can make a man forget his pain and weariness like grasping the hand of a sinner saved. I speak here from experience, for yesterday evening, when I was thinking of this subject, I was myself somewhat dull through pain and weakness, and as God would have it I took up the Report of the Baptist Missionary Society, which was issued on the 1st of June, and as I glanced over it, I saw my own name. It seems that our missionary in San Domingo has had a discouraging year, but it was lighted up with one most pleasing incident. A man had come down to ask for baptism. The missionary asked how he came to know anything about it. In reply he told him that he had fallen in with a sermon translated into the French language which was preached by Mr. Spurgeon. Oh, friends, I was dull no longer! I had meat to eat. Had an angel stood in the study, I could not have felt more delighted with his visit than I did when I read of a sinner saved. Here was a sermon translated into French, which was carried far away to Hayti, I do not know how, and there was read by a Romanist, who found by it salvation. God bless him! You cannot faint after such a success; can you? As for myself, despite my sickness, I resolve to go on again, preach with all my might, and print more sermons, and send them out to the ends of the earth. Brethren, never say die. Never dream of giving up. Let God's blessing on your work refresh you.

III. Thirdly, let us at once

SEEK THIS REFRESHMENT.

That is our practical business. If there is meat to eat that we know not of, let us try to know of it at once. I am speaking, of course, only to you who are converted, and are thus saved by faith in Jesus Christ. You who are not yet believers cannot eat of this secret meat, for you are not alive unto God; you need to be quickened by the Spirit of our God; you must be born again before you can eat the bread of heaven. May the Lord lead you to saving faith in Jesus Christ at once! But I speak to you that know the Lord, you who labor for Him, and need to be refreshed this day. Look you to the right place for nourishment. Are we weary? Then let us seek refreshment by following out the directions of our Lord in the text before us.

First, let us remember that we are sent of God. Do not forget that. Say with your Lord: "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me." Each redeemed one is sent forth by his Redeemer. I do not know what the Lord has sent you to do. I hope you know that each man for himself; but when you know what work you are called to do, do not be held back by any one; wait for no man's consent, patronage, or help. Strengthen your soul upon the persuasion that God has sent you, and then go forward. Let opposers know that somebody will have to clear out; for if God sent you, in that sending there is a force and an energy which nothing can safely resist. Do not make a noise. Forbear all blustering; but quietly

SET TO WORK.

If God has sent you, you will be like the greater Sent One, of whom we read: "He shall not strive, nor cry, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets," but at the same time "he shall not fail, nor be discouraged."

Next, let us get to work. The Master says to His apostles: "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest." This was a common saying among the lazy. The time for work was never come; they always found reason for delay; the harvest was always four months off. Many are going to do a lot of work one of these days. Just now they take things easy, but in four months they will let you see how they can labor. We have too many Christian people around us who find no joyful satisfaction in divine things, because they do not at once spend themselves for Christ.

Further, if we want to have joy and refreshment in our own Christian life let us leap into our place at once. These disciples were not to be sowers, but reapers. Many others are not to be reapers, but sowers. You must get to work in the place into which the Lord puts you; there must be no picking of positions; you must jump into the saddle and be off. It may be that you say: "I should like to begin an altogether new work;" but if the Lord appoints you to go on with the work that some one else has carried on for years, do not hesitate. Perhaps you say: "I should like to labor where the first rough work is done;" but if your Lord directs you to commence on the uncleared forest, do not raise an objection. We must be willing to hook on anywhere. Be leader or shaft-horse. Be first or last. Be sower or reaper, as the Lord ordains. Have no choice, and then you will find satisfaction.

If we are to get refreshment for our souls we may also ANTICIPATE THE WAGES.

There is to be a time when workers together with Christ are to receive wages. The text says: "He that reapeth receiveth wages." There must be special money for mower and reaper. Let us work on; for our Master speaks to us of wages, and He always pays liberally. Your reward is not what you get at present; but it lies in the glorious future. When the Lord Jesus comes He will reward all His stewards and servants. No truth is more plain in the four gospels than this fact, that when Jesus returns to this earth He will distribute recompense in proportion to work done. Herein is meat for us to eat which may well sustain us under the burden and heat of the day.

Then cometh the end. If any of you wish to be refreshed, remember the end. What is the end of sowing and the end of reaping? Is it not the completed harvest? Sow on; work on; reap on; for there will come a day when heaven and earth shall be moved with joyous acclamations, because the Lord's purpose is accomplished, and His work is finished. Then shall we sit down at the supper of the Lamb and rejoice together, as many of us as have had a hand in the blessed work and service in which our Master laid down His life. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind; be sober, and hope to the end. Be encouraged and refreshed this morning. Feed upon the eternal dainties which are provided for you by your Lord, and be glad in His name.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THIS strange but suggestive phrase was used by the sages of India to describe that pure and life-giving water which lies in the bowels of the earth, far below the unwholesome and stagnant sheets of water which remain inactive in the earth's crust. The possibility of its existence and the difficulty of reaching it are questions which have puzzled many generations of men. One triumph in this direction was achieved in Paris, after eight years of labor, through the genius and energy of the famous M. Arago. Having proved that the subsoil of Paris was so formed as to collect the subterranean waters which were gathered there from all the surrounding country, and that nature herself seemed to have adopted the system of centralization also for the waves which travel through the interior of the earth, Arago induced the Municipal Council to provide for the welfare of the French metropolis by having certain wells sunk. Sheets of subterranean water existed beneath the level of the brilliant capital—so Arago and other geologists firmly maintained. But at what depth was the water to be found?

That was a point which no one could decide, and the result of the diggings afterward proved that these subterranean reservoirs were protected by a formidable stratum, the dimensions of which were worthy of one of the great capitals of the civilized world.

It was soon discovered that the subterranean mass of water, having already been utilized for the purpose of feeding countless wells in the neighborhood, no longer possessed sufficient upward power to rise to the level of Paris. Arago, noways disconcerted by this discovery, boldly proposed to dig below this liquid layer, to pierce the deposit of soil formed by the cretaceous ocean, and to reach the green sands, deposits of which appeared on the surface of the soil in the neighborhood of Troyes. On the 7th of November, 1833, the machinery which was to achieve one of the noblest works of excavation which have, perhaps, ever been executed was erected at Grenelle. The auger was first set in motion by a crane worked by several men, but these were soon replaced by horses.

The first portion of the work was completed without obstacle, but the difficulties increased as the work advanced. Many times during the progress of the work the borer broke, and was lost in the well. Imagine a steel implement so heavy that it has to be set in motion by a ram weighing nearly nine tons falling twelve hundred feet to the bottom of a hole less in diameter than a man's body! What a perplexity to the machinist, who has not only lost his instrument, but finds the hole which he wants to open into the ground blocked up by an enormous piece of steel. The only thing to be done is to throw into this hole enormous hooks or spoons, instruments which, after all, work by chance only, for they are hundreds of feet away from the hand that directs them.

On November 30th, 1834, the screw broke in seven pieces, and could only be gotten out again three months later. Again, four years after the commencement of the work, the auger fell for the third time, a cable having snapped suddenly. This time the work was delayed for the space of fourteen months. At last, on February 25th, 1841, the borer brought up a green sand very wet and clayey, which somewhat revived their hopes. The following day the borer went down easily to the length of eighteen inches. It was a good omen. Suddenly the horses which were used in the work experienced a violent shock, which shook the whole machinery, and then they turned the crane without making any effort. Presently a sharp whistling sound was heard, and the water gushed up forcibly high above the spring work. This was on February 26th, 1841, nearly eight years after the work commenced.

IN A DEN OF INFAMY.

ONE of the courageous acts of self-sacrifice of which some Christian women are capable is described in the course of an address by Miss Frances E. Willard, which is issued in leaflet form at twenty-five cents the dozen by the Philanthropist, P. O. Box 2554, New York. The lady who performed the act was one of the true followers of Him who "made Himself of no reputation and took upon Him the form of a servant" (Phil. 2:7).

Madame de Pollalion was left a widow early in life; she became governess to the children of the Duchess of Orleans, but finding the atmosphere of the court prejudicial to moral health, she left it and devoted herself to the service of the most helpless of the human family. At one time she adopted the coarse dress of a servant of the humblest class, and engaged herself to wait upon eight young women who lived together in the profession of infamy. She spent the first week in almost constant prayer, silently offering up supplications to God, even while dressing up her mistresses for their orgies of iniquity. Gradually she began to add to her prayers gentle entreaties and warnings, and soon succeeded in shaking her employers out of their lethargy of sin. In less than three weeks every one of them had forsaken her evil life, and each was weeping and praying by herself in her own room. The event justified and God set His seal of approval on a step which to most people seemed to pass the bounds of prudence by granting her to witness the constancy in virtue of those eight women. Abundant reproaches fell upon Madame de Pollalion as they will fall upon any of us who may take up this work, and yet who knows but for this very sake we came into the world?

HOLYROOD PALACE.

(See Illustration.)

WITH great pomp and magnificence a levee as held on May 20th in the ancient Scottish palace, a picture of which appears on this page. The occasion was the Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Queen Victoria is the head of that Church, as she is of the Protestant Episcopal Church in England.

When, therefore, the General Assembly came together, the dignitaries of the Church were received by the Queen's representative, specially appointed for the purpose, who has the title of High Commissioner. This year the Queen's proxy was Lord Thurlow. The Earl of Aberdeen, who has generally performed the duties, was this year in Ireland, acting as Lord Lieutenant. Lord Thurlow received the divines and civic dignitaries in the throne-room of the palace, and then went in state to St. Giles's Cathedral, where the Moderator preached a sermon, after which Lord Thurlow proceeded to the Presbyterian Assembly Hall and formally opened the session in the Queen's name.

Holyrood Palace has been the scene of many stately pageants. The troopers in their bright uniforms, drawn up as a guard of honor to the representative of royalty, on May 20th, were on ground rich in historic associations; for most of the stormy scenes of the stormiest period of Scottish history were connected with Holyrood. To the American traveller, however, its chief interest is in its association with Mary Queen of Scots. There she was married to Darnley, there Rizzio was stabbed to death, and there she married Bothwell. There, too, Knox confronted her and told her unpalatable truths. They were stormy scenes, those between the beautiful Queen and the sturdy reformer, who had nothing of the courtier in him but a conscience toward God, which would not let him remain silent when the Queen wanted to ruin his country. "Who are you," the Queen said once to the plebeian priest, "that presume to school the nobles and sovereign of this realm?" "Madam," said Knox, "a subject born within the same."

The answer was grand, full of meaning for monarchs who think that the country they rule is theirs, and that their subjects have no rights. Mary, with her French relatives and French friends, would have trodden Scotland under foot if she could have had her own way; and as the nobles had not the courage to tell Her Majesty the truth and warn her of the consequences of her conduct, "a subject born within the realm" had a footing on which to speak. Knox went to her, as the Hebrew prophet Nathan went to David, and delivered the message of the Most High in plain, unequivocal terms. Knox has been blamed for his rudeness and harshness to the delicate lady, but it was necessary to speak plainly to her, and it was the matter, not the manner, of his message that filled his mind when he went with it from his humble abode to the palace of Holyrood. As the American traveller stands within the old rooms and looks upon the very furniture that Mary used, it is those scenes with Knox, rather than the royal pageants, that occupy his thoughts. The brave old man standing in the presence of his sovereign, unmoved either by her majesty or her beauty, manfully doing his duty, when to have been silent would have been so much easier and more pleasant, has made those old rooms a shrine respected by every citizen of a free country.

COMMENCING FAMILY PRAYER.

A TRAVELLER from a distant State one evening rang the bell of a house in which resided an old school-fellow whom he had not seen since both were young men fresh from college.

His ring was not promptly answered, but his second application to the bell brought a child to the door, who ushered him into a parlor, and asked him to wait there a few minutes. The child spoke in a hushed voice, and involuntarily the traveller followed her example. Left to himself, he could hear a voice uttering a prayer, and he recognized it as that of his old friend. Looking up, he saw reflected in the mirror the scene in a room on the opposite side of the hall, the door of which was partially open. There was his friend, older now and more manly in appearance, but clearly recognizable. With closed eyes and clasped hands he was praying earnestly, and beside him were his wife and children. It was a surprise to him, for his friend had been, when they were intimate, thoroughly indifferent to religion, and was inclined to scepticism.

At the conclusion of family worship he received a warm welcome, and was introduced to his friend's wife, whom he found a gifted, charming lady. She retired early, leaving the two friends to talk over old times. In the course of conversation the traveller referred to the scene he had involuntarily witnessed, and asked what had led to so remarkable a change in him.

"I do not wonder at your surprise," was the reply; "it surprises me, but it fills my heart with joy and gratitude. I never knew what happiness was before. No one does who has not become a Christian. I was, as you know, about the last man likely to lead family worship in my home, or anywhere else. I grew more opposed to religion after you left, for I fell in with a very pious set of people, who were very particular about attending church regularly, were horrified at the idea of a man even paring his nails on a Sunday, and generally on the lookout for the gnats of life; but they would lie, and deceive, and cheat more unblushingly than any one I ever knew. Of course that discovery made me more opposed to religion than ever."

"Naturally," said his friend. "I have myself suffered from people of that type."

"But somehow I fell in love with a pious girl. It was a slow process, and I came to know her thoroughly before I spoke of love. I saw her in her home, and she was a blessing to it. You could not put her out of temper. She might be disappointed, or crossed, or troubled in a hundred ways, but was always as sweet and gentle as ever. She was good, I tell you; and though I would have wished she had not been religious, I made up my mind to win her if I could. I said nothing about my objections to religion, and as I had been brought up, you know, to know all about such things, I passed muster, and she did not find it out."

"I suppose she did eventually?"

"Yes; that is what I am coming to. After the wedding we did not go away for a tour, for we had very little money, but went straight to the flat I had rented. We had our little supper alone together, and then what do you think my wife did? She brought out a Bible and asked me to read and pray. Said in the most natural way in the world that we must begin right. I should not have been more dumbfounded if she had held a loaded pistol at my head. I did not know what to do. I could not give the dear creature a shock on her wedding-day, but I made up my mind to think it out and find some kind way of breaking it to her. So I just managed to worry through a chapter and a prayer somehow, and she excused my nervousness, I suppose, on the ground of the agitation of the day. But I felt horrible. I trembled like a leaf; it seemed to me as if it would not be surprising if God struck me dead for daring to address Him with such things in my heart as I had. All my past life came up before me as I prayed, and it was just as if a mocking fiend was taunting me with, 'You praying! You are a pretty fellow to be praying!' The next day was Sunday, and all day I was thinking how to tell her; but she was so loving and happy that I should have been a brute to wound her, as I should do by making my revelation. I tried to get through without prayer that night, but it was no use. She would not omit it, and I did as she wished. That thing went on for a week, until I became so miserable in keeping up the pretence that I thought I should lose my senses. At last I told her."

"How did she take it?"

"Grandly. I expected a storm of reproaches, but there was not a word of that kind. I could see she was almost heart-broken, but she bore up. She would have me pray still, but not as I had been doing. She begged me to pray that God would open my eyes and forgive me and save my soul. I did, and He heard me. I had a terrible time of anxiety, as I told you, for I did not believe God would pardon a man who had gone the length I had; but it came out right. One day I entered into such a sense of peace, and rest, and assurance as I cannot describe. I was a changed man—changed in feeling every way. I seemed to love everybody, and was as bright and happy as a child. I told my wife right away, and then she shed the first tears I ever saw in her eyes. But they were tears of joy, and I knew that they were shed over my conversion. Well, sir, we have never omitted family prayer since we were married, and I enjoy it now as much as my wife does. If you want my experience, I tell you I would not go back to what I was for a thousand worlds."

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Weighty Question.

THE missionaries and the captain alike opposed the idea of a marriage between Fritz and Juliet. Pastor Wilhelm heard them with amazement. The good man was somewhat impulsive, and did not remember that to them Juliet was an utter stranger, and was beside of a type utterly unlike in appearance and manner the ideal missionary's wife. It could not be expected that persons accustomed to act deliberately and on principle would indorse so sudden and extraordinary a project. Then, too, their first thought was of the work to which the young man had consecrated his life. The Apostle Paul certainly did not recommend marriage at all for men who in his time were engaged in missionary work. There were worse evils, he admitted, as it was better to marry than to burn, but he said that men were apt, when they were married, to study how to please their wives, while the unmarried studied how to please the Lord. True, the Moravians had tried to bring Fritz a wife, but then she was to have been one chosen rather for her qualifications as a helper in the work than as a companion. Pastor Wilhelm's project seemed based on natural affection rather than on spiritual grounds. So it found no favor with the devoted missionaries. Pastor Smidt looked very grave, and shook his head. The captain observed with a good-humored smile:

"Yon pretty maiden does not look just like a Moravian missionary's wife. To start her for Labrador work would be something like my hoisting a white satin sail on the little Harmony; it would look mighty fine for awhile, but I doubt how it would stand a Nor'wester."

"The young lady looks delicate," observed Mrs. Smidt.

"Merely from recent illness—from a terrible fright," said Pastor Wilhelm, in his eager manner; "Juliet went through the winter bravely, with only a touch of frost-bite."

"But I understand from you that the damsel is of a worldly family, and has herself been given to a worldly life," said Ernest Smidt. "It would be grievous, indeed, if our Fritz were to be married to one whose influence would naturally tend to draw him down toward earth. Can you give me assurance, Brother Wilhelm, that a maid who may be likened to one of the mixed multitude, who followed the Israelites out of Egypt, would never wish to return to the melons and cucumbers, the onions and leeks of a wealthier land, that she would be content with the desert and the manna?"

"I will answer for her!" cried Pastor Wilhelm, with the enthusiasm of a boy.

"Could you answer for her?" asked Ernest Smidt, turning his searching eyes upon Sister Anna.

Anna was intensely desirous for a marriage between her two cherished friends, but in her simple truthfulness replied: "I cannot answer for it that Juliet would never in Labrador regret the comforts of England. She has been accustomed to such an utterly different life."

"That's it, that's it," said Brother Smidt.

"It is a very great risk for a Labrador missionary to wed a girl who is not a Moravian by birth, nor by habits, nor education. She can hardly be expected to submit to the drudgery or the hardships of a life like your own."

"If we find that she is willing to face them it will be a proof that she can and will bear them," said Pastor Wilhelm, with a little impatience.

"Calmly, calmly, my good brother," said Smidt. "There are times when a woman is ready, for one whom she loves, to face anything, dare anything, endure anything in the world. But this is no guarantee of a lifelong devotion—not to the worker, but the work. The rocket speeds upward with intense energy, as if it would take heaven by storm, but it continues not in a steady course like the planets that, upheld by divine power, proceed in their circling course from one year's end to another."

"I think that Fritz's excellent father should be consulted before Fritz takes so important a step as that of marriage," observed Sister Louisa.

"Certainly, certainly," said her husband, "and our other elder brethren who bear the interests of the Mission constantly on their hearts."

Pastor Wilhelm gave a little sigh of disappointment; then, brightening up, he said: "I see; I see there can be no wedding here till next summer. Fritz's father and the brethren at home must be first consulted. In the mean time our Juliet will stay with my wife. Anna would be quite lost without her young friend; and we'll all draw up and sign a letter of recommendation, which will remove every difficulty at home."

"I am sorry to say one word to wound you, Brother," said Ernest Smidt; "but I fear that I, for one, could sign no such paper, unless much more convinced than I am now, that the union with this pleasing young maiden would be indeed for the happiness of Fritz, or the good of our Labrador Mission."

"It seems to me," observed his worthy partner, "that we are a little hasty in discussing the matter at all, since we know not exactly the wishes either of Fritz or the lady."

Fritz entered the room at the moment. He had heard nothing of what had been said, but he saw that he had broken on a solemn conclave, whose conversation ceased abruptly on his entrance. The young man was about hastily to retire, when Brother Smidt rising, said in a tone of parental kindness: "Fritz, can we pass a half hour alone together on the shore?"

"I was just seeking you to ask for a little private conversation," replied Fritz. "I greatly wish to consult you on a matter of great importance—at least to myself."

Anna and her husband exchanged glances, as the two friends went out together.

"You have not seen our schools yet, Sister Louisa," said Anna; "shall we visit them and the Esquimaux huts? I think that we shall find Juliet there; she spends much of her time with the people."

The proposal was gladly accepted.

"I must look after my tars," said the captain, "and see there's no mistake made with the cargo."

"I do heartily hope that my husband will see his way to signing the recommendation," said Louisa Smidt, as she accompanied Anna toward the igloes. "The sweet looks of that maiden have won my heart already, and I should so rejoice to see dear Fritz happily married. But my husband has so much experience, and is of so prayerful a spirit, that I never would venture to set up my opinion in opposition to his. But are you sure that the maiden would consent to stay in Eschol? would her relations not object to her doing so?"

"Her nearest relations are two step-sisters, who live much in the world," replied Anna; "I do not think that Juliet, as she is of age, is bound to ask their consent. As for her own, her words, spoken in delirium, make me feel little fear of its being withheld."

"Your heart is very much set on her staying?" asked Sister Louisa.

"So much so," said poor Anna, "that I dread taking any active part in the matter, lest I should be acting from selfish motives. And it does seem selfish to wish to transplant such a rose to a terrible climate like this;—only, the natives love her, and Fritz is just the man to make a wife happy."

The subject took in the whole of the party. While the two ladies were discussing it Pastor Wilhelm and the captain were engaged upon it, and Fritz Edelstein himself was talking of it with Missionary Smidt. Possibly, had it been left to the little party permanently resident at Eschol, there would have been no doubt about the right course. Juliet's gradual Christian growth and development had taken place under their own eyes, and whoever may be mistaken about a pretended conversion, it is not the people who live with the convert and see the daily life. They know whether a change has really taken place. So it was at Eschol. It was the new-comers who doubted. Still, Fritz saw that there was reason in the arguments they urged.

"Certainly, I would never take such a step as marriage without consulting my dear father," said Fritz, after—to him—a very agitating conversation with his old friend, to whom he had opened his heart. "But I will tell him, as I have told you, that I do not believe that there is a more true-hearted Christian on earth than she who was so wonderfully, it seems almost miraculously, brought to this land. It was her kindness, her humility, her goodness, that first won my heart."

"But you yourself own that the young lady's conversion only took place last year. Since then she has had no companionship but that of missionaries; she has been as completely sheltered from worldly temptations as a hurricane-lamp from the wind."

"Miss Erle has visited the poor, taught in the school, helped Sister Anna in every way," said Fritz.

"Forgive me for suggesting that the maiden had no other occupation, no other amusement. Is it not possible to take to labors like these as a resource against the weariness caused by so lonely a life?"

Here the two missionaries met Sister Anna and Mrs. Smidt returning from their visit to the schools. The parties joined, and all went together to the house, where they found Brother Wilhelm and the captain. Another sitting of the little council ensued, at which Fritz, deeply, painfully interested, was present. He sat silent, with folded arms, and eyes fixed on the floor, feeling that all his earthly happiness was at stake, but that earthly happiness must be counted as nothing, when compared with his duty to his father, his mission, and his God.

After a brief discussion, it was decided that Anna should break the subject to Juliet before retiring to rest, when the Smidts should have returned to their cabin in the ship, to pass the night in the Harmony. They would not sleep at Eschol, though pressed to do so, being unwilling to put their hospitable brethren to such inconvenience as the crowding of the house would occasion.

If Anna, in execution of her delicate mission, should find Juliet willing to join the ancient Church of the Moravians, formally acknowledged, as it has been, as a sister Church by the highest dignitary in the Protestant Episcopal Church, she was then to be invited to a private conversation with Pastor Smidt and his wife. "Without such an opportunity of examining her as to her religious convictions," said the conscientious Moravian, "I could not—we could not possibly sign our names to a recommendation that our young sister here should become a missionary's wife."

It is not to be wondered at, if, with so difficult a mission before her, Sister Anna could not perform with her usual ease the office of hostess; she all but forgot that eggs require to be boiled. Pastor Wilhelm, though he made many inquiries about friends at home, and mission news from various Moravian settlements, did not contribute one of his stories to the general conversation, nay, betrayed that his attention was wandering, by repeating over and over some of his questions. His thoughts were evidently engaged on other matters. Pastor Smidt had an anxious, prepossessed expression on his face; Fritz was unusually silent, and never before had Juliet seen him so awkward at carving; his hand actually trembled!

Juliet herself felt in a singularly strange position, one of the Moravian circle, and yet hardly belonging to it, uncertain whether she was to return in the Harmony, or whether she would be invited to remain where she could not but feel that her presence was urgently needed. No one was perfectly at ease but the captain and gentle, kindly Sister Louisa, who talked much to Juliet, and tried as much as she could to remove her natural shyness. Juliet wondered how she herself had at first done injustice to such a pleasant, benevolent-looking being as the wife of Pastor Smidt. When, after evening worship, the little party broke up, and the Pastor Wilhelm and Fritz escorted their guests back to the boat, Juliet felt that she had made a new friend in Sister Louisa. Nor was the impression a false one.

"Now for my dreaded explanation," thought poor Anna, as soon as she and Juliet were alone together. "How shall I possibly begin it?" A thought occurred to her; she arose, went to her room, and returned with the star-bordered feather quilt.

"The excitement of the arrival, and other things, had almost made me forget that this is my sweet child's birthday. She will accept and keep this for the sake of a friend who loves her."

Juliet embraced her friend, and thanked her warmly. Then in a hesitating voice observed: "It will be so much admired in England."

"Oh, my child, I had hoped that you would have used it here. But—but—perhaps you wish to return to your home." Anna felt the little hand which she held in her own grow suddenly cold.

"You have not asked me to stop," murmured Juliet.

"Would you—would you be willing, if—if circumstances made it possible for you to do so?"

Juliet could not keep her hand from trembling. What could be coming next? It was some time before she could break the awkward silence by saying, in a nervous tone: "I would be willing to stay with you, but—but—" Again a most awkward pause ensued.

"You could only stay as the betrothed of Fritz Edelstein," said Anna, breaking the ice of reserve with a bound.

Juliet hastily withdrew her hand from Anna's. "Has Fritz asked you to say this?" she inquired, with unuttered thoughts in her mind; "why did he not speak for himself?"

"Fritz knows that I am saying this," replied Anna, as it were floundering in the midst of the broken ice, unable to extricate herself from the unpleasant position. "Oh, dear Juliet, I am so perplexed, I don't know how to tell you of the difficulties in our way!"

"What difficulties?" asked Juliet, feeling bewildered.

"You see, dear, we don't just know whether a missionary life would suit you all your days. Brother Smidt fears that you might shrink back from the hardships, and—and—he knows that you have been brought up so differently from us. Unless he is allowed to examine you as to your principles and views, he could not—indeed, I don't see that he could—conscientiously recommend you for a Labrador station to the brethren at home."

"Recommend me to the brethren at home!" repeated Juliet, drawing herself up to her full height, with a flush on her cheek and pride on her lip.

"There is Fritz's father, you know, a very pious man; he would be afraid of his son's union with one who has been so long in the gay world. But if you would have a conversation with Brother Smidt, I think—I feel sure—almost sure—that all would come right."

Juliet was astonished at what she had heard. Conscious that she would be considered of higher social position than Fritz, and that she was possessed of independent means, she had been quite prepared for surprise and displeasure on the part of her own relations, should she unite her fortunes with his. She knew that Dora and Cecilia would regard her marriage as a very low one, and that her contracting it would be a subject of mirth among her fashionable acquaintance.

Juliet, after consultation with her own heart, had made up her mind to encounter this. But to be examined like a charity child, to be regarded as not quite good enough to be permitted to work in an obscure settlement in a dreary land, Juliet Erle's spirit resented the idea as insulting! With more haughtiness than she had believed to be left in her nature, the young lady rose from her seat.

"I will never stoop to be questioned on religious subjects by an utter stranger," said Juliet. "Where I give my labor or my affections, I give them freely; I will not consent to be bound by Puritanical chains. I shall certainly return to my home in England."

GO, AND SIN NO MORE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for June 27, John 8: 1-12.

The Malignity of the Scribes and Pharisees—A Dilemma Prepared for Christ—His Convicting Answer—None Fit to Execute Judgment—Alone with Jesus—His Keeping Power—Life and Being Redeemed and Sanctified—The Voice of Mortified Pride—The Light of the World—Following Jesus.

NONE could touch Jesus until His hour was come; and thus the disappointed Pharisees and scribes went every man to his own house, and Jesus was still at large; none of the officers of the people had been found proof against His words, for they were "with power" (Luke 4: 32). Jesus was at large; still in a position to bless; but the scribes and Pharisees left no stone unturned to bring Him into condemnation. The following morning they caused an interruption to His teaching by dragging into the midst of His audience a poor unhappy woman, who had been taken in the very act of grievous sin—that of unfaithfulness to her husband. Another had been her partner in sin, but he was not dragged before the public, and no question was raised as to whether he should suffer the penalty of the law, although they knew how it was written, "The adulterer, and adulteress shall surely be put to death" (Lev. 20: 10). God's Word is not responsible for the unjust and unequal standard by which men are judged in the world. He is STRICTLY IMPARTIAL.

They said: "Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned; but what sayest Thou?" It was an implication that Jesus would differ with Moses. They thought to catch Him in a trap. If He should say that the poor woman must suffer the penalty of the law, then where would be His reputation for love and gentleness? He would lose all His popularity. If, on the contrary, He should decide the other way, they would at last have a just ground of accusation that He taught contrary to Moses. They thought to have Him this time, and they saw no way of escape. Little did they expect the reception which their question met with. At first He stopped in His teaching; but instead of answering them, He wrote with His finger on the ground. He who was of purer eyes than to behold iniquity turned away from the relation of the details of sin. But they were urgent, and continued asking Him. He raised Himself and answered: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." She must be dealt with according to the law, she must be stoned; but

WHO SHOULD BE THE EXECUTIONER?

Again He turned away, and with His finger wrote upon the ground. Truly, never man spake like this man. His hearers were silenced; the word had judged them; the oldest man of the company led the way, and went from the presence of Him whose word had searched and found him out; and then, one after another, the company who had condemned her filed out, and "the woman was left alone, and Jesus standing in the midst." Alone with Jesus! alone with Him who, of all that company, had a right to execute upon her the sentence of death which the law pronounced, and which He could never make light of! "Woman," He said, "where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee?" She answered: "No man, Lord," but attempted no self-justification and pleaded for no mercy. She was alone with Him who had her life for time and eternity in His hands, and He said what no other man on earth and no angel in heaven would have dared to say, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." Is Christ, then, "the Minister of sin"? (Gal. 2: 17.) Does He teach us to make more light of sin than did His Father under the law? God forbid. But He who did not condemn this sinful woman acted so because for her sake He Himself was condemned. He was made sin for her, though He knew no sin (11 Cor. 5: 21). He was made a curse for her to redeem her from the curse of the law; and thus He alone had a right to pronounce pardon.

Jesus came not to condemn the world; but that the world through Him might be saved (John 3: 17), whether morally upright, like Nathanael, Saul of Tarsus, and Cornelius (John 1: 27; Acts 22: 3; 23: 1; 10: 1, 2), or whether shameless, open sinners, like the Samaritan woman, the woman of whom we have just spoken, and Mary Magdalene, out of whom He cast seven devils. Where He says, "Neither do I condemn thee," because our iniquities are laid on Him, He says also, with equal authority and equal power: "Go, and sin no more." He has as much us from sinning as He has to pardon us our past sins. He has redeemed us, soul and body, and we have a right to go free. Oh, if those who are under the power of any fleshly lust, whether drunkenness, gluttony, or uncleanness, could but believe that every member of their bodies, as well as every power of their souls, has been redeemed and is capable of being holy unto the Lord, by being a part of the temple of the Holy Ghost, self-despair, the self-despair which often seizes this class of sinners, would come to an end! Satan crushes them by saying: "Your appetites are yours by birth; you cannot help them; they are sinful, but then you cannot control them; you are under the curse, and there is no help for it." Oh, how blessed is God's Word, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law; being made a curse for us." He has redeemed not our souls only, but our bodies, our appetites, our desires, our whole spiritual, moral, and physical man, from sin and from all impossibility; glory to His name! He has made eating and drinking holy, so long as it is under His control, for He ate and drank habitually here on earth. He has made marriage holy, so long as He controls it, by His presence at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. He has made our natural love of the beautiful holy, so long as He rules it, by His talk about the lilies of the field. All which Satan has used in our human nature to develop his germs of sin Christ has redeemed to be an instrument of righteousness, a vehicle for the life of Jesus, and for the working of the Holy Ghost. The man born blind (John 9) was so that the works of God might be made manifest in him. If our fallen nature had not fallen so low, the glory of God could not be so great in the glorious redemption which Christ has wrought.

"Neither do I condemn thee;" yet, "But say some. Dear reader, this proceeds more from mortified pride than from real humility. To be angry with yourself shows that you have expected something from yourself and been disappointed. A friend remarked the other day: "While we condemn ourselves we are in an atmosphere of condemnation, and are ready to condemn every one else as well. One of the truest fruits of our accepting to the full the forgiveness of God is that we forgive ourselves and accept that command of power, Go, and sin no more."

When Jesus recommenced His teaching He said: "I am the light of the world." What light He had shed on that poor woman! She came out of the thick darkness of a life blasted by her own sin; a family life broken up; the sentence of death upon her for soul and body; and the bitter thought that he who had equally sinned with her went scot-free, as far as human judgment went, perhaps walked in the streets, with large phylacteries and an added breadth to the border of his garment. She could look to no blessing in the future in family life, no possible reparation, no place of repentance. And a bright, broad, glorious light had shone in. Instead of the stones, which were her due, and a terrible public execution, with the curses of husband and child ringing in her ears, she who deserved it all had heard the Son of God say to her: "Neither do I condemn thee," and, joy of joys, "Go, and sin no more." Here was hope beyond all expectation; a new life, and a better, was opening before her, not for time only, but eternity.

"I am the Light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not abide in darkness, but shall have

THE LIGHT OF LIFE."

It is Satan's plan, when we are saved or when we are sanctified, to bring some darkness over our souls. He tries in some way or other to make the Word of God to be at issue with our own experience, and then he turns round with his old question, "Hath God said?" insinuating that, after all, God does not keep His word. There is but one way to meet him, and that is to follow Jesus in the dark or in the light, when we understand and when we do not understand, and we shall come out into the light some time. We may start on a railway journey when the rain is falling in torrents and the thunder rolling overhead; but we sit still, and are borne along, and by and by we have been carried right through the storm and out on the other side. And so it is if we continue following Jesus: He carries us through any time of darkness right out into the light; we may come into darkness, but cannot abide in it when we follow Him.

Looking into ourselves is more productive of darkness than any other thing. Light is not inherent in any man; all light comes from without; we are naturally without light, "Ye were sometime darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord" (Eph. 5: 8).

FOLLOWING JESUS,

we see ourselves, as well as others, from His point of view; we see circumstances as He sees them, and oh, how different they are! we see in His light all things subject to Him; we see sin, Satan, the world, the flesh—all overcome; we see constant victory, because He has gained it, and whatever He does is forever. And thus seeing, how can we abide in the darkness of sin, or of self-condemnation, or of despair? How can we abide in the darkness of ignorance or of fear when His glorious light shines in? Thank God, He lights us to a life in which we are kept from sinning by His abiding power, just as we quite and forever yield ourselves up to Him; it is a life of joy and of liberty, in which "Neither do I condemn thee" is our ceaseless theme of praise, and "Go, and sin no more" our joyous warrant and power for a life in which we know that we please Him and walk in the light of His countenance. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound; they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance. In Thy name shall they rejoice all the day; and in Thy righteousness shall they be exalted. For Thou art the glory of their strength" (Ps. 89: 15-17).

WHAT SHALL I RENDER TO THE LORD?

BY W. W. HALLOWAY, JR.

What shall I bring to thee, O Lord—
Of what make offering?
What does my life, so poor, afford
That I to Thee may bring?

No lamb have I of bleating flock,
That feeds amid the grain,
Nor any bulls of noble stock
To be on altars slain.

No costly incense can I bring
To pour on glowing coals,
From thence in fragrant clouds to rise,
Like prayers from longing souls.

First fruits of harvests have I none
Before Thy gates to lay;
The wheat from flashing sickles won,
Grapes lit with sunshine's ray.

I have no power by which to build
A temple, Lord, to thee,
To be with gold and cedar filled,
And light and majesty.

No myrrh, nor frankincense, nor gold,
Can I as gift present,
Like those, the Wise Men, who of old
With joy o'er Jesus bent.

No alabaster box have I
Of precious ointment sweet
To pour before Thee while I lie
In worship at Thy feet.

And yet my heart would prompt some gift
To prove my fervent love;
No empty hands would I uplift
Toward the throne above.

Then, since I have no earthly store,
Possessions, power nor pelf,
And since Thou dost desire no more,
O Lord I give myself!

My intellect, my will, my heart,
Whatever mine I call;
My time, my strength—with all I part,
To Thee I bring them all!

WHATEVER may be the obligation of a nation to its military heroes, statesmen, and scholars, there is no man entitled to more gratitude than the man who gives it the Word of God in the language of the people. A Bible that every man can read in his own tongue is a blessing beyond price to any nation. It is "quick and powerful," transforming individual lives, elevating and purifying the home, and promoting the righteousness which exalteth a nation. A man may not fight, nor make splendid orations, nor give large gifts, nor found colleges and hospitals; he may be poor, obscure, and utterly unrecognized; but if he puts in the hands of the people an open Bible, he has done more for the regeneration of that nation than any one can appreciate. That work was done for Bengal, one of the great provinces of India, by the noble Swiss missionary whose portrait appears on the preceding page. That province, apart from the surrounding districts which are joined with it by ties of race and government, contains sixty-seven million souls. To Dr. Wenger and his co-laborers that vast population owes the blessing of a Bible in the vernacular.

John Wenger was a native of Switzerland. He was born in the picturesque hamlet of Bruchenbühl, near the Lake of Thun, on August 30th, 1811, and died at Calcutta, on August 20th, 1880, at the age of sixty-nine. The sublime scenery of the country seems from his earliest days to have exercised an elevating influence on the sensitive mind of the boy. Yet his early experiences were such as would in ordinary cases have neutralized the influence and made him dull and sordid. He was left at the early age of five years. His father was called away from his peaceful life to take part in the wars which the ambition of Napoleon I. brought upon Europe. He was quartermaster of the local militia, and was sent to the frontier. There exposure and hardship undermined his health, and shortly after the downfall of the Emperor he sank under pulmonary disease and died. "My brother and I," writes Dr. Wenger, "were put on the same wagon as the coffin, wrapped in tablecloths to shelter us from the rain. Thus I became an orphan before completing my fifth year." That journey with the coffin containing his father's remains made an indelible impression on his memory.

The family removed to the house of Samuel Wenger, the eldest brother of the deceased, at Eriswyl, a village on the borders of the canton of Lucerne, where John began at once the study of the French language under the direction of his generous uncle. But in the autumn of 1817 Samuel Wenger removed to Berne, and there the bereaved family settled with him in January, 1818. John Wenger's passed without much incident. He describes himself as a "feeble, timid, spiritless, awkward boy," fond of quiet, and ever trying to keep out of harm's way. He avoided play, and never possessed a marble in his life. It is probable that his dislike for the ordinary amusements of boys was largely the effect of the taste for reading which he had acquired. Geography was his delight, and much boyish pride was developed by his unusual skill in arithmetic.

But these pleasant school-days were broken up in July, 1819, when the little family was dispersed, and John became a member of the family of Jacob Wenger, another uncle, very different in his disposition from his brother who first had charge of the orphan boy. Jacob was a wheelwright by trade. The succeeding months, till September, 1820, was at uncongenial employments for the timid, patient boy. In harvest time he had to take his full share in the work of getting in the fruits of the soil. It was his duty to press down the corn with a long stick, to facilitate its being cut with the scythe; to assist in tying the sheaves and drying the grain; to drive the oxen that drew the heavy laden wains; to aid in mowing and making the hay; to help in getting in and storing the apples, pears, cherries, potatoes, turnips, etc.; in winter to feed the cows and sheep stalled in the sheds; besides such housework as his boyish strength might enable him to do. Often in the bitter cold weather, when looking after the cows in the pastures, he would collect a few sticks, and make a fire under the lee of a hedge, to warm himself and dry his clothes. (See Illustration No. 1 on first page.)

In 1822 there was a welcome change in his life. John had left the hard work on the farm, for which he was unfitted, and was again in Berne under the hospitable roof of his uncle Gottlieb, where he made considerable progress with his education. In the following year he began the study of Greek and Latin, in which he made marked progress, and eventually became

A SCHOLAR AT THE GYMNASIUM.

In November, 1826, he being then more than fifteen years of age, it became necessary, after the usage of the established Church of Switzerland, that he should prepare for his first communion. This he did, and received the Lord's Supper for the first time on Whit-Sunday, 1827. "I felt it to be," he says, "a very solemn act, and was moved to tears." In April of that year he was promoted from the Gymnasium to the Academy, and entered upon his college career. At this time he began seriously to consider what he should do with his future life. Happily for him, the first of many, occurred under his uncle's roof. Staying there at that time was a young man named Morlet, who was studying for the ministry. He was a protégé of Robert Haldane, who had paid his collegiate expenses in Paris and elsewhere. Morlet had two intimate Christian friends named Schaffter and Hebler, who spent much of their time with him, and they welcomed to their circle the promising young student, John Wenger. (See Illustration No. 2.) They used to meet for mutual Christian converse, and at these social religious talks the eyes of the future missionary were opened to the nature of true religion. He became anxious for salvation, and soon found joy and peace at the feet of the Redeemer. Immediately he recognized his work, and the desire to enter the ministry of the National Church became the constant subject of his thoughts. His was preached in French, in Mr. Schaffter's pulpit, in Berne, on October 14th, 1830. The second sermon followed a fortnight later. As it was illegal for a divinity student to preach until after the completion of the first year's studies, the Berne Ecclesiastical Council interfered. Mr. Schaffter, however, successfully claimed exemption for his student. The spring of 1831 saw Mr. Wenger in possession of the right of using his gifts, and frequent engagements in the pulpits of Berne and its neighborhood were made and kept. Sometimes it was necessary to preach in German and sometimes in French. Mr. Wenger spoke both languages fluently and correctly. In all cases he followed the laborious practice enjoined on the students of reciting the discourse from memory.

A MOMENTOUS INTERVIEW,

The last year of Mr. Wenger's studies at the Academy of Berne (1832) witnessed a complete revolution in his relations with the National Church, and deeply affected his future career. "The old orthodox clergy, for the most part, were cold and formal preachers. The younger men were chiefly irreligious, and their sermons were little else than philosophical or moral essays, or sentimental addresses." These, and many other considerations, resulted in his declining ordination, seceding from the Established Church, and devoting himself to teaching for a livelihood. He became in the family of an English clergyman, named Leeves, then at Geneva. It was at this time that Mr. Wenger first contemplated becoming a Baptist missionary in India. In 1838 he paid a visit to England, and had an interview with the Rev. John Dyer, Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, and through him, with the Rev. Dr. Steane, W. B. Gurney, Esq., Mr. Mack, and other prominent friends of the Mission. In February, 1839, he was baptized at Denmark Place Chapel, by Dr. Steane, in the presence of a large congregation, and the rupture with the National Church of his fatherland was consummated.

In the following June he sailed for Calcutta. The voyage, on the whole, was a pleasant one. Only once was the good order of the ship disturbed. This was when the vessel crossed the Equator. At that time it was the practice for the sailors to indulge in rough horse-play on any one on board, especially any soldiers who had never before crossed the Line. Scenes of brutality were common, entailing so much real suffering that the custom has since been summarily interdicted. The Line was crossed on July 25th, and, as usual, the sailors commenced their practical jokes. The soldiers lost patience at last, and stood together for defence. So high did passion rise on both sides, that words of command were disregarded, bayonets gleamed in the hands of the soldiers, and the sailors drew their knives. The fierceness of human passion seemed about to be let loose in all its fury. (See Illustration No. 3.) The officers were, however, able to separate the combatants. They wrested the weapons out of the hands of the men by main force. "To those who witnessed the scene," says Mr. Wenger, "it appeared next to impossible that bloodshed could be avoided, and it would be wrong not to attribute it to the faithfulness of that God who heareth prayer, that all ended as well as it did."

IN INDIA.

On September 25th, 1839, the vessel reached her moorings in the Hooghley, and Mr. Wenger, with his companions, saw for the first time the city of Calcutta. A few days later he began to qualify himself for the translation of the Scriptures into Bengali in company with Dr. Yates.

No man ever consecrated himself more heartily to any work than did Mr. Wenger to the labor he had undertaken on behalf of the people of India. With wonderful rapidity he acquired the difficult language, and could soon not only read and speak it fluently, but could so nicely discriminate between apparent synonyms, as to render himself an expert translator. Thus he spent his time teaching and preaching, and using every spare moment in the arduous task of translating the Bible. The severity of his daily toils was occasionally relieved by a brief visit to a country district, where he sought to invigorate his health, already suffering from the debility incident to life in the tropics, and to reach the people gathered at these health resorts. On one occasion was visited, and there he remained a week in company with his wife and Mr. and Mrs. Pearce. No European lady or child had ever been seen there before. The inhabitants came in crowds every afternoon (see Illustration No. 4), and gave the Mission band excellent opportunities for preaching and conversation. The women came freely to the boats to make the acquaintance of their English sisters. On the distribution of tracts and portions of Scripture, the missionaries, in order to escape the rush of the multitude, found it necessary to moor the boat in the middle of the stream; but it was difficult even then to keep the boats from rocking dangerously from side to side, as the people struggled to get into it. Some even fell into the river from the planks by which they could approach.

(See Illustration No. 5.) The surprising feature was, that so many showed such marvellous eagerness for Christian books who shortly before had been determined to drive the Gospel from their midst, and to persecute those who sought the knowledge of salvation. The toilsome and of Mr. Wenger were not carried on without much suffering from ill-health and domestic trial. In August, 1853, his beloved wife died. A short time afterward the doctor strongly advised the devoted missionary to pay a visit to Europe. Exhausting labors in a climate so debilitating had made serious inroads on his vitality, which nothing was so likely to restore as invigorating draughts of pure air from his native mountains in Switzerland.

After spending about two years amid the scenes of his earlier days, he joyfully resumed his labors in India, and, with assiduous and conscientious devotion, zealously gave himself to the discharge of the duties of his chosen lot. They were arduous but delightful. In addition to the great work of the translation, he took charge, in 1863, of the native church of Intally, near Calcutta, and for eleven years was active in the discharge of the duties of the pastorate. Meanwhile the was approaching. In 1873 nothing remained to be done on the two editions—one in Bengali and one in Sanscrit—but revision and emendation. In 1839, when he landed in Calcutta, a young man of twenty-eight, he commenced his preparations for the gigantic task. It was not until thirty-five years afterward, in April, 1874, when he was sixty-three, that he laid down his pen and saw the work complete. Then, with the joy that comes from work well and faithfully done, he went again to Switzerland and rested from his labor once more in the shadow of his beloved mountains.

His holiday was a brief one. At the end of six months he was on board a steamer outward bound, and looking forward to a renewal of labor. Age and exhausted energies were, however, apparent to his colleagues. The old fire of mind and soul were there still, but the physical powers no longer responded as formerly to the calls he made upon them. He was enfeebled, and was dispirited by the indications he could not but recognize, that the activity of by-gone years was impossible for him. For five years, however, he worked on with unsparing vigor, eager that his Master should have all the years yet remaining to him of life. Then his strength failed him, and he reluctantly yielded to the inevitable.

DEATH.

At the close of 1879 he went to Orissa, and received in the missionary circle there a warm welcome. Affectionate friends ministered to his wants, and doubtless their care prolonged the waning life. On August 18th, 1880, it became clear that the end was very near. He was unable to rise, but continued cheerful and even joyous. Miss Leslie, a lady missionary, visited him in his room that morning, and finding him free from pain and in a sunny mood, she called in a few of the children of the missionaries to sing to him. They sang "Rock of Ages," and, to their surprise, the dying veteran joined in the hymn to the end. (See Illustration No. 6.) It was his last service of praise. On August 20th he calmly and peacefully passed away.

That night, after a solemn service, his remains were carried on the shoulders of the native preachers to their last resting-place (see Illustration No. 7), to await the resurrection morn.

It is gratifying to note that the recognition of the able missionary's learning and valuable labor to the cause of Christ, which his own country did not give and which was withheld by the land which sent him out to toil, and which the latter bestows readily in far less deserving cases, came to him from our own country. Brown University, Rhode Island, honored itself in honoring him. In 1872 he received at its hands the degree of Doctor of Divinity, a title of which he was eminently worthy.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Tired of One Subject.—A Christian Gentleman said at a recent meeting: "I heard not long ago of a minister who preached three successive Sundays on the subject of repentance. At the close of the third service his son said to him, 'Father, don't you think we have had enough of repentance? Would it not be better to change your subject, for I am sure your people will be tired of that one?' 'My son,' said the father, 'have they repented yet?' 'No, I do not believe they have,' replied the young man. 'Well, I will preach repentance again and again, until they have repented,' said the good minister."

A Deaf Mute's Beautiful Answer.—The Rev. R. Stewart said: "I knew of a gentleman who went to a deaf and dumb asylum to make known to the inmates the way of salvation through Jesus Christ. He asked questions by means of writing them on a blackboard. One day he wrote the question, 'What does God do with the sins of the people who believe in Him?' One of the lads wrote below the question, 'All our sins were written in God's book, but Jesus came and drew His bleeding hand across the pages where the sins of the people were entered who believe in Him, thus covering over with His own blood the transgressions of His people.'"

A Student without Money.—The Rev. M'Donald remarked: "Before beginning my university course of study, I had saved some money; but soon it was all expended, and what was I to do? for although I had one friend who generously offered to help me, I said, 'No; if I cannot help myself I will go back to the commercial office again.' Just at this time I was asked to preach in an iron church, some distance off, and I knew that if I were suitable they wanted a minister; but as my money was all gone, I could not see my way to go. I was then living in my father's house, and very comfortable, but it was not to him I turned for help. I went to my own room, and opening my Bible, I read, 'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want.' The difficulty was solved, and I at once wrote to say that I could not accept. Not long afterward the Lord opened up another place for me, as He always will provide for those who put their trust in Him."

Appeal of a "Plucked" Student.—The Rev. Mr. Ferrie remarked: "I heard lately of a young gentleman, a medical student, who, like many others, neglected his studies. Three times he failed to pass his examination. He went to London, thinking that in a place where he was not so well known he might have a chance of passing; but there he failed also. The first time he went up when in Glasgow, he had prayed to God to help him to pass; but he failed. The second time he went up he went to the Lord again, and asked His help. But God never supplies the want of knowledge brought about by our own carelessness, and a second time he failed. The third, when he went up to London, he was so afraid that he should fail, that he went down on his knees, and asked the devil for hell's sake, or for his own, to help him. But a third time he failed. This shows to what an extent a man will go when he is driven by the circumstances of this life. How presumptuous he will be! How he will blaspheme and curse the Lord! Often blaming Him for troubles and trials which have not been sent by the Lord, but have been brought on by his own conduct."

A Dying Soldier Saved.—The Rev. Mr. Ross remarked: "During the civil war in America a young man fell in battle. He was carried to the hospital, where a surgeon examined him and saw that the wound was fatal. Word was sent to his father to come at once if he wished to see his boy before he died. When the father arrived his son was sleeping, and was told that he could not see him until he awoke, for the sudden appearance of his father would instantly take his life, so weak was he. At length the father was asked to come in, as his boy was awake, and was asking for him. 'Father,' he said, after the first salutation was over, 'I want to ask you what must I do to be saved? For, oh, father, I want to get life; I want to get salvation; and speak it plainly, father, speak it plainly, for I am dying.' After an inward struggle for help to be guided in the right way, the father said: 'John, do you remember when you were a boy, and did something wrong, and I punished you for it, and how angry you were with me for punishing you?' 'Yes, I remember it very well.' 'Were you happy then?' 'No, father, I was not.' 'Do you remember what you did then? You came to me and said: "Father, I am very sorry for what I did. I deserve to be punished, but I want you to forgive me." And I said, "Go to Jesus, and ask Him to forgive you also." 'Yes, father, I remember it all well.' 'My boy, go to your Heavenly Father now, and just say to Him what you said to me, and ask all for Jesus' sake.' In a few moments the dying man looked up and said: 'I thank God that He has saved me.' It did not take long; in a moment that lad had passed from death unto life, and was soon safe in the arms of Christ."

A Wife's Unsuspected Follower.—A Woman who had been anxious about her soul for some time went to the minister hoping that he could help her. 'Oh,' he said to her anxious inquiry, 'I always looked upon you as a godly woman.' But that did not bring peace or satisfaction to her; the Holy Spirit was striving within, and would not be stilled. She went to a meeting, and there she found peace in Christ through the singing of the hymn:

A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky.

She asked for it to be sung over again that she might grasp its full meaning. When she returned home that night she said to her husband, who was a drunkard: 'Oh, you must go to that meeting.' She urged him again and again, but never said: 'Oh, you must give your heart to the Lord Jesus!' But, unknown to her, her husband had followed her to the cottage service, and although he had not gone inside, when he heard his wife crying and sobbing, he said within himself: 'There is something in it.' Then, when at length she did plead with him to give his heart to the Saviour, as she had done, he said: 'Why did you not tell me that before?' And he did make a full surrender of himself to Christ, and now the whole family are rejoicing in the salvation of Christ."

A Swiss Orphan's Letter to Jesus.—Captain Hatfield related: "I heard a pleasing incident of a little boy's faith, in Switzerland, recently. A father and mother lived there with their two little children, a boy of seven and a girl two years' younger. The mother fell ill and died, and about a month afterward the father also suddenly died, leaving the orphaned children without any one on earth to take care of them. They lived in a solitary place, and no one heard of the man's death, and the poor little children had to live for days beside the corpse. The children had eaten all the food there was in the house, and on the fourth day the little girl was crying piteously for bread. The brother, who himself was suffering greatly, could do nothing to render help to his almost baby sister. At length a bright thought struck him. He took a small scrap of coarse brown paper, and wrote these words upon it: 'Dear Jesus, please give me one penny to buy bread for my little sister?' With this paper carefully rolled up he set out for a chapel some distance from their home. He walked up to the chapel and dropped the paper into a money-box which stood at the door. A priest saw the boy, and thought he had been taking money from the box, and ran after him and brought him back to the chapel, where the boy explained what he had done. The priest made the sad case known to his congregation, and money was raised to provide for the present necessities of those little ones."

THE BATTLE FOR BREAD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 20, 1886.

"And the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening."—1 KINGS 17: 6.

Ornithological Teachers—An Ancient Fable of the Wren—The Feeding of Elijah—Black Servants of the Wilderness—Where they Got the Food—The Great Conflict of the Day—Champions of a Home Circle—Ravens Wanted—I. God Sent them—Infantile Wishes Disregarded—Unlimited Resources—II. A Surplus not Provided—The Great Fret of the World—Gold Eagles Preferred to Ravens—The City of Rochelle Supplied—A Connecticut Farmer's Prayer—III. The Unexpected Purveyors—The Color of God's Providence—A Widow's Prayer for Coal.

THE ornithology of the Bible is a very interesting study. The stork which knoweth her appointed time. The common sparrows teaching the lesson of God's providence. The ostriches of the desert, by careless incubation, illustrating the recklessness of parents who do not take enough pains with their children. The eagle symbolizing riches which take wings and fly away. The pelican emblemizing solitude. The bat, a flake of the darkness. The night hawk, the ossifrage, the cuckoo, the lapwing, the osprey, by the command of God in Leviticus, flung out of the world's bill of fare.

I would like to have been with Audubon as he went through the woods, with gun and pencil, bringing down and sketching the fowls of heaven, his unfolded portfolio thrilling all Christendom. What of God the birds are! Some of them, this morning, like the songs of heaven let loose, bursting through the gates of heaven. Consider their feathers, which are clothing and conveyance at the same time; the nine vertebrae of the neck, the three eyelids to each eye, the third eyelid an extra curtain for graduating the light of the sun. Some of these birds scavengers and some of them orchestra. Thank God for quail's whistle, and lark's carol, and the twitter of the wren, called by the ancients because when the fowls of heaven went into a contest as to who could fly the highest, and the eagle swung nearest the sun, a wren on the back of the eagle, after the eagle was exhausted, sprang up much higher, and so was called by the ancients the king of birds. Consider those of them that have golden crowns and crests, showing them to be feathered imperials. And listen to the humming-bird's serenade in the ear of the honeysuckle. Look at the belted kingfisher, striking like a dart from sky to water. Listen to the voice of the owl, giving the keynote to all croakers. And behold the condor among the Andes, battling with the reindeer. I do not know whether an aquarium or aviary is the best altar from which to worship God.

There is an incident in my text that baffles all the ornithological wonders of the world. The grain crop had been cut off. Famine was in the land. In a cave by the brook Cherith sat a minister of God, for something to eat. Why did he not go to the neighbors? There were no neighbors; it was a wilderness. Why did he not pick some of the berries? There were none. If there had been, they would have been dried up. Seated one morning at the mouth of his cave, the prophet sees a flock of birds approaching. Oh, if they were only partridges, or if he only had an arrow with which to bring them down! But as they come nearer, he finds they are not comestible, but unclean, and the eating of them would be spiritual death. The strength of their beak, the length of their wings, the blackness of their color, their loud, harsh "cruck! cruck!" prove them to be ravens.

They whirr around about the prophet's head, and then they come on fluttering wing and pause on the level of his lips, and one of the ravens brings bread, and another raven brings meat, and after they have discharged their tiny cargo they wheel past, and others come, until after awhile the prophet has enough, and these black servants of the wilderness table are gone. For six months, and some say a whole year, morning and evening, a breakfast and sounded as these ravens rang out on the air their "cruck! cruck!" Guess where they got the food from. The old rabbins say they got it from the kitchen of King Ahab. Others say that the ravens got their food from pious Obadiah, who was in the habit of feeding the persecuted. Some say that the ravens brought the food to their young in the trees, and that Elijah had only to climb up and get it. Some say that the whole story is improbable; for these were carnivorous birds, and the food they carried was the torn flesh of living beasts, and that ceremonially unclean; or it was carrion, and it would not have been fit for the prophet. Some say they were not ravens at all, but that the word translated "ravens" in my text ought to have been translated "Arabs;" so it would have read, "The Arabs brought bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening." Anything but admit the Bible to be true.

Hew away at this miracle until all the miracle is gone. Go on with the depleting process, but know, my brother, that you are robbing only one man—and that is yourself—of one of the most comforting, beautiful, pathetic, and triumphant lessons in all the ages. I can tell you

WHO THESE PURVEYORS WERE

—they were ravens. I can tell you who freighted them with provisions—God. I can tell you who launched them—God. I can tell you who taught them which way to fly—God. I can tell you who told them at what cave to swoop—God. I can tell you who introduced raven to prophet and prophet to raven—God. There is one passage I will whisper in your ear, for I would not want to utter it aloud, lest some one should drop down under its power—"If any man shall take away from the words of the prophecy of this book, God shall take away His part out of the book of life and out of the Holy City."

While, then, this morning we watch the ravens feeding Elijah, let the swift dove of God's Spirit sweep down the sky with divine food, and on outspread wing pause at the lip of every soul hungering for comfort.

On the banks of what rivers have been the great battles of the world? While you are looking over the map of the world to answer that, I will tell you that to-day is on the Thames, on the Hudson, on the Mississippi, on the Kennebec, on the Savannah, on the Rhine, on the Nile, on the Ganges, on the Hoang-Ho. It is a battle that has been going on for six thousand years. The troops engaged in it are fourteen hundred millions, and those who have fallen are vaster in numbers than those who march. It is a battle for bread.

Sentimentalists sit in a cushioned chair, in their pictured study, with their slipped feet on a damask ottoman, and say that this world is a great scene of avarice and greed. It does not seem so to me. If it were not for the

of the cases, nine tenths of the stores, factories, shops, banking-houses of the land would be closed to-morrow. Who is that man delving in the Colorado hills? or toiling in a New England factory? or going through a roll of bills in the bank? or measuring a fabric on the counter? He is a champion sent forth in behalf of some home circle that has to be cared for, in behalf of some church of God that has to be supported, in behalf of some asylum of mercy that has to be sustained. Who is that woman bending over the sewing-machine, or carrying the bundle, or sweeping the room, or mending the garment, or sweltering at the washtub? That is Deborah, one of the Lord's heroines, battling against Amalekitish want, which comes down with iron chariot to crush her and hers.

THE GREAT QUESTION

with the vast majority of people to-day is not "Home Rule," but whether there shall be any home to rule; not one of tariff, but whether they shall have anything to tax. The great question with the vast majority of people is, "How shall I support my family? How shall I meet my notes? How shall I pay my rent? How shall I give food, clothing, and education to those who are dependent upon me?" Oh, if God would help me to-day to assist you in the solution of that problem, the happiest man in this house would be your preacher! I have gone out on a cold morning with expert sportsmen to hunt for pigeons; I have gone out on the meadows to hunt for quail; I have gone out on the marsh to hunt for reed-birds; but this morning I am out for ravens.

I. Notice, in the first place in the story of my text, that these winged caterers came to Elijah

DIRECTLY FROM GOD.

"I have commanded the ravens that they feed thee," we find God saying in an adjoining passage. They did not come out of some other cave. They did not just happen to alight there. God freighted them, God launched them, and God told them by what cave to swoop. That is the same God that is going to supply you. He is your Father. You would have to make an elaborate calculation before you could tell me how many pounds of food and how many yards of clothing would be necessary for you and your family; but God knows without any calculation. You have a plate at His table, and you are going to be waited on, unless you act like a naughty child, and kick, and scramble, and pound saucily the plate and try to upset things.

God has a vast family, and everything is methodized, and you are going to be served if you will only wait your turn. God has already ordered all the suits of clothes you will ever need, down to the last suit in which you shall be laid out. God has already ordered all the food you will ever eat, down to the last crumb that will be put in your mouth in the dying sacrament. It may not be just the kind of food or apparel we would prefer.

THE SENSIBLE PARENT

depends on his own judgment as to what ought to be the apparel and the food of the minor in the family. The child would say, "Give me sugars and confections." "Oh, no," says the parent; "you must have something plainer first." The child would say, "Oh, give me these great blotches of color in the garment." "No," says the parent; "that wouldn't be suitable."

Now, God is our Father and we are minors, and He is going to clothe us and feed us, although He may not always yield to our infantile wish for sweets and glitter. These ravens of the text did not bring pomegranates from the glittering platter of King Ahab. They brought bread and meat. God had all the heavens and the earth before Him and under Him, and yet He sends this plain food, because it was best for Elijah to have it. Oh, be strong, my hearer, in the fact that the same God is going to supply you! It is never "hard times" with Him. His ships never break on the rocks. His banks never fail. He has the supply for you and He has the means for sending it. He has not only the cargo, but the ship. If it were necessary, He would swing out from the heavens a flock of ravens reaching from His gate to yours, until the food would be flung down the sky from beak to beak and from talon to talon.

II. Notice again in this story of the text, that the ravens did not allow Elijah to hoard up a surplus. They did not bring enough on Monday to last all the week. They did not bring enough one morning to last until the next morning. They came twice a day, and brought just enough for one time. You know as well as I, that of the world is that we want a surplus; we want the ravens to bring enough for fifty years. You have more confidence in the Fulton Bank, or Nassau Bank, or Bank of England than you have in the Royal Bank of Heaven. You say, "All that is very poetic, but you may have the black ravens; give me the gold eagles." We had better be content with just enough. If in the morning your family eat up all the food there is in the house, do not sit down and cry and say, "I don't know where the next meal is to come from." About five, or six, or seven o'clock in the morning just look up, and you will see two black spots on the sky, and you will hear the flapping of wings, and instead of Edgar A. Poe's insane raven alighting on the chamber door, "only this and nothing more," you will find Elijah's two ravens, or the two ravens of the Lord, the one bringing bread and the other bringing meat—plumed butcher and baker.

God is infinite in resource. When the city of Rochelle was besieged and the inhabitants were dying of the famine, the tides washed up on the beach as never before, and as never since, enough shell-fish to feed the whole city. God is good. There is no mistake about that. History tells us that in 1555 in England there was a great drought. The crops failed; but in Essex, on the rocks, in a place where they had neither sown nor cultured, a great crop of peas grew until they filled a hundred measures; and there were blossoming vines enough, promising as much more.

But why go so far? I can give you
A FAMILY INCIDENT.

Some generations back there was a great drought in Connecticut, New England. The water disappeared from the hills, and the farmers living on the hills drove their cattle down toward the valleys, and had them supplied at the wells and fountains of the neighbors. But these after a while began to fail, and the neighbors said to Mr. Birdseye, of whom I shall speak, "You must not send your flocks and herds down here any more; our wells are giving out." Mr. Birdseye, the old Christian man, gathered his family at the altar, and with his family he gathered the slaves of the household—for bondage was then in vogue in Connecticut—and on their knees before God they cried for water; and the family story is, that there was weeping and great sobbing at that altar that the family might not perish for lack of water, and that the herds and flocks might not perish.

The family rose from the altar. Mr. Birdseye, the old man, took his staff and walked out over the hills, and in a place where he had been scores of times without noticing anything particular, he saw the ground was very dark, and he took his staff and turned up the ground, and water started; and he beckoned to his servants, and they came and they brought pails and buckets until all the family and all the flocks and the herds were cared for; and then they made troughs reaching from that place down to the house and barn, and the water flowed, and it is a living fountain to-day.

Now I call that old grandfather Elijah, and I call that brook that began to roll then, and is rolling still, the brook Cherith; and the lesson to me and to all who hear it is, when you are in great stress of circumstances dig and pray, and pray and dig. How does that passage go? "The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but My loving-kindness shall not fail." If your merchandise, if your mechanism, if your husbandry, fail, look out for ravens. If you have in your despondency put God on trial and condemned Him as guilty of cruelty, I move this morning for a new trial. If the biography of your life is ever written, I will tell you what the first chapter, and the middle chapter, and the last chapter will be about, if it is written accurately. The first chapter about mercy, the middle chapter about mercy, the last chapter about mercy. The mercy that hovered over your cradle. The mercy that will hover over your grave. The mercy that will cover all between.

III. Again, this story of the text impresses me that relief came to this prophet with the most unexpected and with seemingly impossible conveyance. If it had been a robin-redbreast, or a musical meadow lark, or a meek turtle-dove, or a sublime albatross that had brought the food to Elijah, it would not have been so surprising. But no. It was a bird so fierce and inauspicious that we have fashioned one of our most forceful and repulsive words out of it—ravenous. That bird has a passion for picking out the eyes of men and of animals. It loves to maul the sick and the dying. It swallows with voracious gizzard everything it can put its beak on; and yet all the food Elijah gets for six months or a year is from ravens. So your supply is going to come from

AN UNEXPECTED SOURCE.

You think some great-hearted, generous man will come along and give you his name on the back of your note, or he will go security for you in some great enterprise. No, he will not. God will open the heart of some Shylock toward you. Your relief will come from the most unexpected quarter. The Providence which seemed ominous will be to you more than that which seemed auspicious. It will not be a chaffinch with breast and wing dashed with white and brown and chestnut; it will be a black raven.

Here is where we all make our mistake, and that is in regard to

THE COLOR OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE.

A white providence comes to us, and we say, "Oh, it is mercy!" Then a black providence comes toward us, and we say, "Oh, that is disaster!" The white providence comes to you, and you have great business success, and you have fifty thousand dollars, and you get proud, and you get independent of God, and you begin to feel that the prayer, "Give me this day my daily bread," is inappropriate for you, for you have made provision for a hundred years. Then a black providence comes, and it sweeps everything away, and then you begin to pray, and you begin to feel your dependence, and begin to be humble before God, and you cry out for treasures in heaven. The black providence brought you salvation. The white providence brought you ruin. That which seemed to be harsh, and fierce, and dissonant was your greatest mercy. It was a raven. There was in your house. All your friends congratulated you. The other children of the family stood amazed looking at the new-comer, and asked a great many questions, genealogical and chronological. You said—and you said truthfully—that a white angel flew through the room and left the little one there. That little one stood with its two feet in the very sanctuary of your affection, and with its two hands it took hold of the altar of your soul. But one day there came one of the three scourges of children—scarlet-fever, or croup, or diphtheria—and all that bright scene vanished. The chattering, the strange questions, the pulling at the dresses as you crossed the floor—all ceased.

As the great Friend of children stooped down and leaned toward that cradle, and took the little one in His arms and walked away with it into the bower of eternal summer, your eye began to follow Him, and

YOU FOLLOWED THE TREASURE

He carried, and you have been following them ever since; and instead of thinking of heaven only once a week, as formerly, you are thinking of it all the time, and you are more pure and tender-hearted than you used to be, and you are patiently waiting for the daybreak. It is not self-righteousness in you to acknowledge that you are a better man than you used to be—you are a better woman than you used to be. What was it that brought you the sanctifying blessing? Oh, it was the dark shadow on the nursery; it was the dark shadow on the short grave; it was the dark shadow on your broken heart; it was the brooding of a great black trouble; it was a raven—it was a raven! Dear Lord, teach this people that white-providences do not always mean advancement, and that black providences do not always mean retrogression.

Children of God, get up out of your despondency. The Lord never had so as He has this morning. Fling your fret and worry to the winds. Sometimes under the vexations of life you feel like my little girl of four years, who said, under some childish vexation, "Oh, I wish I could go to heaven and see God and pick flowers!" He will let you go when the right time comes to pick flowers. Until then, whatever you want, pray for. I suppose Elijah prayed pretty much all the time. Tremendous work behind him. Tremendous work before him. God has no spare ravens for idlers or for people who are prayerless. I put it in the boldest shape possible, and I am willing to risk my eternity on it; ask God in the right way for what you want, and you shall have it if it is best for you.

Mrs. Jane Pithey, of Chicago, a well-known Christian woman, was left by her husband a widow with one half dollar and a cottage. She was palsied, and had a mother ninety years of age to support. The widowed soul every day asked God for all that was needed in the household, and the servant even was astonished at the precision with which God answered the prayers of that woman, item by item, item by item. One day, rising from the family altar, the servant said, "You have not asked for coal, and

THE COAL IS OUT."

Then they stood and prayed for the coal. One hour after that the servant threw open the door and said, "The coal has come." A generous man, whose name I could give you; had sent—as never before and never since—a supply of coal. You cannot understand it. I do. Ravens! Ravens!

My friend, you have a right to argue from precedent that God is going to take care of you. Has He not done it two or three times every day? That is most marvellous. I look back and I wonder that God has given me food three times a day regularly all my lifetime, never missing but once, and then I was lost in the mountains; but that very morning and that very night I met the ravens.

Oh, the Lord is so good that I wish all this people would with the two lives—the life you are now living and that which every tick of the watch and every stroke of the clock inform you is approaching. Bread for your immortal soul comes to-day. See! They alight on the platform. They alight on the backs of all the pews. They swing among the arches. Ravens! Ravens! "Blessed are they that hunger after righteousness, for they shall be filled." To all the sinning, and the sorrowing, and the tempted deliverance comes this hour. Look down, and you see nothing but your spiritual deformities. Look back, and you see nothing but wasted opportunity. Cast your eye forward, and you have a fearful looking for judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversary. But look up, and you behold the whipped shoulders of an interceding Christ, and the face of a pardoning God, and the irradiation of an opening heaven. I hear the whirr of their wings. Do you not feel the rush of the air on your cheek? Ravens! Ravens!

There is only one question I want to ask: How many of this audience are willing to trust God for the supply of their bodies, and trust the Lord Jesus Christ for the redemption of their immortal souls? Amid the clatter of the hoofs and the clang of the wheels of the judgment-chariot the whole matter will be demonstrated.

ASSURED OF A HARVEST.

A FARMER who sows his seed knows well that at the proper time he will be reaping a harvest. The Christian laborer ought to have the same confidence. It may be delayed; the time of its ingathering may be uncertain, but at the time appointed it will be there. An incident illustrating this fact, and showing how sometimes the Christian worker, in spite of discouragements, grasps it firmly, is related by the Rev. G. O. Newport, of Madras, India. He says:

There is one field in South India where, many years ago, an American missionary was sent, to make it his station. He labored alone for ten years. At the end of that period there were eight converts. At the end of the second ten years there were twelve converts, and at the close of thirty years twenty-three converts. Then the American Society to which the missionary was attached discussed whether he should not be removed, and although he pleaded that he might stay, the committee thought that the results pointed to the necessity for his removal to another field. The old man said: "Well, brethren, be it so. You have decided that where I have spent my youth and my manhood, where I have prayed and labored, that there I must pray and labor no more. But, whether you send me back or not, there I will go; there I will labor; there I will die. Prayers have been offered; efforts have been put forth, and they must be gathering over that field, in clouds that will come down in blessing in God's own time, and somebody must be there to receive it when it falls." The chairman said: "Well, brother, if you are determined to die there, we must, in all decency, give you Christian burial," and so they sent him a colleague. The two men went back, and when the next ten years had passed away, the twenty-three converts had become twenty-three hundred, and during the last four or five years there have been added to the Church of Christ in that district four or five thousand every year, so that we have there an illustration of God's promise: "In due time ye shall reap if ye faint not."

HEALING INVOLVES HOLINESS.

In the current number of Thy Healer a testimony is printed in which there are significant words, indicating the solemn position of one who has experienced divine healing (John 5:14).

The lady who records her experience suffered from heart-disease, and being a Christian, was chiefly anxious to discover the Lord's will. She was prepared to seek divine healing if she could be convinced that it was really to be had. This is her account of her struggle: "Lord," I said, "I can believe it, if I may believe it, but I cannot take it if it is not Thy meaning. Nothing would be more delightful than to take it, if I may." Then the verse came to mind, "If thou canst believe," and, "All things are possible to him that believeth." I saw then that it was to be a matter of faith, that I might take it if I would take it, and I told the Lord that I gave my body to Him to be quickened by His Spirit. I did not ask Him to heal me; I had nothing to do with that. All I saw was, that I might give my body over to Him to be quickened by His Spirit, to be restored and strengthened by His Spirit; and as I told the Lord that I gave it to Him, it seemed as if a voice said to me, "You will suffer for it;" but at the same moment there came these words, "Fear not, for I am with thee." I thought, "You will suffer for it," "is that from the great enemy?" And then again I remembered the words, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee." I said again, "Lord, if it brings suffering?" And then there came before my mind such a rush of possible consequences. My heart was very bad, and any who have suffered from a weak heart know that it often makes you feel very ill, and if you have no remedies at hand, there is nothing so naturally frightening as attacks of heart complaint. Well, all the possibilities rushed to my mind of suffering with no relief. But I looked up above it all, and said, "Yes, Lord; even if it is suffering, I will have it." And I gave myself definitely to Him in the face of suffering. He has not allowed suffering to come. Twice after that, the day after and the day following, I had worse attacks from my heart than I had ever had; but it was a device of Satan. The whole time the Lord kept me in perfect peace, and, from that time He has been so faithful. So surprisingly glorious is this life! But it needs a very close walk with the Lord; we cannot live anyhow when we give our bodies to Him.

SIAMESE THERAPEUTICS.

DR. GEORGE D. DOWKONTT reports in his excellent periodical, the Medical Missionary Record, an address by Dr. Sturge, who has spent five years as a medical missionary in Siam. In the course of his remarks he thus described the medical system of the native physicians:

When the cholera broke out, the natives, believing it the work of the spirits, made rafts of bamboo, and loading them with fruits and flowers, sent them floating down the rivers to appease the spirits. By day they hung a yellow flag out with the family name, and by night a lantern, so that the spirits would not enter. But in Bangkok alone five hundred a day died. They have no proper medical treatment, and now he is home, there is no medical missionary in all Siam. The doctor told of the crude way of giving medicine. A lot of herbs are boiled, then prayed over, and the liquid squirted over the patient from the native doctor's mouth.

The treatment of women's ailments was terrible, the doctor remarked. In delayed maternity the spirit doctor stands over the poor woman brandishing a large knife in each hand and shouting at each pain. They believe in the possession by evil spirits. Often children are tortured to confess, by having a tiger's tooth forced into their flesh, what family's spirit possesses them, and the family named by the child is ill-treated and banished. After maternity the woman is made to lie on a hard plank for thirty days in the front of a large fire until the flesh is scorched. Measles are treated by pouring the coldest water over the body several times a day. Truly, "the tender mercies of the heathen are cruel." The doctor then appealed to his brethren very earnestly to go to the rescue. Hundreds of blind people are waiting for physical and spiritual sight. If you give them the one they will possibly be led to seek the other. Ten millions in Siam, and now no medical missionary among them!

AN IMPOSTURE.

A CURIOUS case of personation appears to have occurred in New York recently. When the City of Berlin arrived on May 18th there were two girls among the steerage passengers both aged about fifteen, and both named Susan Williamson. One of them has applied to the Superintendent at Castle Garden for assistance under peculiar circumstances. She says that when she was only five years old her parents left her in Liverpool to come to America. When she was old enough she earned a living by silk weaving, and at last saved enough money to buy a steerage passage across the Atlantic. Finding among her fellow-passengers the other Susan Williamson, she was drawn to her by the coincidence of the name and became intimate with her. She told her new friend all about her history and prospects, her expectation of meeting her parents, and showed her the letters and papers she had brought to prove her identity. On landing at New York she lost sight of the other Susan, and she did not meet her parents. Her letters, papers and trinkets, and the address of her parents had been abstracted from her trunk, and she believes that her namesake stole them, met her parents, and, aided by what she had told her, and by the possession of the letters, had convinced them that she was their daughter, and had been taken to their home. The poor girl was in great distress, as she did not know where her father lived, and is not sure, even if she finds him, that she can convince him that she is the genuine Susan. Christians of weak faith often fear that they will not be received by their heavenly Father at the end of life's journey, but their fear is not like that of the immigrant girl. They are assured that "the Lord knoweth them that are His" (II Tim. 2:19).

THE NEW JERUSALEM IN THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard, Kan.

THE PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE.

IT might be argued that there is an idea of suspension in the air in the beautiful prophecy (Isa. 4:5) "that Jehovah will create upon every dwelling-place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for above all the glory shall be a covering" (margin). This text leads us back to the journey of the children of Israel (Ps. 68:7; Exod. 13:21), and also to the return of Israel in Canaan, and gives us a description of the glory which shall be revealed, but does not prove anything to sustain the idea of a suspended city in the air.

We also surely know that "the heaven (singular) must receive Jesus Christ until the times of the restitution of all things," and that period is called in Acts 3:19 "the times of refreshing coming from (or caused by) the presence of the Lord." The heaven mentioned is placed in connection with the restoration of Israel, and not with the aerial heaven or atmosphere.

It might be farther argued that we are told in I Thess. 4:17 "of meeting the Lord in the air," and this truth will be verified before the coming and the appearing of our Lord to the mundane regions; yet it shall not stand in opposition to the words spoken by the angels (Acts 1:11), "That this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven;" neither to Zech. 14:4, 5, where we read: "And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." There is no discrepancy between those three texts, only a difference in the order of time. We have a precedent of a like trio of difficulties at the first coming of our Lord. In Micah 5:2 is said that the ruler should be "born in Bethlehem;" in Hos. 11:1, "Out of Egypt have I called My Son;" and in Isa. 9:1, 2 "that Galilee of the Gentiles should be the country." In Matt. 2:6, 2:14 and 4:13-16 we find the problem solved, every difficulty is removed, and everything is made plain.

PROPHECY MYSTERIOUS.

No person can dispute the fact that the New or Heavenly Jerusalem will bring and manifest a glory passing all description and all understanding, a grandeur extending far above our comprehension; but, conceding this fact, we ask, Is not prophecy mysterious in all its different parts? Who is able to explain the picture drawn by the king-prophet (Isa. 11:6-8), "That the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a child shall feed them. . . . That they shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain (says Jehovah): for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Shall the brute creation be changed so fully? Paul answers (Rom. 8:21), "That the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into (eis, Greek, 'with a view to,' Dr. Young) the glorious liberty of the children of God."

Who can explain the words of the same prophet (Isa. 2:4) and of Micah (4:3), that "nations shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more"? Shall the warlike, revolutionary, and hatred spirit of the nations be taken away? The Psalmist answers that question in Ps. 46:9: "Jehovah maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth;

He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear asunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire." And all this will be done in the Millennial age, when Israel shall dwell in peace in Emmanuel's land (Hos. 2: 18, 19; Zech. 9: 9, 10; Acts 3: 19-25). Not less, but omnipotence and the creative power of Jehovah shall be required to bring to pass all these events; every one of them surpass the boundaries of our imagination, and are even great in magnitude, as that kings and nations shall bring their glory and honor in Jerusalem the Golden.

TOO GREAT.

If we had been contemporaries of Methusaleh and Noah, and had been informed of the destruction to come, "that everything that is in the earth should die" (Gen. 6: 17), and also that the same earth should be renewed, would such an announcement not have been too great in our eyes? Would it not have been an enigma which we could not have unravelled? Now we are informed that "the heavens (lit., 'the present heavens') and the earth by the same word have been treasured up for fire, being kept to a day of judgment and destruction of the impious men" (Dr. Young) (II Pet. 3: 7); and also we read in Ps. 46: 2-8 an appalling description of that earth's catastrophe, and of the place where safety shall be found. Is this word of prophecy too great for us, because we do not fully understand how it shall be fulfilled? The time surely shall come that this prophecy shall have become history, and that everything shall be as plain as we know now concerning the deluge and the destruction of the Deluvian Age.

If we had stood eighteen hundred years ago in Jerusalem, and had seen Jesus arraigned before Pilate, or had seen that blessed sufferer hanging on His cross, could we have fathomed the great truth that He was the God-man bearing our sins? Should we have thought that the death of that Israelite, crucified between two thieves, should be extolled in the heaven above and on the earth below as the greatest miracle of mercy known in the universe? Where can be found greater depth of misery and untold suffering than in the words, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27: 46.) Shall we accept the truth of Christ's passion, and shall we tremble to accept the untold glory of a New Jerusalem? Let us ever keep in mind that both events are recorded side by side in the prophecies—yea, often mentioned in the same verse (Isa. 9: 6; 11: 1 in connection with 9: 7; 11: 2-10; 53: 9 in connection with 53: 12).

AN INTERPOLATION.

Before we close we have to make one remark more. In Rev. 21: 24 is said: "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it." Reading those words, "which are saved," our thoughts are directed to resurrected nations, and this gives to the description of the New Jerusalem a most peculiar, mystical appearance. Yet we know that the nations in verse 24 are a part of the men mentioned in verses 3 and 4, and that we have in those nations the representatives of the Gentiles (Zech. 14: 16). The words, "of them which are saved," were added by Erasmus, and so did innumerable editors, following his authority without further examination. If Erasmus was alive now he would no doubt immediately expunge the commentary of Andreas, which he took in as the text ("Bengel," Gnomon II., vol.). The Revised Version has omitted to mention the words added by Erasmus as being an interpolation.

CONCLUSION.

When the Queen of Sheba heard of the glorious and mighty works which Solomon had executed she was anxious to go to Jerusalem, and meet the son of David. Now, the greater Solomon, the King of Peace, will come into His glory and reign; let us shake off the dust and put on our bridal garments to meet Him, when and where He shall come, and enter into His glory.

[Mr. Tris appears to have mistaken the views of those who believe that the New Jerusalem will be a suspended city. Their idea is not one of separation but of constant communication with the earth. We are explicitly told that the gates of it will not be shut (Rev. 21: 25). Jacob's vision (Gen. 28: 12) typified the scene. Each detail of John's description applies more readily to a city above than on the earth. Three may be mentioned: He was particularly impressed with the foundations of the city, which in a terrestrial city would not have been so conspicuous as they appear to have been to him. His Jewish mind revels in their marvellous value and beauty, as if they were prominent features of the city, as they will be to dwellers on the earth. Again: the city was equal in length, breadth, and height (Rev. 21: 16), fifteen hundred miles each way—a cube, in fact. Imagine a city on earth fifteen hundred miles high! In the air it is not so difficult. Then, as Mr. Tris reminds us, the nations are to walk in the light of it, which they could not do wherever it might be located on the surface of the earth. But suspended above the world, each revolution of the earth on its axis would bring every land in turn during a part of the twenty-four hours within view of its dazzling refulgence.—ED.]

REV. SAM JONES AT INDIANAPOLIS.

TOMLINSON HALL, Indianapolis, was crowded on Sunday, June 13th, with persons eager to hear the famous Georgian revivalist. Fully five thousand hearers succeeded in entering, and many hundreds went away unable to gain admittance. The preacher was heard with rapt attention, and at the conclusion of the service many rose to ask for prayer. Taking his text from Acts 10: 2, Mr. Jones drew a vivid sketch of the character of a devout man. He said:

The first century of the Christian world produced some of the most remarkable characters of this world's history, and perhaps this man, Cornelius, was the most remarkable character of this century of characters save Christ Himself. Cornelius's character was remarkable in that it was symmetrical. It presented a perfectly rounded completeness, and, after all, a symmetrical, well-rounded character is the most charming thing at which angels can gaze. You may take one key of that piano. If it be out of tune, out of harmony, it is not only out of tune and out of harmony with every other key in the piano, but out of harmony with everything in heaven and earth that is in harmony. Put it in tune, and it is in harmony with everything on earth. Religion, after all, is harmony with right, harmony with God. Christianity sets the Ten Commandments to music in the soul. Christianity makes every good word and work in me like a chord which, when touched with the divine fingers, makes music that would charm the angels of the Lord. If I would seek the basis of Christian character I could not rest character upon the will, I could not make conscience the basis for character, but I would base character upon the affection. What I love and what I hate determined my character. If you will tell me what you love and what you hate, I will tell you what you are. Now, Cornelius, as I said, was a remarkable character in that he presents a symmetrical character, and I shall present the Scripture portrait of this great, good man, and I declare when I look upon this character as Scripture portrays him, I am ashamed of myself and ashamed of every man living upon the earth. The nineteenth century does not present such a character as this man Cornelius, and we simply hold the portrait of this man up to your eyes, that you and I may look, repent, and resolve by the grace of God to mould our future character upon his more than we have done in the past.

He was a devout man. Sometimes we say of our best character that Brother A. is a good man. Sometimes we say of Brother B. that he is a zealous man, and sometimes of Brother C. that he is a prayerful man. Sometimes we say he is a pious man, but when inspiration tells us that Cornelius was a devout man, that covers all the graces. In other words, he was thoroughly religious. He was religious through and through, and at home and abroad—everywhere.

Cornelius had made up his mind to be religious, and this is the only basis upon which you can begin to build a religious life—the mind must be made up. I like the sentiment of earnest abandonment at the altar. My brother, have you counted the cost? "No, I haven't had time to count the cost. I am going to heaven, I don't care what it costs."

The prettiest picture angels ever looked at is a home consecrated to pious influences, where father, mother, and each child is thoroughly consecrated to God. I want to say that revivals are but of an unfaithful church—understand me, now, it is an abnormal state of things in any community that makes a revival necessary, but I will say that a revival is necessary in Indianapolis. When a man will assert openly on the streets of this town that there are five thousand lost women walking these streets, will anybody say that there is not need of a revival in Indianapolis?

THE BEST THING IN THE WORLD is for every man to be the priest of his own home, and see to it that his own home is thoroughly religious. I want to see the day come in the history of the world when every father shall be the priest of his own home, the Word of God shall be read and prayed over by him, the wife and husband unite in instructing and training their children for God, and when little Mary is ten years old, or six, or eight years of age, the father walks up to the preacher, of a Wednesday night, and says: "Open the doors of the church, at our family meeting, on Sunday morning was converted, and yesterday morning, by the family altar, she gave her happy experience." Again, the same father is at the door of the church saying that "Willie was converted to God last Tuesday night, and he has rich experience in Christ Jesus." That father brings his children to God and to God's church. If such could be the influence in this country it would make a revival an unheard-of thing.

I am engaged in revival work, and as long as this world stays like it is, and parents neglect themselves and neglect their children like they do, no man of sense has a word to say against a revival of religion. You say, "We had a big revival here last year. What has come of it? Why, we are worse than we were before." Why, where do you reckon you would have been if you hadn't had a revival? That is the way to look at it.

It was but a little over a year ago, that I was at Nashville, Tenn., when the citizens of that town said to me, "We have subscribed ten thousand dollars and more to procure you a home in this town, which we will present to you if you will move here." "Well," I said, "brethren, I am just as grateful as a little-hearted man like me can be, but I have got a little cottage home down in Georgia that is good enough for me, and I am afraid if I move the devil might work it to my disadvantage. I am contented where I am."

Then they said, "We will fix
THE COTTAGE HOME."

I felt that God did that through my friends, and on the 25th day of December last we dedicated that home solemnly to God. Just like your church is—the same ritual, the same process. I did not give my house and lot to God because I thought I was good, or because my wife was so good, but I will tell you, I gave the home to God because we had six of God's children there to raise for Him, and I wanted to raise them in God's house, and I want to tell them that it is a house solemnly dedicated to God. It was the sweetest service I was ever at in my life. I tell you, my congregation, this afternoon, if every man and woman in Indianapolis, when they went home this afternoon, would solemnly dedicate their houses to God, it would be a different city from this time on.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Defeat of the Tariff Bill in the House on Thursday was not a surprise to the country. It has been evident from an early date that it would not pass. It was thought, however, that the proposed changes would have been examined and debated, but the House, by a vote of 157 to 140, refused to take the bill into consideration. Four Republicans voted with the minority, and thirty-six Democrats voted with the majority. Ten of these were from New York, eight from Ohio, and five from Pennsylvania. There are rumors that another tariff bill will be prepared, as both political parties are pledged to revision, and without making some movement in the matter they will stand convicted of breaking their pledges. The political conscience will not be disturbed by shame on that account, but those who seek re-election may have doubts about the safety of their seats if they openly desert their platform. The Republican platform pledges the party "to correct the irregularities of the tariff; and the Democratic platform pledges the party "to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests." It would seem that both parties are substantially agreed on the subject; yet the vote of Thursday is a contradiction. Perhaps the plank was inserted in the platform merely to catch votes. We hope not; that would be bad in policy as it would be bad in principle.

The Proposed Congress of American Nations assumed tangible shape last week by the passage in the Senate of Senator Frye's bill providing for its expenses. It authorizes the President of the United States to invite, on behalf of the people of the United States, delegates from Mexico and Central and South America to a conference in Washington, October 1st, 1887, to meet delegates on the part of the United States, to consider such questions and recommend such measures as shall be to the mutual interest and common welfare of the American States. One hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for the incidental expenses of the conference. The delegates of the United States are to be twenty-four in number, and are to serve without compensation.

The Fishery Dispute with Canada Assumed a more amicable phase last week. Rumors have been current for some days that the British Government was using its influence with the Dominion to induce it to cancel the instructions issued in connection with American vessels purchasing bait. A despatch from Halifax on Friday last states that the circular directing the seizure of American vessels has been withdrawn and another substituted, ordering the collectors to serve a printed warning on foreign fishing vessels; and if, after the warning, they are found fishing or preparing to fish, and do not depart in twenty-four hours, an officer is to be placed on board and the facts reported to Ottawa. This order, if it has really been issued, shows a more conciliatory spirit, and encourages the hope of a mutually satisfactory arrangement.

The Movement to Change Inauguration Day is making progress. On Friday the senate passed, by a two-thirds vote, the joint resolution, introduced by Mr. Ingalls, providing for the submission to the several States of a Constitutional amendment extending the period of the President's term and the session of the Fiftieth Congress until April 30th, 1889; and substituting April 30th for March 4th as the beginning in future of the Presidential and Congressional terms. The measure now goes to the House.

The Declarations of the Prohibition Convention of Maine last week were an indictment of both the great parties. The impression in the country was that in Maine the Prohibition law was being enforced by the Republicans, but the convention declared that the contest is not over in Maine, as both the Republican and Democratic parties contain an aggressive rum element, which aims to defeat the enforcement of the prohibitory laws. While ready to argue the question whether prohibition is a proper remedy for intemperance with those who hold opposite views, the party insists that at all events the laws now on the statute books should be enforced, and claims that neither of the old parties demands such enforcement from the officers elected. In the principal cities of the State, it is charged, there is no impartial enforcement of the law. The convention nominated Aaron Clark, of Buxton, as its candidate for governor, and proposes to make a strong fight. Their hopes of success are based on the fact that the Republican candidate is not satisfactory to a section of his party, who assert, rightly or wrongly, that his nomination was due solely to Mr. Blaine's influence.

The Marriage of Mr. Archibald Forbes, the renowned war correspondent, took place in Washington on June 19th. The bride was Miss Louisa R. Meigs, daughter of General M. C. Meigs, of the United States Army. Mr. Forbes has made many friends in this country, a large number of whom filled St. John's Episcopal Church at his wedding. His wedding present to his bride was a remarkable necklace, composed of decorations which had been presented to him by the Emperor of Russia, the Kings of Servia and Spain, the Emperor of Germany, and the Kings of Roumania and Saxony for bravery and daring on the field. He has acted as special war correspondent in all the wars of the decade from 1870 to 1880.

Lord Salisbury has Opened the Campaign on the Conservative side by a speech delivered at Leeds on June 18th. He received an enthusiastic reception, and the utmost anxiety to hear him was manifested. He appeared to be aware that his speech prescribing coercion and emigration as remedies for Irish discontent had produced an unfavorable impression in England as well as in America. He therefore explained what he meant by coercion. He said, "Our coercion, which Mr. Gladstone denounces, was directed against robbery, murder, mutilation, terrorism, and a system of organized intimidation, which made life bitter to thousands of innocent persons. All that we desire is that the law be sufficiently businesslike and efficacious to carry out its own behests. Coercion means nothing else in our mouths." In defending himself from the charge of inconsistency, Lord Salisbury said, "England sympathized deeply and rightly with the efforts of Greece and Italy to obtain independence, but they were large bodies of men, speaking with a single voice. But in Ireland you have a quarter to a third of the whole population absolutely opposed to the residue upon this identical question. You must not be deceived by the word 'self-government,' which, in Ireland, means being governed by somebody who detests you; and you tell Ulster loyalists, when you have fastened the manacles and chains of the National League around their legs and laid the rod of the League on their backs that they are enjoying the inestimable benefits of self government." In spite of the truth there is in these remarks, the American people agree with a large number of the English people that Lord Salisbury would be better employed in endeavoring to find some way of devising a system of government which would satisfy two thirds of Ireland while securing protection for the liberties and rights of the other third.

Mr. Gladstone's Confidence in the People would appear to be well founded, if we may judge by the demonstrations in his honor made on Thursday last. The aged statesman travelled to Scotland, speaking at various towns on his way, where enthusiastic crowds assembled to greet him. In London the throng was so dense that the police had difficulty in clearing a passage for his carriage into the station. He delivered an address from the coach window before the train left. It is estimated that ten thousand people were present. At Luton, Bedford, and other stations on his way there were crowds who cheered him as the train sped by. At every stoppage the train was quickly surrounded, and the Premier was greeted with enthusiasm, and delivered a short speech. His reception in Edinburgh was an ovation, which an American, who was present, declared he had never seen equalled since the days of Henry Clay. The Masonic Hall, which holds two thousand persons, was crowded to its utmost capacity to hear his address, and listened spellbound by its eloquence.

The Mysterious Death of the King of Bavaria is unexplained. On June 13th, about seven in the evening, he went for a walk with his physician, Dr. Gudden, by the shores of Lake Starnberg. As they had not returned at eight o'clock, parties were sent in search of them. It was not until eleven that any trace of them was found. Then marks were seen on the sand indicating that a violent struggle had taken place there, and near by the bodies of the King and Dr. Gudden were found floating in the water. Whether the King killed the doctor and afterward committed suicide, or whether they were both drowned in the struggle, is matter for conjecture. The King's brother, who is naturally his successor, is a drivelling idiot, who could not be made to understand what had taken place. The Regent, Prince Luitpold, will practically be King, as Otto is pronounced incurable.

The Reported Seizure by France of the islands of New Hebrides in the South Pacific near New Zealand occasioned some excitement last week. On June 17th a despatch from New Caledonia was received stating that the French man-of-war Dives had visited New Hebrides and taken formal possession of the islands, run up the French flag, and left a garrison. As this was a violation of an Anglo-French treaty, a protest was made by England to the French Government. President Grévy promptly telegraphed to New Caledonia an order that if the French flag had been hoisted it should be taken down. He also assured the British Minister that France had no intention of annexing the islands.

Apprehensions of a Revolution in Spain are prevalent. The Queen Regent is threatened from two quarters. Zorilla is actively engaged in disseminating republican doctrines, and asserts that several regiments are prepared to rise at a signal and declare a republic. Recognizing that the chief reliance of the Government is upon the army, his agents are busy among the officers exciting their jealousies and fostering discontent. On the other hand, the Carlists are steadily preparing for a rising in Catalonia and in the provinces along the French frontier. They are recruiting men and distributing arms, but it is expected that they will wait for a Republican outbreak before moving. When the Royalists are engaged with the Republicans the Carlists believe that they can interpose with success. It appears probable that the Queen will have no little difficulty in protecting the throne for her infant son.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $9. From London, Ont., $1; Denbigh, Ont., $5; Sterling, Kan., $3.

Rev. Sam Jones is Meeting with Much Success in Indianapolis. In spite of the intense heat the meetings are crowded morning and evening, and a very earnest spirit is manifested. The inquiry meetings are also thronged, and many conversions are reported. Here, as in other places, Mr. Jones is being traduced on the money question. It is alleged that he charges a thousand dollars a week for his services. Mr. Jones emphatically declares that he never made a charge in his life, never stipulates for any remuneration when he accepts an invitation, and has repeatedly declared that "if the people of a city will go in and help" him to save souls, he is willing to accept anything or nothing at their hands. An extract from one of his sermons at Indianapolis, specially reported for this journal, appears on page 391. Mr. Jones now goes to St. Paul, Minn., for a series of services.

The Rev. W. F. Re Qua Writes that he has received a large number of letters in response to his proposal to the readers of this journal. He is much encouraged by the favor with which his project has been received, and regards it as an indication of God's will in the matter. It would appear that God has called him to the work of preaching the Gospel to the Indians, but he is fully aware that his own ardent longing to enter upon it must not be accepted as positive proof of the fact. If, however, the necessary funds are supplied by Christian people who sympathize with him in his long-cherished desire, he believes that he will be justified in concluding that God is opening the way for him to go, and he will gladly set out for his field of labor. He promises in that event to send reports of his progress for publication in this journal. If, after all, he should find that he is mistaken, and the mission is not for him, he will return to subscribers the money they have sent. The matter is committed to the Lord, and Mr. Re Qua has no desire but that of obeying His will when that is made clear. Mr. Re Qua's address is 137 North Fourth Street, Aurora, Ill.

The Northfield Conference will be Held this year from August 4th to 15th. Mr. Moody's circular of invitation states that most of those who have been present as speakers, teachers, and singers in past years may be again expected. Rev. Marcus Rainsford, of London, rector of Church of England, will be present. The meetings of the conference will be held in the hall of Northfield Young Ladies' Seminary. Lodging and board for a limited number of guests will be provided in the seminary building at the rate of two dollars a day. Applications for rooms should be addressed to "H. N. F. Marshall, Treasurer, Northfield, Mass.," and should be made as early as possible, that suitable provision may be made for those who expect to be present. A general invitation is extended to all ministers and Christian workers who are in sympathy with the object of the conference, which is for Bible study and upon methods of work in home and foreign evangelization, and for the promotion of individual consecration to Christ.

A Gospel Wagon has been Started by the Central Union Mission, of Washington, D. C. We learn from a circular received from the mission that the wagon, an ordinary omnibus, containing a cabinet organ, six or eight good singers, several persons to make addresses, etc., visits three centres of non church-going people every Sabbath afternoon. Singing, prayer, and brief addresses occupy an hour at each point, when all present are invited to visit the mission. The last stop is made near the mission, and just before its evening service. From one hundred to five or six hundred persons of all ages and classes give quiet and respectful attention to the services. No policeman is needed. The attendance, especially at the Sabbath services of the mission, has largely increased. This mission is conducted by a committee representing the evangelical churches of the city. The committee are a body of able, zealous, active men, who are responsible for the financial support and the conduct of the weekly meetings.

Unintentional but Unnecessary Cruelty has been practised on a cripple who was brought last week to a New York surgeon for examination. The surgeon was in his office when a man and boy entered. The lad limped painfully along, dragging his right leg after him, as if it was a burden. The man explained the case by saying that "Dick was throwed down-stairs by his nurse when he was a baby, and he hasn't ever got over it. Seems to be getting worse every day." The surgeon picked up the boy's useless foot, and let it drop with an exclamation of surprise. "What makes it so heavy?" The father explained that it was four pounds of lead which had been put in the shoe to stretch the limb to its proper length, and added that the boy had carried it two years. An expression of pain and pity settled on the surgeon's face as he looked from father to son. Instantly he cut the lead from the shoe and had it replaced with cork before he did anything else, and then he was almost too angry with the father to speak to him. He knew something of what the boy must have suffered during those two years through the ignorance of his family. So men have suffered in soul, in our day, as they did in the time of Christ, cruelly and unnecessarily through the ignorance of their spiritual guides (Luke 11: 46).

A Child's Marvellous Escape from Death is reported from Albany, N. Y. On June 15th a lady, accompanied by her son, aged three years, and little daughter, aged eighteen months, left Olean on a visit to Boston. At Binghamton she took a sleeper on the Boston express. In the early morning she allowed the children to go out into the passage way of the sleeping car while she was dressing. This completed, she turned to look for the children. The partly-opened door and the absence of the boy told its own story. On arriving at Albany telegrams were despatched to the nearest stations to search for the body of the child, no one supposing he could be alive. Two hours later the welcome intelligence was received, "found unhurt." When discovered, he was sturdily trudging along the track in the direction of Albany, and had already covered a mile of the distance. Joy and thankfulness took the place in the mother's heart of the agony and self-reproaches she was suffering while she thought her child had lost his life through her negligence. What will be the remorse of those parents who are so engrossed with themselves that their children lose their souls for lack of warning (Prov. 29: 15)!

A Supplementary Marriage Fee was Paid to a clergyman in Connecticut some time ago. At a reception recently tendered to the Rev. Dr. Seward at New Britain, he related some incidents from his ministerial experience. One of them was unique. Dr. Seward said that he once received as a fee for marrying a couple a bushel of turnips. Considered as a fee, it was not very liberal, but the clergyman accepted it without protest. He did not see either of the persons for some years afterward; but one day the bridegroom called upon him. He recalled the circumstance to the clergyman's memory, and taking out a ten-dollar bill, he handed it to Dr. Seward with the remark that his wife had turned out so well, that he "felt justified in the expenditure." Dr. Seward congratulated him, and accepted the gift as affably as he had accepted the turnips. He does not appear to have made any attempt to analyze the mental process which resulted in the gift or to set the man right if he had wrong ideas about marriage fees. Perhaps he would have done so had the bridegroom called to complain that his wife had not turned out well, and wanted the turnips back. Dr. Seward should have resisted an innovation of that kind, lest other men, hearing of it, should also make the marriage fee contingent on the conduct of the ladies they marry. The results might not always be so favorable to the clergyman as in this case. Happily for him, he is not responsible for the marriages he solemnizes; the mistakes that are made in that matter are made by those who suffer for them. In this life, as in that which is to come, men reap as they sow, and will not be allowed to shift upon others the responsibility that belongs to themselves (Gal. 6: 5).

Good News for the Prisoners Came to a New York jail on June 16th. On that day the intelligence was received that Governor Hill had signed the bill passed by the Legislature last session, limiting imprisonment for debt to six months. In Ludlow Street Jail there are several prisoners who will be entitled to their liberty under that law, having already been incarcerated more than six months. One of them has been within the gloomy walls nearly seven years, being held under a judgment for fifty thousand dollars. They expected to be released immediately, but they were kept until the courts decide whether the law is constitutional. If the judges uphold the law, the imprisoned debtors will then be liberated. Their joy at hearing that the governor had signed the law showed that they would not be slow to avail themselves of liberty if it were offered to them. They would not act as men do in spiritual bondage, who voluntarily remain captive to Satan after they are told that Christ has redeemed them (Isa. 61: 1).

Two Puzzled Experts in a Railroad Depot in Boston recently had to seek information from an employé. A professor whose manual on railroad systems is authority the world over was puzzling over the time card on the wall of the station, without making out what he wanted to know, when the president of the road came by and accosted him. "I am very glad to see you," the professor said. "I wish you would help me out with this time-table. I cannot make head or tail out of it." The President joined in the investigation, and for some moments the pair floundered about among the figures, with no satisfactory results whatever. "Oh, I never can make anything out of these things!" the president of the road exclaimed at length. "Let's ask somebody!" And they went and asked a brakeman, who promptly gave them the information they wanted. The practical knowledge he had acquired in his daily work on the road solved the difficulty, which was incomprehensible to men whose knowledge was only theoretical. It is so in spiritual matters. It is not the simple, faithful doer who is perplexed by doctrinal difficulties (John 7: 17).

A Confession Written, but Never Signed, was the means of reclaiming a drunken workman some time ago. The Youth's Companion, describing the methods adopted by John Roach, the shipbuilder, in the management of the twenty-five thousand men he has had in his employ, mentions the case of a smart workman who was apparently an irreclaimable drunkard. Mr. Roach forgave him, and reinstated him so many times that the man himself was ashamed, and asked to be discharged. "No," said Mr. Roach, "you shall resign, but not now. I will write your resignation for you, and you must promise me to carry it around with you, and when you feel tempted to drink, to take it out, read it, sign it, and mail it to me before you take your glass. The man promised, and Mr. Roach wrote, "JOHN ROACH—SIR: You helped me when I was penniless. You gave me work when I was idle. You taught me when I was ignorant. You have always paid me well. You have borne with my infirmities over and over. But I have lost my self-respect, and have not enough regard for you or love for my wife and children to behave like a man, and I withdraw from your employment." The man touched liquor no more and was in Mr. Roach's employ many years afterward. In keeping his promise, the heinousness of the thing he was tempted to do was forced on his mind, and the temptation was vanquished. It is the heedless and unwary whom Satan captures (Deut. 4: 9).

A DAILY TRIBUTE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I will extol Thee, my God, O King; and I will bless Thy name forever and ever. Every day will I bless Thee; and I will praise Thy name forever and ever."—PSALM 145: 1, 2.

Degrees of Excellence in Family Worship—Praise a Preparation for Heaven—David's Resolve—I. A Resolve of Personal Loyalty—To God as his King—His Personal Appropriation—Four I Wills—II. Of Intelligent Appreciation—An Unpoetical Criticism—III. A Pledge of Daily Remembrance—The Sweetest Praise in Pain—A Cupboard Love—IV. Hope of Eternal Adoration.

If I were to put to you the question, "Do you pray?" the answer would be very quickly given by every Christian person, "Of course I do." Suppose I then added, "And do you pray every day?" the prompt reply would be, "Yes; many times in the day. I could not live without prayer." This is no more than I expect, and I will not put the question. But let me change the inquiry, and say, "Do you bless God every day? Is praise as certain and constant a practice with you as prayer?" I am not sure that the answer would be quite so certain, so general, or so prompt. You would have to stop a little while before you gave the reply; and I fear, in some cases, when the reply did come, it would be, "I am afraid I have been negligent in praise." Well, then, dear friend, have you not been wrong?

Praise is certainly not at all so common in as other forms of worship. We cannot all of us praise God in the family by joining in song, because we are not all able to raise a tune, but it would be well if we could. I agree with Matthew Henry when he says, "They that pray in the family do well; they that pray and read the Scriptures do better; but they that pray, and read, and sing do best of all." There is a completeness in that kind of family worship which is much to be desired.

Whether in the family or not, yet personally and privately, let us endeavor to be filled with God's praise and with His honor all the day. Be this our resolve—"I will extol Thee, my God, O King; and I will bless Thy name forever and ever. Every day will I bless Thee; and I will praise Thy name forever and ever."

Brethren, praise cannot be a second-class business; for it is evidently due to God, and that in a very high degree. A sense of justice ought to make us praise the Lord; it is the least we can do, and in some senses it is the most that we can do, in return for the multiplied benefits which He bestows upon us. Praise is good and pleasant and delightful. Let us rank it among those debts which we would not wish to forget, but are eager to pay at once.

Praising God is singularly beneficial to ourselves. If we had more of it we should be greatly blest. What would lift us so much above the trials of life, what would help us to bear the burden and heat of the day, so well as songs of praise unto the Most High? The soldier marches without weariness when the band is playing inspiring strains; the sailor, as he pulls the rope or lifts the anchor, utters a cheery cry to aid his toil; let us try the animating power of hymns of praise. Nothing would oil the wheels of the chariot of life so well as more of the praising of God.

Besides, brethren, unless we praise God here, are we preparing for our eternal home? There all is praise; how can we hope to enter there if we are strangers to that exercise? This life is a preparatory school, and in it we are preparing for the high engagements of the perfected. Are you not eager to rehearse the everlasting hallelujahs?

"I would begin the music here,
And so my soul should rise:
Oh, for some heavenly notes to bear
My passions to the skies!"

Learn the essential elements of heavenly praise by the practice of joyful thanksgiving, adoring reverence, and wondering love; so that, when you step into heaven, you may take your place among the singers, and say, "I have been practising these songs for years."

To help us in this joyful duty of praise we will turn to our text, and keep to it. May the Holy Spirit instruct us by it!

I. In our text we have first of all the resolve of

PERSONAL LOYALTY,

"I will extol Thee, my God, O King." David personally comes before his God and King, and utters this deliberate resolution that he will praise the divine majesty forever. Note here, first, that he pays homage to God as his King. There is no praising God aright if we do not see Him upon the throne, reigning with unquestioned sway. Disobedient subjects cannot praise their sovereign. Where Jesus comes, He comes to reign; where God is truly known, He is always known as supreme. Over the united kingdom of our body, soul, and spirit the Lord must reign with undisputed authority. What a joy it is to have such a King! Let others exult that they are their own masters; our joy is that God is our King. Let others yield to this or that passion, or desire; as for us, we find our freedom in complete subjection to our heavenly King. Let us, then, praise God by loyally accepting Him as our King; let us repeat with exultation the hymn we just now sang—

"Crown him, crown him,
King of kings, and Lord of lords."

Let us not be satisfied that He should reign over us alone; but let us long that the whole earth should be filled with His glory.

Note that the Psalmist, also, in this first sentence, praises the Lord by a present personal appropriation of God to himself by faith, "I will extol Thee, my God." "My God" is as high a note as an angel can reach. What is another man's God to me? He must be my God or I shall not extol Him. Say, dear heart, have you ever taken God to be your God? Can you say with David in another place, "This God is our God forever and ever. He shall be our guide, even unto death"? O beloved, if you can say, "My God," you will be bound to exalt Him! If He has given Himself to you so that you can say, "My Beloved is mine" you will give yourself to Him, and you will add, "And I am His." Those two sentences, like two silken covers of a book, shut in within them the full score of the music of heaven.

Observe that David is firmly resolved to praise God. My text has in it. Frequently it is foolish for us poor mortals to say "I will," because our will is so feeble and fickle; but when we resolve upon the praise of God, we may say, "I will," and "I will," and "I will," and "I will," till we make a solid square of determinations. Let me tell you you will have need to say "I will" a great many times, for many obstacles will hinder your resolve. There will come depression of spirit, and then you must say, "I will extol Thee, my God, O King." Poverty, sickness, losses, and crosses may assail you, and then you must say, "I will praise Thy name forever and ever." The devil will come and tell you that you have no interest in Christ; but you must say, "Every day will I bless Thee." Death will come, and perhaps you will be under the fear of it; then it will be incumbent upon you to cry, "And I will praise Thy name forever and ever."

"Sing, though sense and carnal reason
Fain would stop the joyful song:
Sing, and count it highest treason
For a saint to hold his tongue."

A bold man took this motto—"While I live I'll crow;" but our motto is, "While I live I'll praise." An old motto was, "Dum spiro spero," but the saint improves upon it, and cries, "Dum expiro spero." Not only while I live I will hope, but when I die I will hope; and he even gets beyond all that, and determines, "Whether I live or die I will praise my God."

Now, brothers and sisters, have you been losing your own personality in the multitude? As members of a great church, have you thought, "Things will go on very well without me"? Correct that mistake; each individuality must have its own note to bring to God.

Once more upon this head, while David is thus loyally resolving to praise God, you will observe that he is doing it all the time. For the resolution to praise can only come from the man who is already praising God. O brethren, do not let us say, "I will extol Thee to-morrow;" or, "I will hope to praise Thee when I grow old, or when I have less business on hand." No, no; thou art this day in debt; this day own thine obligation. We cannot praise God too soon. Our thanksgiving should echo the voice of divine loving-kindness. Before the Lord our King, let us continually rejoice as we bless Him, and speak well of His name. Thus, then, I have set before you the resolve of a loyal spirit. Are you loyal to your God and King? Then I charge you to glorify His name.

II. And now I must conduct you to the second clause of the text, which is equally full and instructive. We have in the second part of it the conclusion of an

INTELLIGENT APPRECIATION,

"And I will bless Thy name forever and ever." What is this act of blessing? Sometimes "bless" would appear to be used interchangeably with "praise;" yet there is a difference, for it is written, "All Thy works shall praise Thee, O Lord; and Thy saints shall bless Thee." You can praise a man, and yet you may never bless him. A great artist, for instance; you may praise him, but he may be so ungenerous to you and others that it may never occur to you to bless him. Blessing has something in it of love and delight. It is a nearer, dearer, heartier thing than praise. "I will bless Thy name"—that is to say, "I will take an intense delight in Thy name; I will lovingly rejoice in it."

The very thought of God is a source of happiness to our hearts; and the more we muse upon His character the more joyous we become. We would not have Him other than He is. We have a sweet contentment in God as He is revealed in Holy Scripture. It is not everybody that can say this, for a great many professors nowadays desire a god of their own making and shaping. The God that casts the wicked from His presence forever—they cannot believe in Him; they therefore make unto themselves a false deity, who is indifferent to sin. All that is revealed concerning God is to me abundantly satisfactory; if I do not comprehend its full meaning, I bow before its mystery. If I hear anything of my God which does not yield me delight, I feel that therein I must be out of order with Him, either through sin or ignorance, and I say, "What I know not, teach Thou me."

I think when David said, "I will bless Thy name," he meant that he wished well to the Lord. To bless a person means to do that person good. By blessing us what the Lord bestows! We cannot bless God in such a sense as that in which He blesses us; but we would if we could. If we cannot give anything to God, we can desire that He may be known, loved, and obeyed by all our fellow-men. We can wish well to His kingdom and cause in the world. We can bless Him by blessing His people, by working for the fulfilment of His purposes, by obeying His precepts, and by taking delight in His ordinances. We can bless Him by submission to His chastening hand, and by gratitude for His daily benefits.

Oh, that I could wash Jesus Christ's feet! Is there a believer here, man or woman, but would aspire to that office? It is not denied you; you can wash His feet by caring for His poor people, and relieving their wants. You cannot feast your Redeemer; He is not hungry; but some of His people are; feed them! He is not thirsty; but some of His disciples are. Give them a cup of cold water in the Master's name, and He will accept it as given to Himself. Do you not feel to-day, you that love Him, as if you wanted to do something for Him? Arise, and do it, and so bless Him.

I beg you to notice how intense he grows over this—"I will bless Thy name forever and ever." You have heard the quaint saying of "forever and a day." Here you have an advance upon it; it is "forever," and then another "forever." He says, "I will bless Thy name forever." Is not that long enough? No; he adds, "and ever." Are there two forevers,

TWO ETERNITIES?

Brethren, if there were fifty eternities we would spend them all in blessing the name of the Lord our God. "I will bless Thy name forever and ever." It would be absurd to explain this hyperbolic expression. It runs parallel with the words of Addison, when he says—

"Through all eternity to thee
My song of joy I'll raise;
But oh, eternity's too short
To utter all thy praise!"

Somebody cavilled at that verse the other day. He said, "Eternity cannot be too short." Ah, my dear friend, you are not a poet, I can see; but if you could get just a spark of poetry into your soul, literalism would vanish. Truly, in poetry and in praise the letter killeth. Language is a poor vehicle of expression when the soul is on fire; words are good enough things for our cool judgment; but when thoughts are full of praise they break the back of words. David speaks as if he scorned to be limited by language. He was in much the same frame of mind as Dr. Watts when he sang—

"From thee, my God, my joys shall rise
And run eternal rounds,
Beyond the limits of the skies,
And all created bounds."

III. But time will fail me unless I pass on at once to the third sentence of our text, which is, the pledge of

DAILY REMEMBRANCE.

Upon this I would dwell with very great earnestness. All the year round will I extol my God. Why should it be so? The greatness of the gifts we have already received demands it. We can never fully express our gratitude for saving grace, and therefore we must keep on at it. A few years ago we were lost and dead; but we are found and made alive again. We must praise God every day for this. We were black as night with sin; but now we are washed whiter than snow; when can we leave off praising our Lord for this? He loved me and gave Himself for me; when can the day come that I shall cease to praise Him for this? The light which has risen upon us warms all our days with gladness; it shall also light them up with praise.

Each day has its mercy, and should render its praise. Fresh are the dews of each morning, and equally fresh are its blessings. "Fresh trouble," says one. Praise God for the trouble, for it is a richer form of blessing. "Fresh care," says one. Cast all your care on Him who careth for you, and that act will in itself bless you. "Fresh labor," says another. Yes, but fresh strength, too. There is never a night but what there comes a day after it; never an affliction without its consolation. Every day you must utter the memory of His great goodness.

If we cannot praise God on any one day for what we have had that day, let us praise Him for to-morrow. "It is better on before." Let us learn that quaint verse:

"And a new song is in my mouth,
To long-lived music set:—
Glory to thee for all the grace
I have not tasted yet."

Let us forestall our future, and draw upon the promises. What if to-day I am down; to-morrow I shall be up! What if to-day I cast ashes on my head; to-morrow the Lord shall crown me with loving-kindness! What if to-day my pains trouble me, they will soon be gone! Begin to enjoy your heaven now. What says the apostle? "For our citizenship is in heaven"—not is to be, but is. We belong to heaven now, our names are enrolled among its citizens, and the privileges of the new Jerusalem belong to us at this present moment. Christ is ours, and God is ours!

"This world is ours, and worlds to come;
Earth is our lodge, and heaven our home."

Wherefore let us rejoice and be exceeding glad, and praise the name of God this very day.

"Every day," saith he, "will I bless Thee." There is a seasonableness about the praising of God every day. One morning you awoke after a refreshing night's rest, and you praised God for it; but on another occasion you had tossed about through a sleepless night, and then you thanked God that the weary night was over. You smile, dear friends, but there is always some reason for praising God. Surely the sweetest praise that ever ascends to God is that which is poured forth by saints from beds of languishing. Praise in sad times is praise indeed. When your dog loves you because it is dinner-time, you are not sure of him; but when somebody else tempts him with a bone, and he will not leave you, though just now you struck him, then you feel that he is truly attached to you. We may learn from dogs that true affection is not dependent upon what it is just now receiving. Let us not have because of His kind providence; but let us love Him and praise Him for what He is, and what He has done. Let us follow hard after Him when He seems to forsake us, and praise Him when He deals hardly with us; for this is true praise. For my part, though I am not long without affliction, I have no faults to find with my Lord, but I desire to praise Him, and praise Him, and only to praise Him. Oh, that I knew how to do it worthily!

IV. The last sentence of the text sets forth, the hope of ETERNAL ADORATION.

David here exclaims, "And I will praise Thy name forever and ever." I am quite sure when David said that, he believed that God was unchangeable; for if God can change, how can I be sure that He will always be worthy of my praise? David knew that what God had been, He was, and what He was then He always would be. Another point is also clear: David believed in the immortality of the soul. He says, "I will praise Thy name forever and ever." That truth was very dimly revealed in the Old Testament; but David knew it right well. He did not expect to sleep in oblivion, but to go on praising; and therefore he said, "I will praise Thy name forever and ever." When death shall come, it shall bring no destruction to us; though it shall change the conditions of our existence, it shall not change the object of our existence. Our tongue may be silenced for a little while, but our spirit, unaffected by the disease of the body, shall go on praising God in its own fashion; and then, by and by, in the resurrection, even this poor tongue shall be revived; and body, soul, and spirit shall together praise the God of resurrection and eternal glory. "I will praise Thy name forever and ever."

When once we have passed through and forded the dividing river, then we will begin to praise God in a manner more satisfactory than we can reach at present. After a nobler sort we will sing and adore. Methinks, for a while, when we first behold the throne, we shall do no more than cast our crowns at the feet of Him that loved us, and then bow down under a weight of speechless praise. When we rise to our feet again, we will join in the strain of our brethren redeemed by blood, and only drop out of the song when again we feel overpowered with joyful adoration, and are constrained again in holy silence to shrink to nothing before the infinite, unchanging God of love. Oh, to be there! To be there soon! We may be much nearer than we think. I cannot tell what I shall do, but I know this, I want no other heaven than to praise God perfectly and eternally. Is it not so with you? This day and onward be our watchword "Hallelujah! Praise ye the Lord!"

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE visitor admires the fitness of the architecture. "Yes," the warden replies, "this is not a house of pleasure, and so we have not made it pretty. It is not an abode of crime, and so we have not made it ugly. It is not a place where men seek justice, and so we have not made it grandiose and majestic. But it is the house of chastisement, of chastening punishment, and so it is made solemn, severe, and calm." The visitor praises the grave and silent decency of the internal appointments.

"Yes," responds the warden, "the peace and dignity of the State are here asserting themselves over the person of the prisoner who has violated them; there is no more room here for merriment or confusion than for strife."

The visitor shows his surprise at the absence of all the traditional appliances for the correction of the refractory. "Yet be certain," is the rejoinder, "a discipline sure, prompt, and effectual meets every infraction of rules. How else could we have this perfection of order? But it is a discipline whose punishments are free from brutalizing tendencies, increasing dispassionately as the culprit's passions increase, and relenting only when he has repented."

The visitor is impressed with the educative value of the labor performed by the inmates.

"Yes," says the warden, "send a man out from here with knowledge of a trade, and maybe he will come back, but the chances are he will not. Send him away without a trade, and maybe he will not come back, but the chances are he will. So, for society's sake—in the community's interest and for its safety—these men are taught certain trades that they cannot turn to bad account. We do not teach burglars locksmithing."

Yet the visitor takes a momentary alarm. "You put the house-breaker and the robber, the sneak-thief and the pickpocket, into open competition with honest men in the community around them."

"Exactly," responds the other; "trying to live without competing in the fields of productive labor is just the essence of the crimes for which they were sent here. We make a short end of that."

"And your actual results?" asks the visitor. "Of those who come here for their first offence, a majority return to honest life."

"You have a model prison."

"No," says the warden, "not yet."

SWADDLING CLOTHES.†

It is safe to say that when the gospels were translated in our venerable version, it did not occur to any of the translators that this word, "swaddling-clothes" (Luke 2:12), would ever be an obsolete word, needing to be illustrated by a description of ancient or foreign customs. And yet so it is at this day. The usage which is alluded to in this word is to our American minds entirely strange. Few things among the old-world customs, I venture to say, strike some of us as more outlandish—more pitiable, even—more entirely removed from our notions of good care and right training, than the swaddling of little, helpless babies, as it is practised, for instance, in Germany. I do not believe many American mothers can pass one of those poor little Wickelkinder strapped down on its back to a pillow by spiral after spiral of convoluted bandages, without longing to apply the scissors and let the little prisoner go free. And yet it is only a few generations since this way of treating new-born children prevailed, with variations and aggravations in all nations, even the most civilized. . . . A book published in the middle of the last century speaks thus of the universally prevalent treatment of an infant child as it had continued to that day:

"Scarcely does the child begin to enjoy the liberty of moving and stretching its limbs when it is placed anew in confinement. It is wound in swaddling-clothes and laid down with its head fixed, its legs extended, its arms at its sides. It is surrounded with cloths and bandages of all sorts, that prevent it from changing its position. It is a good thing if they do not even draw the bands so tight as to hinder respiration; and if they have the foresight to lay it on its side to avoid the danger of strangulation. . . . More wretched than a criminal in irons, it frets and cries. The first gifts it receives are fetters; the first treatment it experiences is torture."

It is obvious from the matter-of-course way in which the thing is mentioned, that when the virgin mother of the Holy Child, having brought forth her first-born son, swathed Him in swaddling bands, she was only following the ordinary custom of the country. She did the best that she knew. But now, you will ask, is it not strange that when the shepherds were given a sign by which they should know their new-born Saviour, they should be told not of something distinguishing Him from all children beside, but of something common to all the infants that were born that night in all Judea? "Ye shall find Him wrapped in swaddling-clothes. . . ."

The very question brings its answer: You are to know that He is to all appearance just a helpless human infant; the most helpless thing in the whole creation, bound and bandaged in swaddling-clothes. And if you would know how to distinguish Him from other such, it is not by His grandeur but by His poverty. There is no room in the inn for such as He, and they have laid Him in the manger among the cattle.

THE ASSEMBLY OF THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

(See Illustration.)

If the four hundred ministers who, on Thursday, May 18th, 1843, were assembled in solemn conference in the Hall of Canon-Mills could have looked in at Free Assembly Hall, Edinburgh, on Thursday, May 20th, 1886, they would have seen the fruit of the momentous step they took forty-three years ago. The vast hall crowded with clergymen, and the galleries filled with ladies and gentlemen, showed that there was no lack of vitality in the Church represented by that gathering. Only forty-three years ago the Church then founded was without property, the ministers had no stipend, and were homeless. The comfortable manses they occupied were theirs no longer, and the pulpits from which they preached were given up to their successors. They went forth trusting in God for support, and God honored and blessed their faith. Neither church edifices nor pastoral incomes have been withheld, and the Church, since resigning Government funds and prestige, has grown and prospered. The sederunt of May 20th, in number, influence, and record of work, was a notable proof that those who trust in God instead of in men have no ground for fear.

Dr. A. N. Somerville, who was chosen Moderator, appropriately selected for the subject of his address the Evangelization of the World, a theme on which he is pre-eminently fitted to speak. He admitted that the Bible is now issuing by the million in three hundred and forty languages; that twelve and a half million dollars are annually spent in foreign missionary work; that the missionaries, male and female, number upward of five thousand, while there are nearly thirty thousand native helpers at work; and that all this has taken place since 1793. But, he added, "my impression is that had the Church proved faithful to the trust committed to her, the entire human race might by this time have been reached with the message of the Gospel." With apostolic fervor and using the apostolic argument, he said, "We hail the thought of the Lord's coming. And should He come while we are engaged fulfilling His orders, 'blessed shall that servant be whom his Lord when He cometh shall find so doing.' If Christ comes soon, then the present is our one priceless opportunity before He appears, to labor on behalf of His kingdom. Let us then as one man arise, and ever lovingly waiting for our Lord's appearing, let us, at the risk of the world's ridicule, not be ashamed to say that the business immediately laid to our hand is to face the heathenism of one thousand millions of our fellow-creatures who have never yet heard the Gospel. Let us sound the trumpet throughout Christendom, and summon these millions to the rescue."

Not only in the Scottish Church but in every church assembly in Christendom and in every place where Christian men meet together ought this war-cry of the eminent divine to find a response. The time is at hand; work while it is called to-day.

JOHN BODEN'S VISIT TO A SICK MESSMATE.

In a close, ill-ventilated room a sick man lay tossing uneasily on a bed. It was a wretched place for a man to be in who was racked with pain and weary from long suffering. The blank walls had once been white, but they were now dirty and blotched here and there with damp. The stains were of odd shape, and a well man might not have noticed it; but the sick man, lying there alone, found it forced upon him with distressing persistence by his disordered imagination. He seemed compelled to find some resemblance to some familiar object in the unsightly marks, as if they were enigmatic pictures which must be solved. A large sea-chest, on which stood a pitcher and a mug, was the only furniture beside the bed that the room contained.

The hours passed slowly with the sufferer, a broad-chested, bronzed and bearded man of middle age, whose appearance was that of a sailor. He moaned and sighed heavily at times, as much from weariness as from pain. There was no other sound except the drip, drip of the rain and the noises of the street below, which were heard up there in a muffled, subdued tone. Robert Wild felt that it would be a relief to hear a human voice, even if it came from an enemy in a curse.

About noon the door opened and admitted an elderly man, whom Wild recognized not as a friend, though not precisely as an enemy. Any unfriendliness there might be between them was on Wild's part, not on that of his visitor. The two were old shipmates, and Wild had taken the lead in tormenting the man on the last voyage they took together, the ground of offence being that the man had "got religion." Wild's attacks were not resented by their victim, whose patience seemed to increase the hatred of his persecutors. But now John Boden seemed to have forgotten the gibes and taunts which Wild had lavished upon him, and was the one man of all his acquaintance to visit him in his trouble.

"I heard you were on the sick list, old boy," he said, as he entered, "and I thought mayhap you'd be glad to see some of us. It's pretty dull, I guess, up here by yourself."

"That's so, John; I was wishing I could see something beside the walls. I've been here above a week, and I'm getting tired of them. Sit down and tell me what's going on."

John seated himself on the foot of the bed and told the sick man such news as he knew would interest him—what vessels were in, what weather they had met with, what ships were going to sail, and who were engaged among the crews. That brought the conversation round to the sick man himself, and John asked him when he expected to be able to go to sea again.

Wild sighed, and said he did not know; it seemed as if he was getting worse instead of better. He did not know whether he should ever put foot on shipboard again.

"Don't get down-hearted," said John. "I hope you will soon get about again, but you are wise in considering the other possibility. That is a voyage you need to be prepared for. We have all got to take it some day, and the sooner we prepare for it the happier we are. I never was so happy in my life as I have been since I took my papers under the great Captain. When He calls me I'm ready, and it's good to feel that way. I wish you'd join; there's no service like it."

"Maybe, John; I guess you're right, but you had a pretty rough time of it. I couldn't stand what you did. You must have liked religion a good deal to stick to it after what it cost you. I should have dropped it."

"Not you, Bob; not when you found out what it was worth. You run up the colors, and you'll never pull 'em down. Religion's a good thing, anyway, whether you live or die."

"I don't deny it, John; but I've always thought it was better for a man who was going to die than one that had to go before the mast. It's a hard place. I was not a bad fellow till I went there. Now I've got so used to drinking and swearing and fighting, I guess I'll have to go to hell if I die. There's no hope for me."

"That shows you don't know. Now just listen, and I'll read you what the rules are. You'll see, if you really want to ship, the Captain will take you." Boden opened his Bible and read one invitation after another, ending with "Whosoever will." "That fits your case, Bob," he said. "No condition at all, only that you want to enter the service."

"But I'm such a bad fellow, John—though I need not tell you that. I can't think the Lord would take me if I didn't reform and quit swearing and all that."

"If you were going into Uncle Sam's service, and knew you were going to have a regular new rig out, you wouldn't wait to patch up your old rig, would you? That's the case here. All that ever you could do, you could not make yourself fit for the Lord's service. He gives you all you need. You just go as you are, and He attends to the rest when you're sworn in."

This was a new view of the case to the sick man, and Boden thought it would be well to leave it for him to meditate upon. He therefore offered a brief prayer, and laying his Bible within Wild's reach, he bade him good-by, promising to look in again the next day. He paid him many visits afterward, and had the joy of enlisting a new recruit in the army of the Cross.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Ordeal.

JULIET, in declaring her determination to quit Labrador and return to her home, showed a spirit of self-respect which would be applauded by every man and woman of the world. Had the proposed marriage been one that would raise her in the social scale, it would have been an insult to propose that she should be examined and her fitness demonstrated. As it was, the position of the wife of an unknown missionary involved a social degradation which Juliet clearly understood, though she did not feel. The old worldly pride was therefore stirred when it appeared that the question of her fitness was to be passed upon, and that a preliminary examination was necessary to secure certificates which were indispensable to her acceptance. In any social circle capable of judging of the proprieties, Juliet's resentment would have been pronounced just and perfectly well grounded.

Yet the missionaries were right in principle, though Sister Anna was deficient in tact. This was no unreasonable intrusion that she proposed. Fritz showed a becoming respect for his father in desiring his approval of the momentous step he contemplated, and that approval would be more surely gained by the recommendation of trusted friends. The recommendation would itself be worthless, and the friends who gave it would be unworthy of confidence if they gave it lightly or on insufficient evidence. Thus from the Moravian standpoint the proposed examination was perfectly fit and proper.

The question now brought to an issue was as to Juliet's own standing. If she stood with the world and self-respect continued dear to her, she would persist in her resolution; but if self-respect and all that belonged to self had died to her, then she would see her own inconsistency. Perhaps the very proposal itself, with the humiliation it implied, was a better test than any that Pastor Smidt could apply. And it appeared that Juliet had failed under it.

Sister Anna was greatly distressed. The thought passed through her mind: "Brother Smidt is only too right; he read her character better than we did." But the affectionate Moravian could not bear that her friend should leave her thus. She threw her arms lovingly round Juliet, as if to detain her, and exclaimed: "Oh, do not be angry because a good man has fears and doubts where the welfare of the mission is concerned! You know that only a year ago you were a very different being from what you are now!"

A year ago! Anna's words were to Juliet like a flash of lightning over the past. Just one year ago—yes, on that very day, at that very hour, how had she been engaged? There rose before Juliet, with startling distinctness, the lighted saloon of the lost Quebec, and the gay little party at the table—poor Captain Fincham with his gold pencil-case in his hand. She remembered her own joining in the laugh at the jest uttered by mocking lips now cold under the salt waves, at the pious scruples of Maria.

"And I, 'the worldling,'" she thought, "am offended at a missionary who has devoted his life to spreading the Gospel, one who has left five children and home behind to live and die in a land such as this, because he doubts my fitness to be the wife of the noblest of men!" Yes, Juliet saw, as by lightning glare, her own presumption and pride. She threw herself, sobbing like a penitent child, on the bosom of Anna.

"O, forgive me! forgive me!" she cried. "I am not fit to be a hewer of wood and drawer of water to such a mission as this!"

"And you will not refuse to let our brother and sister satisfy their minds as to your earnest love for souls, your devotion to the work?" cried Anna, pressing the weeping girl closer and closer to her heart.

"I will submit to whatever you think right," said Juliet, humbly; "but questioning will only show that I am not—never could be—a worthy partner for Fritz."

"Hist! I hear steps without!" exclaimed Anna; "my husband and Fritz have come back from the boat."

Juliet hurried into her own apartment to hide her agitated face from those who now re-entered the missionary dwelling, full of eagerness to hear the result of the conversation with Juliet.

"Is all right?" cried the elder missionary; the younger asked the same question with his anxious eyes.

"Juliet consents to be examined by our friends; and if they find that she is indeed what we know her to be, then—"

"Dare I hope?" exclaimed Fritz, eagerly.

"Ah! Fritz, you will have a treasure indeed!" No sleep was there on that night for Juliet; she felt that her earthly fate depended on the result of one momentous interview. She revolved in her mind all the probable questions that the Moravians might put, and could not satisfy herself with her answers. Juliet arose at midnight to search the Scriptures, but her brain was so dizzy and confused that she could not take in what she read. There was to her no resource but prayer, and she knew that Fritz also would be praying; if they could meet nowhere else, they would meet at the throne of grace. Juliet dared not compare herself with Anna or Louisa, she felt so utterly humbled when she remembered the past; so many years lost, thrown away, so much folly and self-seeking.

It was not till dawn that the weary girl sank to repose. She awoke with a heavy weight on her heart, and could hardly dress in time to obey the summons of the church bell for morning prayer. The party from the ship had already landed; Juliet felt very shy at meeting them, and dared not raise her eyes when she exchanged her morning greeting with Fritz. At breakfast Juliet hardly heard a word of the conversation going on around her; it seemed a confused murmur to her ear. Her manner was very subdued and humble. Sister Louisa said to herself: "The maiden looks more like a Moravian missionary to-day."

Juliet found her dreaded interview with the Smidts by no means so painful as she had expected. Sister Louisa, quietly knitting a sock, sat almost perfectly silent, while her husband talked on religious subjects in such a parental manner, that it seemed as if he was rather imparting instruction than sifting, as he was very carefully doing, the spiritual knowledge possessed by his less experienced sister. Juliet would have almost enjoyed the first part of the interview had she not felt anxiety regarding its result.

"Your views are very clear, my daughter; you have been well instructed," said the Moravian pastor at length. "Where did you receive these views, for I understood that in earlier youth you had not many spiritual advantages?"

"I came here dreadfully ignorant of everything religious," said Juliet, hurriedly; "any little knowledge that I have, has been almost entirely received from the friends under this roof."

"You have had a higher Teacher, my daughter; One whose lessons are often given through trial, sickness, and danger. Is it true that you formerly mixed much with the world?"

Juliet bowed her head in assent.

"Did you go to theatres and balls?"

"Sometimes—often," said Juliet, frankly, though she felt that the avowal must shock her hearers, brought up as they were, in disapproval of all such worldly amusements.

"Would you wish to return to such pleasures?" asked the pastor.

"I do not think that they would be pleasures now; I never wish to enter such scenes again."

"Yet would you not think it well to return in our vessel to England, to avoid the winter, to consult your friends, to test the sincerity of your own desire to give up the world? Our Lord Himself bade His followers count the cost. Have you fully done so? Could you not better do so when in the midst of your former surroundings? Remember the suffering involved in wintering here. Contrast the piercing cold, the deprivations, the darkness, the manifold trials of life in a Labrador mission, with the comfort, the cheerfulness, the amusements of a pleasant English home?"

"I have done so; I have counted the cost. I have gone through a winter here, and, though tried, I was not unhappy."

"But—till this matter be decided—if Fritz Edelstein was removed to some other station, would not this make you wish to return to London?"

"No," said Juliet, after a minute's consideration. "I have reasons against going back, both as regards myself and others."

"May I ask these reasons?" said the pastor.

"Sister Anna is almost blind, and she suffers so much from rheumatic pains, that she ought never to venture to the schools or the huts during the winter. She really needs some help."

"Good—good," murmured Sister Louisa.

"But do you intend to venture?" said Ernest Smidt, looking with interest at the fair, slight girl before him. "I heard that you suffered from frostbite last winter."

"I will be more careful; I will put down my veil."

"You have given me one reason, a most excellent reason for not returning to winter in England; but you alluded to more than one. You would wish to stay here for the sake of others, but—supposing the absence of Fritz—scarcely, I should think, for your own."

"Yes," said Juliet, simply; "the truth is, that I hardly dare to go back."

"You feel that you could not stand the world's temptations?"

"Not exactly that, for God would help me to bear them."

"You shrink from the tears—the entreaties of loving relatives?"

Juliet had no very loving relatives. She caught sight of Sister Louisa's sympathizing look, and felt that she might be given undue credit for sacrificing earthly affection to duty. Juliet was quite ashamed to tell the simple truth, but she did it; "I am afraid of being so laughed at," she said.

"Laughed at—yes, no doubt you would be laughed at," said Ernest Smidt, in a tone that set Juliet quite at her ease. "No doubt Daniel was laughed at when he chose to live on pulse, instead of Babylonish dainties. No doubt Moses was laughed at, when he esteemed the reproach of Christ a greater treasure than all the riches of Egypt. But would not your faith bear you up against this formidable laughter?"

"I hope so, if it were my duty to meet it; but I think that I had better stay here, if it be but—until—till someone else is sent to help Sister Anna."

"I don't think that anyone else is required," said the pastor, kindly; "I feel now no doubt that the arrangement, which everyone here so desires, will be sanctioned at home. You must forgive me if I have caused you any distress by my doubts; they have been all removed by your unselfishness and frankness. But I have seen, not so much in our own Moravian Mission as in others with which I have come in contact, so much injury done by workers marrying rather to please themselves than to promote the good of the cause, that I have become, perhaps, over-cautious. If a missionary's wife be not a helper, she is of necessity a hinderer to the Lord's work."

"A hinderer! may the Lord preserve me from being that!" murmured Juliet.

"One hears it observed," said Sister Louisa, "such a missionary is not the same worker that he was before he took unto himself a wife."

"There are the worldly women," pursued Pastor Smidt; "we have their type in Lot's wife, who was doubtless at the bottom of that good man's ever residing in Sodom. These like to be in what they call 'good society;' they must not be different from the world; they must dress well, entertain well, make advantageous connections for their sons and daughters."

"Then there are the touchy wives, who are like pieces of a dissected map, all angles and corners, or odd pieces that never fit into the proper place. These cannot get on with other missionaries; they take offence at a word—they tend to separate their husbands from their old friends. Zipporah may have been of such a spirit, for we never hear of her helping or encouraging Moses, and she does not appear to have got on well with his sister."

"Then there are the exacting wives, who must always take the first place in their husband's thoughts and attention. If one of them ails, her spouse must give up his time to nursing; if she needs a change of air, he must leave his work, however important, to be her companion in travel. Souls may be perishing, but she must be petted; she is to her husband's career of usefulness not a wheel, but a clog."

"Oh, spare the poor wives!" laughed Sister Louisa.

"I wish but to speak of one other," said Ernest Smidt, looking kindly at his wife. "I would tell of the woman who loves her husband much, but her Saviour more. She thinks of herself last, and the glory of God first. If her husband be perplexed, kneeling with his partner they together seek counsel from God; if the missionary be weary and perplexed, she has always ready a word of hope. This wife is like oil on the troubled waters, or balm on a bleeding wound; her very presence brings calm, her influence piety and peace."

"And if her husband fall in the struggle," continued Ernest, "she is ready to take the banner from his dying hand, fill his post as best she may, and show her love to the departed, not so much by wailing and tears as by following bravely in his footsteps so far as he followed the Lord!" A moisture rose to the missionary's eyes as he concluded, and Juliet felt that he was drawing a portrait from life.

There was now nothing to mar the cheerfulness of the party at the White Bear's Den, but that the circle must be so soon broken up, the Harmony, with the Smidts on board, departing for a more northern station. On its return the missionary ship was to anchor again off Eschol, bearing the all-important dispatch to the brethren in England, drawn up by Pastor Smidt, to be signed by Sister Anna and her husband. This the captain was to take charge of.

"I'll add my scratch," said the seaman, gaily, "and give a bit of my mind at home; and mind you, Fritz," he continued (Juliet was not present), "I'll not keep you and your sweetheart longer in suspense than is needful. If all be favorable, as I doubt not, I'll hoist up a big white flag on the mast; when you see it, you'll lose no time in decking the church for a wedding."

While the Harmony proceeded northward, Juliet gave much time to letter-writing, as after the missionary ship should sail for England she would probably for a year have no opportunity of corresponding with friends at home, and she had much—oh, how much, to tell! Juliet's first epistle was not written without tears. It was addressed to the parents of Maria Selden, whose place of residence she chanced to remember, and gave a long and touching account of her intercourse with her friend on board the Quebec, and of its sudden termination.

Juliet knew that her letter would be read and re-read, pondered over, wept over, and she dwelt on every detail which would soothe and interest a loving family. Juliet expressed her life-long gratitude to Maria for her own preservation, and begged that a trifling tribute which she was sending an order for might be employed in helping any charitable object in the vicar's parish that would have interested her loved and lamented friend.

This letter being closed and sealed, Juliet wrote two others, both addressed to her sisters.

The captain could take charge of both, but was only to mail the second should the decision of the Moravian brethren be favorable, as it contained the announcement of her engagement to Fritz Edelstein.

"The captain may have to burn this, said Juliet, thoughtfully; "the uncertainty is so trying—so strange!"

"I am not at all afraid that your letter will have to go into the fire," observed Anna, cheerfully. "No, it will arrive in your great house."

"And what astonishment it will create if it does!" exclaimed Juliet, as she stamped her little seal on the envelope of that very important dispatch. "I wish that I could be present—invisible—at the opening and reading of this letter!"

JESUS AND THE BLIND MAN.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 4, John 9:1-17. Golden Text, ver. 5.

Jesus Withdrawing from His Enemies—Unconcerned for His Own Safety—Will Not Pass the Blind Man—The Disciples Theorizing—A Reproof—The Works Jesus was Sent to Do—An Arbitrary and Unwarranted Limitation—The Healing Investigated—The Man's Own Avowal—Knew the Main Thing—Sight Doubly Given.

WHEN Jesus left the temple, where the scribes and Pharisees had been wroth with His saying, "Before Abraham was I am," they had taken up stones to cast at Him; "but Jesus hid Himself, and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by." But Jesus, ever at leisure from Himself, was not occupied with His flight from these His enemies. Coming into the world to do His Father's will, living all the time as a sacrifice yielded up to do the Father's will, it was His Father's responsibility, not His own, to preserve Him from danger so long as His life was needed for His ministry of love and of salvation.

"As He passed by, out of the temple, He saw a man which was blind from his birth." No thoughts concerning His own safety hindered Jesus from His

it would not have been like Him to pass this man by. Truly he had no other claim on Him but that Jesus was anointed "to preach recovering of sight to the blind" (Luke 4:18). The disciples knew the law that blindness, among other evils, was the curse of the broken law. "It shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all His commandments and His statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee and overtake thee. . . . The Lord shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart: and thou shalt grope at noonday as the blind gropeth in darkness" (Deut. 28:15, 28, 29). They had not entered into the force of their Lord's words, "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved" (John 3:17). They said, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jesus answered, "Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." Jesus did not say, "He has not sinned," nor yet, "His parents have not sinned;" but that even if they had, the point now was that the works of God should be made manifest in him. It was as much as to say, "You have not to be occupied with of this blindness, but that the man should be brought in contact with Him who opens the eyes of the blind. No sickness nor physical infirmity could have existed if sin had never existed; but the part of His disciples is not to judge sufferers, but to bring them to Jesus. Suffering is by no means always the result of the sufferer's own sin.

"I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work."

WHAT WERE THE WORKS

which the Father sent Jesus to do? He Himself enumerates them. "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them" (Matt. 11:5). Yet how many there are who say that we are not to expect the healing of the sick and of the blind and deaf in these days, although we are to expect the preaching of the Gospel to the poor! Who has obtained commandment from on high thus to tamper with the Word of God, and to divide asunder what God has joined together? Jesus continued, "As long as I am in the world, I am the Light of the world." And this in connection with the opening of the eyes of the blind! Accordingly, He who is light itself "spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay, and said unto him, Go unto the pool of Siloam. . . . He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing." "There," you see, say many, "Jesus used means and blessed them in the healing of the sick; He used the clay for the blind man, and saliva is an excellent thing for the eyes." Oh, how short-sighted is human reasoning! Surely, if clay made of saliva had in itself the property of curing birth blindness, it would be now commonly in use, and institutions for the blind would be done away with!

In this case, however, the man was healed, not by the clay, but by the Lord. It was indeed that, being blind-born, he should have been rendered doubly so by the clay, and then directed to go to Siloam. But the man trusted Jesus to tell him the right thing to do, and he did it in all simplicity, and was healed. But a great stir was raised up in the neighborhood. The neighbors began talking among themselves as to his identity; but he soon settled that, and told them it was he who aforetime was blind, and, moreover, he related the circumstances of his healing. But it was only right that the Pharisees, the great religionists of the day, should judge about this unusual matter. No one attempted to say that the man was deluded, or that he could not see, after all; but they could not make up their minds that it was quite right he should be healed. So he underwent an examination by the Pharisees, who at last discovered a flaw in the proceeding. It was the Sabbath day when Jesus made the clay and opened his eyes, so the Pharisees pronounced the verdict, "This man is not of God, because He keepeth not the Sabbath day." How would it have been if the high-priest or if one of the Pharisees had had power to open his eyes?

They had settled to their own perfect satisfaction that Jesus was a sinner, but still they could not undo the fact that He had opened the eyes of a man born blind, and they could not hinder the people from saying, "How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles?" So they that he was born blind, sent for his parents, questioned them circumstantially, and received proof that he was born blind, and that now he could see. But the parents were mean and cowardly; they knew the threat of the Pharisees, that if any man acknowledged Jesus to be Christ he should be excommunicated or put out of the synagogue—the greatest public disgrace which could happen to him—and they were not prepared to face anything which cost so much; and therefore they refused all testimony as to how his sight had been given, and said, "He is of age, ask him; he shall speak for himself."

One would have thought that at least a murder had been committed, so great was the stir, so particular the investigation in this case of the Lord's healing. But in even the present day men look at the hand of God in healing in the greatest suspicion, as something unholy and doubtful. The man who had received sight was called again, and they said to him, "Give God the praise; we know that this man is a sinner." He answered and said, "Whether He be a sinner or no I know not."

that whereas I was blind, now I see." This was conclusive to himself, and this is the testimony of such as have been brought out of the darkness of nature to see the kingdom of God, such as are born again of the Spirit of God, who know their sins are pardoned. It is with them no matter of opinion of theory; there is no supposition about it; it is a matter of personal experience, so real that nothing can make them doubt it. One thing I know, that whereas I was lost, now I am saved; and so with those who see Jesus as a Saviour from the power and dominion and presence of sin; one thing I know, that whereas I was a bond-slave, now I am free; and those who have known the Lord's touch in healing will bear this testimony, "Whereas I was sick, now I am healed; I was blind, now I see; I was deaf, now I hear; I was lame, now I walk; I was always in pain, now I am free from it."

Persistent to the last, the Pharisees urged him to give his testimony yet another time; he very naturally asked them, "Wherefore would ye hear it again? Will ye also be His disciples?" Of this they had not the slightest thought. No, no; they wanted to accuse Him who was pouring out blessings on all. "They reviled him and said, Thou art His disciple; but we are Moses' disciples." As though this assertion were conclusive, and as though to be healed by Jesus made a man cease to be a true Jew! "We know that God spoke by Moses: as for this fellow, we know not from whence He is." This was a cause of wonder to the man. "Why herein is that ye (who have had sight, and therefore the opportunity) know not from whence He is, and yet He hath opened mine eyes!" He marvelled at their ignorance of Jesus, and, inspired by the Spirit, continued, "Now we know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth His will, him He heareth. Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. If this man were not of God, He could do nothing." Oh, how we see that the touch of Jesus for healing of the body blesses the soul, too; the body is reached through the soul! The Pharisees could not answer; there was only one alternative, either to believe or to persecute; they chose the latter. Unable to disprove the words of the healed man, they said, "Thou was altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us?" And so they cast him out of the synagogue.

DISGRACED AND ABANDONED

by man, he was found by Jesus, who said to His ignorant disciple, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" His heart was already won, and he only answered, "Who is He, Lord, that I might believe on Him?" Jesus said unto him, "Thou hast both seen Him, and it is He that talketh with thee." He needed nothing more; heart and soul went out to Jesus, and he said, "Lord, I believe. And he worshipped Him." Twice blind, soul and body, he had opened to Jesus, and now the Light of the world shone into and through his whole being.

The Rt. Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE and H. C. CHILDERS—The Home Rule Demonstration in Edinburgh.

RT. HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

The British Premier.

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, was never so popular on this side the Atlantic as he is at the present time. He has in the course of his long life said some hard things of us—things hard to bear. We have been angry with him, have condemned him and denounced him, but among all the leaders of the British Parliament, he has all the time been the one man whose character and abilities commanded general respect in America. When he has hurt us most, when we have been most exasperated with him, we have felt that his errors were due to wrong-headedness, and that at heart he was genuine, sincere, and conscientious. During the past few weeks, as we have seen him bravely struggling against overwhelming opposition to settle the Irish question, we have admired his courage, and have forgiven him all his past offences. The record of

of fifty-four years in Parliament was published in this journal on January 28th. It is, therefore, unnecessary to do more here than briefly recapitulate its prominent features. He was born in 1809, and is, therefore, now seventy-seven years of age. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, graduating with double first-class honors in 1831. In December, 1832, he entered Parliament, and in 1834 took office under Sir Robert Peel. He held various offices subsequently, but it was as Secretary of the Treasury or, as the office is called in England, Chancellor of the Exchequer, that his extraordinary ability first received general recognition. He first held that office in 1852, and he held it in every subsequent Liberal Administration until the death of Earl Russell left him the most conspicuous statesman of the party, and rendered it impossible for him to serve under any leader. He, therefore, became Premier when his party was called to power in 1868, and is now enjoying his third term in that office.

Though he has given away titles and honors, and made other men dukes and earls, he has taken no title himself. He remains plain Mr. Gladstone, and apparently like "the great commoner," considers the title of "Mr." good against any title in Europe. It is generally understood that he is a poor man. Though he has had control of the immense revenue of the empire for long periods, and has wielded enormous power and patronage, with offices and titles at his disposal, he has more than once been in private need, and on one occasion was obliged to dispose of some cherished personal property to extricate himself from financial embarrassment. The knowledge of this fact has won for him unbounded confidence and respect among the people.

by an eminent writer, which was published a short time ago, is so true to the life that it may stand here as a pen-and-ink portrait of this wonderful man. "Mr. Gladstone connects the commercial—even the ultra-commercial—with the ultra-ecclesiastical element in the State. He links the school of aristocratic criticism with the school of democratic progress. He mediates between a spirited foreign policy and the soft principles of the peace, or the selfish principles of the non-intervention party. He cares more than trades-unions for the welfare of the workingmen; more than the manufacturers for the interests of capital; more for economy than the most jealous and avowed foes of Government expenditure; more for the spread of education than the advocates of a compulsory national system; more for careful constitutional precedent than the Whigs; and more for the spiritual independence of the Church than the highest Tories. He unites cotton with culture, Manchester with Oxford, the deep classical joy over the Italian resurrection and Greek independence with the deep English interest in the amount of the duty on Zante raisins and Italian rags."

This estimate throws light on Mr. Gladstone's latest effort. Its intention is manifestly grand and noble. He wants to do justice to Ireland, to remove the grievances which have exasperated her people, to give her a government under which she will be contented, happy, and prosperous; but the measure by which he sought to give effect to his principle has been encumbered with defects on which his opponents have fastened, and by which it has been defeated. That the bill would have had unhappy and disastrous results if it had been passed, we believe, because it would have produced anomalies that must have ruined the experiment of self-government. But the design and the object of the bill were so good that we can but hope that those who are now opposing it will yet cease their opposition, and assist in making it a really practicable scheme. Mr. Gladstone will then have won the distinction of having led the way to the solution of the most difficult problem in the Government of the British Empire.

THE RT. HON. H. C. E. CHILDERS.

MR. GLADSTONE'S companion in his excursion to Scotland was the statesman who is at the head of the Department of the Interior, Mr. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers. His portrait accompanies that of Mr. Gladstone on the first page. He was born in London on June 25th, 1827, and is now in the fifty-ninth year of his age. His father, the Rev. Eardley Childers, was Vicar of Cantley, Yorkshire, at the period of his birth. His preliminary school training was received at the seminary at Cheam, in Surrey. Thence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated with distinction in 1850. It had been his intention to devote himself to the study of law, but this he deferred for financial reasons for a time. At the date of his leaving the University, he proceeded with his newly-married wife to Australia, the Government of Victoria having been just established by Royal Charter. Of this new Government he was a member from the time of his arrival until 1857.

At the close of his political apprenticeship in the colonies in 1857, Mr. Childers returned to England in the capacity of Agent-General for Victoria. Upon his return he proceeded to take his M.A. degree at Cambridge, and entered upon the study of law, but was never called to the bar. In 1860 he was elected to Parliament. There he devoted himself to the task of securing better government for Australia and the other colonies. They have no representation in the Imperial Parliament, and the Colonists were aware that such friends as they had at Westminster did not understand their position nor their needs. Measures introduced with the object of benefiting them were really injurious, and thus with the best intentions they were misgoverned. Mr. Childers knew by practical experience what the colonies needed, and he labored assiduously to gain for them the legislative independence necessary to their prosperity. The ability he displayed in that work attracted the notice of the Liberal leaders, and Mr. Childers was invited to take office. He has shown general capacity for any kind of administrative work, and has been tried in a variety of places. In each he has acquitted himself with credit as an intelligent, clear-sighted, though not brilliant statesman.

Mr. Childers heartily supports Mr. Gladstone in his Irish policy. In speaking upon it in the House of Commons, he referred to his experience in Australia, and demanded for Ireland the same liberty which had been given, with the happiest results, to that colony. Observing that he had been in favor of Home Rule for Ireland for the last five years, he insisted that the bill maintained the sovereignty of Parliament and the unity of the Empire. He denied that it repealed the union between Great Britain and Ireland; on the contrary, it substituted something for it which the Government believed would be more agreeable to the Irish people than the state of things before the union. Quoting from the speeches of Mr. Pitt in 1799, disclosing his reasons for proposing the union, he contended that this bill fulfilled all the conditions then sought to be gained by Mr. Pitt, and he explained also in detail the example of the Australian colonies and Canada, contending that to confer self-government on Ireland would in like manner lead to the permanent attachment of the Irish people to the Crown as it did in Canada and Australia. Mr. Gladstone's opponents might reasonably have given more attention than they did to the testimony of a man who had actually witnessed the beneficial results of an experiment the principle of which it was proposed to extend to Ireland.

THE EDINBURGH OVATION.

THE picture on the first page represents the scene of Mr. Gladstone's arrival in Edinburgh, on June 18th. The large open space in front of the Caledonian Railroad Depot, where six thoroughfares converge, was crammed with a throng of people wild with enthusiasm. Good order and good humor prevailed, but there being no groans for the Premier, as there would have been if so large a crowd had gathered in London, the patience of the people was not put to the test. The enthusiasm reached its climax when the carriage appeared in which the Premier was seated, and hearty, deafening cheer after cheer rent the air. It was a fitting termination to the greetings which he had received all along the way from London to the Scottish capital. Wherever his train stopped, deputations awaited him with addresses of encouragement and confidence, and at the stations by which the train whirled on its way northward there were groups of persons anxious to catch a glimpse of him, and give a cheer to the "Grand Old Man." Through such a series of greetings he emerged into the streets of Edinburgh to receive the welcome of the Scottish citizens.

THE MEETING IN MUSIC HALL

was a scene never to be forgotten. The European correspondent of the New York Herald cables a graphic account of it, from which the following is an extract:

All parts of the realm were represented, even the United States, many tourists from which had expressly journeyed here for the occasion. The propinquity of the auditors was quite suggestive of the progress toward universal suffrage. Laborers bronzed by the sun sat side by side with large landlords.

I surveyed the scene from a side platform, where a proscenium box had been extemporized for journalists to see the curtain rise upon the first act of the election drama. Just as a great vase of magnificent orchids was being deposited upon a table on the platform a huge roar from tens of thousands of people, outside, unable to get any standing room, announced the arrival at the doors of Midlothian's pride.

HAIL TO THE CHIEF.

Then the audience took up the cry as Mr. Gladstone and his wife, attended by Mr. and Mrs. Childers, were seen moving toward the platform, and the roar of welcome was really magnificent when the orator's slender, tall figure, clad in irreproachable evening dress, stood erect against the table, with its background of waving hats and handkerchiefs.

He began with short breath, as if fatigued, and spoke with nervous gasps, but soon, encouraged by the stormy enthusiasm that accentuated his first sentences, his mobile upper lip folds resolutely upon the flexible lower lip, and his eyes grow keener as the orator, with increasing power and almost pathetic earnestness, alternates argument with searching sarcasm. Now the lingering twilight of the long northern day fades, and the shadows retire as the brilliant lights are turned up.

I realized at times the phrase applied to audiences—"spellbound." Now I saw scorn compressing his features as he referred to the Liberals who shirked the principle of Home Rule; then I saw an ironical smile under his elevated eyebrows when touching upon Toryism. Each time that the audience cheered, the orator, as if yielding to the physical weakness of age, rested his hands and slightly leaned his body on the table.

When he came to his peroration the Gladstone "bell" voice of old returned, the youthful play of earnestness was again recognized, and age seemed to retire. At the end of the last sentence the audience broke into such applause as one hears when, at the opera, a great diva unites vocal power and dramatic force in some grand finale. He spoke an hour and forty minutes, but seemed only half that time. Then he put on his large gray Inverness cloak, and the proceedings terminated.

THE SPEECH

was an eloquent defence of his policy, and a withering indictment of the "no policy of his opponents, and the timidity of the friends who have deserted him." Turning from them, Mr. Gladstone eloquently declared that it was in the people that he placed his confidence. "Do not," he cried, "let it be said that the nation is unequal to the task of dealing with the question. Some flinch from difficulty. Some turn their backs in the hour of trouble. Let the nation not do likewise. Rest assured that if the nation's voice be given in defence of our cause, when the contest is settled and the excitement has passed away, it will resemble the old questions of religious disability, Parliamentary reform and free trade. The people will wonder why opposition was raised. As before they forgot the opposition to the repeal of the corn laws and the removal of religious disability, so will they now forget the opposition to the change we are striving to attain."

A SIGNIFICANT HINT,

the most hopeful that has fallen from Mr. Gladstone's lips, was that which intimated his tendency toward the only true solution of the difficult question—the solution of Federal Government. It is evident that if he lives he will yet be heard advocating the system of government which has in it the promise of preserving the British Empire from disintegration. That system will be a distinct and independent legislature for each land under the British flag, and an Imperial Council for Imperial interests, in which each land is fairly represented, a system that has been in operation in our own land with a success that has extorted the wonder and admiration of the world.

A glimmering of this fact was evidently in Mr. Gladstone's mind, when he said to his Edinburgh audience: "At another time I will discuss the plan of local government for England, Ireland, and Scotland as a mode of dealing with the great and crying subject of social disorder in Ireland. The one broad, blazing, glaring difference between these countries is that whereas these are well governed, well constituted, and contented communities, Ireland has not attained the primary purposes of civilized life."

AN ELOQUENT APPEAL,

almost pathetic in its solemn earnestness, closed the wonderful speech. He said: "Reflect, each one of you, in the name of Almighty God; each one in the sanctuary of his chamber, in the sanctuary of his heart, his soul, what it is in this year of 1886, after nearly a century of continued coercion, becoming weaker and weaker, more and more odious, and less and less effective as we go along, repudiated by a large majority of the Irish members—what it is to propose coercion as an alternative to local government in Ireland. Do not allow yourselves to be carried away by craven fears, but believe that by acting justly you will act strongly. Justice is always strong. Join us in our effort to close this painful, terrible, awful chapter of the relations between England and Ireland, which for centuries and centuries has been the opprobrium of our country in the eyes and judgment of the world. Join us in this happy, yea, holy, effort, and rely upon it, if we attain our end, it shall be done more, perhaps, to the honor of Great Britain than even the happiness of Ireland."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Young Foreigner's Testimony.—At a recent evangelist meeting, a young man from a foreign country said: "Three years ago I went to a meeting in Bethany Hall, Glasgow. I did not understand what these words meant, 'Jesus came to seek and to save that which was lost.' The speaker quoted the text, 'Ye must be born again,' which made a deep and lasting impression on me. Before the meeting was closed, all those who wished to be prayed for were asked to hold up their hands. I did hold up mine, and after prayer a gentleman spoke to me, and pointed me to Christ as my Refuge. On the way home that night I resolved I would not sleep unsaved. And I did not, although Satan tempted me in many ways. I overcame through Jesus my Saviour. And now, thanks be unto Him who hath redeemed me and bought me with His blood."

Rebuked by a Swearer.—Sergeant Mathers said: "A lad who had enlisted was one day looking over the barracks, where everything was new and strange to him; suddenly he heard a young man swearing. 'Man,' he said, 'you would get on as well if you would not say these wicked words.' 'Are you a Christian?' asked the young man who had been swearing. 'Yes, I am,' said the other. 'You are not like any Christian I ever saw before, for they always knelt down in prayer to God before getting into bed, and you do not do that.' He told me afterward that it was the best thing that could have happened to him, for he had been ashamed to kneel before so many. He was not consistent in all things, but this rebuke from one who did not profess to be a Christian brought him to his right mind, and ever after he knelt in the presence of thirty men, and committed himself to God's keeping."

An Unexpected Discovery.—Mr. Calder Related: "Having occasion once to take the place of a friend in his adult class, I had to visit the absentees. One woman was in the infirmary, and was much troubled about her sister, who was addicted to drink. Often I had spoken to her concerning the peril of her soul, but with no evident result. But we are told to cast our bread upon the waters, and we shall find it after many days. I had not heard anything of this woman for some time, as I had left the place; but lately I visited the district again, and while speaking at a meeting there, a woman in the audience rose and asked who I was. On being informed, she became very much excited, for she was none other than the woman to whom I had spoken in the infirmary, and my voice and presence had roused in her old memories of better days. Before she went home that night, the poor woman met with Jesus, and yielded her heart to Him who came, 'Not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.'"

"Who Will Bid for a Young Lady?"—The Rev. Mr. Cruickshanks, speaking of the power of the Gospel, observed: "On one occasion Rowland Hill was delivering a sermon at the foot of a hill. When he was half way through he stopped, and looking at the throng he had gathered to hear him, he said, 'As I do not seem to be making any impression by my sermon I will turn to auctioneering.' And he began just as a young lady drove up in her carriage, stopping near the speaker. 'Who will bid for a young lady? What will you give for her? Who will offer the highest?' The audience stood bewildered at the turn the speaker's words had taken. It seemed to have the desired effect of arresting the people's attention, and all eyes were directed toward the carriage where the young lady sat. And then presumably addressing the devil, the preacher continued, 'And, Satan, what will you offer for her?' 'I,' replied Satan, 'if she gives herself completely to me, will give her wealth, pleasure, and everything that this world can afford!' Then came the soft whisper of Jesus floating through the air, 'I have died for her, and if she gives herself to Me I promise her everlasting life, and pleasures, and joys that will never fail.' The young lady drove home, and shutting herself in her room, she dropped on her knees, and through many tears gave herself up to Jesus, and lived devoted to His service."

An Actor's Disappointment.—A Minister Related that "a clever actor settled in a large northern city, some time ago, to make money, as he said. He was successful in his undertaking; he made very much money. But one day he fell ill, and sent for a medical friend, whom he asked to prescribe for him. 'I will,' said the doctor, 'but as your friend, I am sorry to tell you that you are in your last illness.' 'Do you mean to tell me, doctor, that I am going to die soon?' inquired the man. 'Yes,' replied his friend; 'it cannot be otherwise.' 'Do you mean that I shall never rise from my bed again; that after I have wrought so hard I am to die? Oh, doctor, this cannot be.' And as the dying man uttered these words he wept, and complained bitterly of his lot. It was not long before he passed away. He had achieved his object, and yet was disappointed. That was because he had worked for a purpose that did not satisfy when it was gained. Ask yourself what you are working for, and whether, if you gain it, it will satisfy you on your death-bed."

A Shilling Lost and Found.—"A Friend of mine went to visit a woman for the purpose of taking her a little money because she had heard she was in great temporal need, and, putting a shilling into her pocket she set out for the woman's house. But while she was there she thought, 'This woman is not in so great need as I was told; she has a little fire and seems quite cheerful! And then, to ease her conscience, she thought, if she requires the money I am sure she will ask for it.' Thus she reasoned within herself, and the intended kind act was put aside, and she left the house without giving the woman the much-needed shilling. But when she arrived home, displeased with herself for being so selfish, she found that she had lost the shilling, and she now regretted not giving it as she had intended. She paid a second visit to the woman, who said: 'The last time you were here you dropped a shilling, and I used it, because I was sure it was sent by the Lord. I had had no food that day, and I asked Him to send me some, and I was sure He would do it, although I did not know by what means.' My friend had now to confess with much shame that she had brought the shilling intending to give it, but that she had tried to keep it back, although the Lord would not permit her to carry it away."

A Blind Man's Cutting Rebuke.—Mr. R. B. Stewart said: "There was a friend of mine preaching on Glasgow Green a few years ago, when some one from the crowd called out: 'May I speak?' After getting permission, he pushed his way through the crowd, until he was standing on the platform beside my friend. 'Friends,' he exclaimed, 'I do not believe what this man has been talking about. I do not believe in a hell, I do not believe in a judgment, I do not believe in a God, for I never saw any of them.' He continued talking in this way for a while, when another voice was heard from the crowd: 'May I speak?' The infidel sat down, and the next man began: 'Friends, you say there is a river running not far from this place, the River Clyde. There is no such thing; it is not true. You tell me that there are grass and trees growing around me where I now stand; there is no such thing; that also is untrue. You tell me that there are a great many people standing here. Again I say, that is not true; there is no person standing here save myself. I suppose you wonder what I am talking about; but, friends, I was born blind. I never have seen one of you, and while I talk, it only shows that I am blind, or I would not say such things. And, you,' he said, turning to the infidel, 'the more you talk, the more it exposes your own ignorance, because you are spiritually blind, and cannot see. Dear friends, try the life that Christ lived. There you will find life and love and everlasting joy.'"

SABBATH morning finds us amid the Thousand Isles of the St. Lawrence. Amid the enchantment of the scenery some of us are like Paul when he said, "Whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell." Not having read the geologists' account of how this region was formed, I may surmise that after the St. Lawrence began its majestic roll these islands were dropped into it out of the heavenly landscape. Islands above us, islands below us, islands all around us, I am reminded how much

THE ISLANDS OF THE WORLD have had to do with sacred and profane history. Elba, from which Napoleon started for his last struggle; and St. Helena, where he ended it; Island of Guernsey, where the great soul of Victor Hugo chafed in exile until republicanism in France drove back despotism; Isle of Borneo, where Adoniram Judson stood, a flaming evangel; the Island of Caprera, where Garibaldi rested after the emancipation of Italy; Island of Cyprus, where Barnabas preached; Island of Melita, on which Paul was shipwrecked; and last of all, but mightier than all, and more impressive than all, the Island of Patmos, of which my text speaks, and from which St. John, the exiled Ephesian Gospelizer, saw the twelve pearl-gates. If God will help us, we can from these Thousand Isles, on this Sabbath morning, see the same glittering portals.

Our subject speaks of

the existence of which many have doubted. Standing on the wharf and looking off upon the harbor, and seeing the merchantmen coming up the bay, the flags of foreign nations streaming from the top-gallants, you immediately make up your mind that those vessels came from foreign ports, and you say, "That is from Hamburg, and that is from Marseilles, and that is from Southampton, and that is from Havana;" and your supposition is accurate. But from the city of which I am now speaking no weather-beaten merchantmen or frigates with scarred bulkhead have ever come. There has been a vast emigration into that city, but no emigration from it—so far as our natural vision can descry.

"There is no such city," says the undevout astronomer. "I have stood in high towers with a mighty telescope and have swept the heavens, and I have seen spots on the sun and caverns in the moon, but no towers have ever risen on my vision, no palaces, no temples, no shining streets, no massive wall. There is no such city." Even very good people tell me that heaven is not a material organism, but a grand spiritual fact, and that the Bible descriptions of it are in all cases to be taken figuratively. I bring in reply to this what Christ said, and He ought to know, "I go to prepare"—not a theory, not a principle, not a sentiment, but "I go to prepare

A PLACE FOR YOU."

The resurrected body implies this. If my foot is to be reformed from the dust, it must have something to tread on. If my hand is to be reconstructed, it must have something to handle. If my eye, having gone out in death, is to be rekindled, I must have something to gaze on. Your adverse theory seems to imply that the resurrected body is to be hung on nothing, or to walk in air, or to float amid the intangibles. You may say, If there be material organisms, then a soul in heaven will be cramped and hindered in its enjoyments; but I answer, Did not Adam and Eve have plenty of room in the Garden of Eden? Although only a few miles would have described the circumference of that place, they had ample room. And do you not suppose that God in the immensities can build a place large enough to give the whole race room, even though there be material organisms?

Herschel looked into the heavens. As a Swiss guide puts his Alpine stock between the glaciers, and crosses over from crag to crag, so Herschel planted his telescope between the worlds, and glided from star to star, until he could announce to us that we live in a part of the universe but sparsely strewn with worlds; and he peers out into immensity until he finds a region no larger than that occupied by our solar system, in which there are moving. And Professor Lang says that, by a philosophic reasoning, there must be somewhere a world where there is no darkness, but everlasting sunshine; so that I do not know but that it is simply because we have no telescope powerful enough that we cannot see into the land where there is no darkness at all, and catch a glimpse of the burnished pinnacles.

As a conquering army marching on to take a city comes at nightfall to the crest of a mountain from which in the midst of the landscape they see the castles they are to capture, and rein in their war chargers and halt and take a good look before they pitch their tents for the night, so, now, coming as we do on this mountain-top of prospect, I command this regiment of God to rein in their thoughts and halt, and before they pitch their tents for the night take one good long look at the gates of the great city. "And the twelve gates were twelve pearls."

I. In the first place, I want you to examine of those gates. Proprietors of large estates are very apt to have an ornamented gateway. Sometimes they spring an arch of masonry, the posts of the gate flanked with lions in statuary, the bronze gate a representation of intertwining foliage, bird haunted, until the hand of architectural genius drops exhausted, all its life frozen into the stone. Babylon had a hundred gates, so had Thebes. Gates of wood and iron and stone guarded nearly all the old cities. Moslems have inscribed upon their gateways inscriptions from the Koran of the Mohammedan. There have been a great many fine gateways, but Christ set His hand to the work, and for the upper city swung a gate such as no eye ever gazed on, untouched of inscription. With the nail of His own cross He cut into its wonderful traceries stories of past suffering and of gladness to come.

There is no wood or stone or bronze in that gate, but from top to base and from side to side it is all of pearl. Not one piece picked up from Ceylon banks, and another piece from the Persian Gulf, and another from the Island of Margarette, but picked up from the beach of everlasting light by heavenly hands, and hoisted and swung amid the shouting of angels. The glories of alabaster vase and porphyry pillar fade out before this gateway. It puts out the spark of feldspar and Bohemian diamond. You know how one little precious stone on your finger will flash under the gaslight. But oh, the brightness when the great gate of heaven swings, struck through and dripping with the light of eternal noonday!

Julius Cæsar paid a hundred and twenty-five thousand crowns for one pearl. The Government of Portugal boasted of having a pearl larger than a pear. Cleopatra and Philip II. dazzled the world's vision with precious stones. But gather all these together and lift them, and add to them all the wealth of the pearl fisheries and set them in the panel of one door, and it does not equal this magnificent gateway. An Almighty hand hewed this, strung this, polished this. Against this gateway on the one side dash all the splendors of earthly beauty. Against this gate on the other side beat the surges of eternal glory. Oh, the gate! the gate! It strikes an infinite charm through every one that passes it. One step this side of that gate, and we are paupers. One step the other side of that gate, and we are kings. The pilgrim of earth going through sees in the one huge pearl all his earthly tears in crystal. Oh, gate of light, gate of pearl, gate of heaven, for our weary souls at last swing open!

"When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold,
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?"

Oh, heaven is not a dull place! Heaven is not a contracted place. Heaven is not a stupid place. "I saw the twelve gates, and they were twelve pearls."

II. In the second place, I want you to count
THE NUMBER OF THE GATES.

Imperial parks and lordly manors are apt to have one expensive gateway and the others are ordinary; but look around at these entrances to heaven and count them. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve. Hear it, all the earth and all the heavens! Twelve gates!

I admit this is rather hard on sharp sectarianisms. If a Presbyterian is bigoted he brings his Westminster Assembly Catechism, and he makes a gateway out of that, and he says to the world, "You go through there or stay out." If a Methodist is bigoted he plants two posts, and he says, "Now you crowd in between those two posts or stay out." Or perhaps an Episcopalian may say, "Here is a liturgy out of which I mean to make a gate; go through it or stay out." Or a Baptist may say, "Here is a water-gate; you go through that or you must stay out." And so in all our churches and in all our denominations there are men who make and then demand that the whole world go through it. I abhor this contractedness in religious views. O small souled man, when did God give you the contract for making gates? I tell you plainly I will not go in at that gate. I will go in at any one of the twelve gates I choose. Here is a man who says, "I can more easily and more closely approach God through a prayer-book." I say, "My brother, then use the prayer-book." Here is a man who says, "I believe there is only one mode of baptism, and that is immersion." Then I say, "Let me plunge you." Anyhow, I say, Away with the gate of rough panel and rotten posts and rusted latch, when there are twelve gates, and they are twelve pearls.

The fact is, that a great many of the churches in this day are being doctored to death. They have been trying to find out all about God's decrees, and they want to know who are elected to be saved and who are reprobated to be damned, and they are keeping on discussing that subject when there are millions of souls who need to have the truth put straight at them. They sit counting the number of teeth in the jawbone with which Samson slew the Philistines. They sit on the beach and see a vessel going to pieces in the offing, and instead of getting into a boat and pulling away for the wreck, they sit discussing the different styles of oarlocks. God intended us to know some things, and intended us not to know others. I have heard scores of sermons explanatory of God's decrees, but came away more perplexed than when I went. The only result of such discussion is a great fog. Here are two truths which are to conquer the world: Man, a sinner —Christ, a saviour. Any man who adopts these two theories in his religious belief shall have my right hand in warm grip of Christian brotherhood.

A man comes down to a river in time of freshet. He wants to get across. He has to swim. What does he do? The first thing is to put off his heavy apparel and drop everything he has in his hands. He

if he is going to the other bank. And I tell you, when we have come down to the river of death, and find it swift and raging, we will have to put off all our sectarianism, and lay down our cumbrous creed, and empty-handed put out for the other shore.

"What," say you, "would you resolve all the Christian Church into one kind of church? Would you make all Christendom worship in the same way, by the same forms?" Oh, no! You might as well decide that all people shall eat the same kind of food without reference to appetite, or wear the same kind of apparel without reference to the shape of their body. Your ancestry, your temperament, your surroundings, will decide whether you go to this or that church, and adopt this or that polity. One church will best get one man to heaven, and another church another man. I do not care which one of the gates you go through, if you only go through one of the twelve gates that Jesus lifted.

Looking out at the one hundred and forty and four thousand, and you cannot tell at what gate they came in. One Lord. One faith. One baptism. One glassy sea. One doxology. One triumph. One heaven. "Why, Luther, how did you get in?" "I came through the third gate." "Cranmer, how did you get in?" "I came through the eighth gate." "Adoniram Judson, how did you get through?" "I came through the seventh gate." "Hugh McKail, the martyr, how did you get through?" "I came through the twelfth gate?" "Glory to God, twelve gates, but one heaven!"

THE ASPECTS OF THE GATES.

III. In the third place, notice the points of the compass toward which these gates look. They are not on one side, or on two sides, or on three sides, but on four sides. This is no fancy of mine, but a distinct announcement. On the north, three gates; on the south, three gates; on the east, three gates; on the west, three gates. What does that mean? Why, it means that all nationalities are included, and it does not make any difference from what quarter of the earth a man comes up; if his heart is right, there is a gate open before him. On the north, three gates. That means mercy for Lapland, and Siberia, and Norway, and Sweden. On the south, three gates. That means pardon for Hindostan, and Algiers, and Ethiopia. On the east, three gates. That means salvation for China, and Japan, and Borneo. On the west, three gates. That means redemption for America. It does not make any difference how dark-skinned or how pale-faced men may be, they will find a gate right before them. Those plucked bananas under a tropical sun. These shot across Russian snows behind reindeer. From Mexican plateau, from Roman Campana, from Chinese tea-field, from Holland dyke, from Scotch Highlands, they come, they come.

NO MONOPOLY.

Heaven is not a monopoly for a few precious souls. It is not a Windsor Castle for royal families. It is not a small town with small population; but John saw it, and he noticed that an angel was measuring it, and he measured it this way, and then he measured it that, and whichever way he measured it, it was fifteen hundred miles; so that Babylon and Thebes, and Tyre and Nineveh, and St. Petersburg and Canton, and Peking and Paris, and London and New York, and all the dead cities of the past and all the living cities of the present, added together, would not equal the census of that great metropolis.

Walking along the street, you can, by the contour of the dress or of the face, guess where a man came from. You say, "That is a Frenchman; that is a Norwegian; that is an American." But the gates that gather in the righteous will bring them in

IRRESPECTIVE OF NATIONALITY.

Foreigners sometimes get homesick. Some of the tenderest and most pathetic stories have been told of those who left their native clime, and longed for it until they died. But the Swiss coming to the high residence of heaven will not long any more for the Alps, standing in the eternal hills. The Russian will not long any more for the luxuriant harvest-fields he left, now that he hears the hum and the rustle of the harvests of everlasting light. The royal ones from earth will not long to go back again to the earthly court, now that they stand in the palaces of the sun. Those who once lived amid the groves of spice and oranges will not long to return, now that they stand under the trees of life that bear twelve manner of fruit. While I speak is passing through the gates. They are going up from Senegambia, from Patagonia, from Madras, from Hong Kong. "What!" you say, "do you introduce all the heathen into glory?" I tell you the fact is, that the majority of the people in those climes die in infancy, and the infants all go straight into eternal life, and so the vast majority of those who die in China and India, the vast majority of those who die in Africa, go straight into the skies—they die in infancy. One hundred and sixty generations have been born since the world was created, and so I estimate that there must be fifteen thousand million children in glory. If at a concert two thousand children sing, your soul is raptured within you. Oh, the transport, when fifteen thousand million little ones stand up in white before the throne of God, their chanting drawing out all the stupendous harmonies of Dusseldorf, and Leipsic, and Boston!

Pour in through the twelve gates, oh ye redeemed! banner lifted, rank after rank, saved battalion after saved battalion, until all the city of God shall hear the tramp, tramp. Crowd all the twelve gates. Room yet. Room on the thrones. Room in the mansions. Room on the river bank. Let the trumpet of invitation be sounded until all earth's mountains hear the shrill blast and the glens echo it. Let missionaries tell it in pagoda and colporteurs sound it across the Western prairies. Shout it to the Laplander on his swift sled; halloo it to the Bedouin careering across the desert. News! news! A glorious heaven, and twelve gates to get into it! Hear it, oh you thin-blooded nations of eternal winter! on the north three gates. Hear it, oh you bronzed inhabitants panting under equatorial heats! on the south three gates.

IV. But I notice when John saw these gates they were open—

WIDE OPEN.

They will not always be so. After awhile heaven will have gathered up all its intended population and the children of God will have come home. Every crown taken. Every harp struck. Every throne mounted. All the glories of the universe harvested in the great garner. And heaven being made up, of course the gates will be shut. Austria in, and the first gate shut. Russia in, and the second gate shut. Italy in, and the third gate shut. Egypt in, and the fourth gate shut. Spain in, and the fifth gate shut. France in, and the sixth gate shut. England in, and the seventh gate shut. Norway in, and the eighth gate shut. Switzerland in, and the ninth gate shut. Hindostan in, and the tenth gate shut. Siberia in, and the eleventh gate shut. All the gates are closed but one. Now, let America go in with all the islands of the sea and all the other nations that have called on God. The captives all freed. The harvests all gathered. The nations all saved. The flashing splendor of this last pearl begins to move on its hinges. Let two mighty angels put their shoulders to the gate and heave it to with silvery clang. 'Tis done! It thunders! The twelfth gate shut!

V. Once more, I want to show you

THE GATE-KEEPER.

There is one angel at each one of these gates. You say that is right. Of course it is. You know that no earthly palace, or castle, or fortress would be safe without a sentry pacing up and down by night and by day; and if there were no defences before heaven, and the doors set wide open with no one to guard them, all the vicious of earth would go up after awhile, and all the abandoned of hell would go up after awhile; and heaven, instead of being a world of light, and joy, and peace, and blessedness, would be a world of darkness and horror. So I am glad to tell you that while these twelve gates stand open to let a great multitude in, there are twelve angels to keep some people out.

Robespierre cannot go through there, nor Hildebrand, nor Nero, nor any of the debauched of earth who have not repented of their wickedness. If one of these nefarious men who despised God should come to the gate, one of the keepers would put his hand on his shoulder and push him into outer darkness. There is no place in that land for thieves, and liars, and whoremongers, and defrauders, and all those who disgraced their race and fought against their God. If a miser should get in there, he would pull up the golden pavement. If a house-breaker should get in there, he would set fire to the mansion. If a libertine should get in there, he would whisper his abominations standing on the white coral of the sea-beach. Only those who are blood-washed and prayer-lipped will get through. Oh, my brother, if you should at last come up to one of the gates and try to get through, and you had not a pass written by the crushed hand of the Son of God, the gate-keeper would with one glance wither you forever! There will be at the gate of heaven. Do you know what that password is? Here comes a crowd of souls up to the gate, and they say, "Let me in. Let me in. I was very useful on earth. I endowed colleges. I built churches and was famous for my charities; and having done so many wonderful things for the world, now I come up to get my reward." A voice from within says, "I never knew you." Another great crowd comes up and they try to get through. They say, "We were highly honorable on earth, and the earth bowed very lowly before us. We were honored on earth, and now we come to get our honors in heaven;" and a voice from within says, "I never knew you." Another crowd advances and says, "We were very moral people on earth, very moral indeed, and we come up to get appropriate recognition." A voice answers, "I never knew you."

After awhile I see another throng approach the gate, and one seems to be spokesman for all the rest, although their voices ever and anon cry, "Amen! Amen!" This one stands at the gate and says, "Let me in. I was a wanderer from God. I deserve to die. I have come up to this place not because I deserve it, but because I have heard that there is a saving power in the blood of Jesus." The gate-keeper says, "That is the password, 'Jesus! Jesus!'" and they pass in, and they surround the throne, and the cry is, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." Oh, when heaven is all done and the troops of God shout, "The castle is taken," how grand it will be if you and I are among them! Blessed are all they who enter in through the gates into the city.

AN INFIDEL LADY'S TESTIMONY.

In the Report of the Berachah Mission, founded and supported by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Naylor, at 405 West Twenty-ninth Street, New York—a locality known by the suggestive name of "Hell's Kitchen"—is the following testimony, among many others:

I seem to have but just begun the assigned purpose of my life; reared from my birth in another faith, I had religious training; my feet were not upon the rock, not having the loving Saviour to lean upon; impulse was generally my basis of conduct; troubles came, I rebelled; impatient at another's errors, I vented manifold curses upon both mankind and Jehovah Himself. Thus passed whole years. I drifted into unbelief and infidelity, and was teaching these doctrines to a class of young ladies. To gratify my dear husband, and much against my own will, on the evening of April 7th I went with him to the Gospel services at Berachah Mission; there I became fully conscious of my sins, and like a sunburst the revealed glory of a loving Saviour came to my heart, bringing peace to my troubled soul. I felt like Bunyan's Christian at the foot of the cross. All my burden was lightened, peace, joy, and gladness unutterable took complete possession of me. It so overpowered me with ecstatic bliss that I, the chief of sinners, had been taken to the bosom of a loving, pardoning, forgiving Saviour and Redeemer. I have much more to tell of my long-continued fears, doubts, and misgivings, but will now thus give all thanks, and raise my feeble voice to praise the Lord for all His goodness. Jesus is mighty to save, to keep, sanctify, and heal.

THE CAMBRIDGE STUDENTS IN CHINA.

A FEW incidents of a journey in China taken by the devoted young men who were graduates of the University of Cambridge, but are now engaged as missionaries to the Chinese, are reported in a letter from one of the party to the Indian Witness. The writer says: We have had many accidents, but the Lord was ever at hand and delivered us. The first six weeks it was not altogether comfortable to take a constitutional, as having one's pig-tail pulled and having stones thrown was a frequent result; but later on the people got more civil; we had some narrow shaves of annihilation; on one occasion a big landslide from a high bank came right down on our boat, nearly but not quite swamping us, and causing a stoppage of two whole days in which to repair; then at Hing-ngan we had a serious affair: some of our boatmen (Chinese) got a quarrel with some of the lookers-on; the latter on a high bank began to throw stones: they threw not merely stones but brickbats into our boats; they came like a shower of hail, thud! thud! thud! They struck, yet the Lord delivered us, caused nobody to be hit, and the boats to be but little damaged, praise the Lord! The rats we found a little trying, for they not only stole handkerchiefs and stocks and carried them off to their nest in the bottom of the boat, where we presently found them, but they would run over us of a night, sometimes over our faces, causing unpleasant sensations; however, we had good things also, good swims frequently, and peaches to any amount.

MR. R. T. BOOTH IN AUSTRALIA.

THE Warrnambool Independent of April 10th gives the following account of Mr. Booth's mission in New South Wales: On Thursday night, April 8th, the Orderly Room was no less crowded than it had been on any of the preceding evenings. Mr. Booth's war lecture "took," and deservedly so, as it well merited all the attention and applause which the audience bestowed upon it. He told the story of his experience throughout the great American civil war with a mixture of simplicity, pathos, and spirit which well became the subject, nor did a single point fall flat. The lecture brought out prominently woman's worth in life, and we venture to say that if the majority of men only placed the same value upon the gentler sex, especially upon the influence for good of wives and mothers, the moral tone of society would very quickly improve. His war incidents were thrilling, truthful to history, and well pointed, while throughout the whole there was an artistic alternation of glory and gloom. In conclusion he propounded his personal views upon the federation of the English-speaking people of the earth, but in doing so, and even while he raised the enthusiasm of a sympathetic audience to the utmost, he was careful to announce himself as a dreamer rather than a practical man. He was practical enough on the subject of "Gospel temperance," however, and the result was a considerable acquisition to the number of pledge-takers.

CHRISTIAN LADIES IN MEMPHIS JAIL.

A GOOD work among prisoners, and patients in the hospitals is being done in Memphis, Tenn., by a few devoted young ladies, who are using the opportunities God has placed in their way to tell the good tidings of salvation to those who are sick and in prison. Miss S. C. Bateham sends to the American Missionary the following incidents of one of her visits:

One day I carried with me to the jail a number of worn Bibles and Testaments for distribution. One was gratefully accepted by a young man, who in that place had signified a wish to become a Christian. Another man took his, remarking thoughtfully, "I used to read one of those when I was a boy. Thank you, ma'am." One old man seized in both hands the one offered him, exclaiming, "Bless the Lord! How I've wanted one of these books!" I became quite interested in a young lad whose pleasant countenance spoke of sadness but no viciousness. I learned that a year ago, fired with a boy's ideal of making his way in life, he had wandered away from a good home and Christian parents in Cincinnati. In this city of strangers he had fallen into bad company, and now was awaiting his trial. The next Sabbath I learned that the sentence had been given, and he was soon to be taken to State prison for one year's confinement. He very gratefully accepted a pocket Testament to take with him, and with tears in his eyes assured me, "I'll be a different kind of a fellow if I live to get out of that." And the last thing I saw as we left the great stone court was his wistful face, nodding a long good-by. It will seem a long year to those praying parents in their distant home.

A KNIFE-GRINDER'S MISTAKE.

IN undertaking Christian work, it is quite as important to beware of acting on impulse and running where God has not called as of being laggards slow to hear and obey the voice of the Lord. An instance in point is narrated in the current number of Thy Healer.

An itinerant knife-grinder whom the Lord brought to Himself, began preaching the Gospel, and was greatly blessed as he went round with his knife-grinding machine. After awhile, through various circumstances, he came to think he was called to live by faith, and to do nothing else but to preach the Gospel. He commenced in a small village where there were a few Christians, about half a dozen, who gathered round him. It was utterly impossible for these Christians to support him, because they were agricultural laborers. He went on in this way for a little while, without any tokens of God's blessing. His own wife and children were really wanting food, yet he did not see his mistake. A Christian lady went down there, and saw the whole thing. She saw that he had missed God's will and mistaken his calling. She wrote to him, and the Lord touched his heart, and opened his eyes, and directly he turned round to resume his former occupation, all was well. He had sold his apparatus, and had not a shilling to start with; but as soon as he saw and came into the will of God, friends were raised up to buy an apparatus, and God began to bless him in preaching the Gospel as He gave him opportunity.

The mistake made by him was in throwing up his daily occupation, when the Lord had barred every way. He was not glorified, for people had been talking about it, and saying the man was sponging upon the few Christians who were pinching themselves to keep him.

THE COMING THEOCRACY.

By Henry Varley.

Human Incapacity for Government—The Experiments of the Centuries—Ignominious Failure—Ancient Governments—The Europe of to-day—The Grand American Effort—Its Complex Elements—Lawlessness Rampant—God about to Close the Chapter—He who will Reign in Righteousness.

It appears to me that, as we look back upon human history, conclusive proof exists that the living God has been permitting the sons of men the opportunity of proving to themselves their unfitness either for personal independence or national government. For six thousand years nearly man has been tried and tested in every conceivable condition. From the most degrading heathenism of the dark past on the one hand, to the highest manifestations of nineteenth century civilization on the other, man has had place, part, and opportunity. We unhesitatingly affirm that on all hands man has proved and failure. I do not deny that there have been large numbers of individual exceptions to the rule, exceptions, be it remembered, induced through the restraining grace and Word of God. I am speaking of human history in its vast majorities, in every century, throughout the habitable earth. From the standpoint of righteous judgment, national life and character has been, and continues to be, a melancholy disappointment. I am simply appealing to when I say that the development of national life has never produced righteousness. Has it done this, either in ancient or modern times? Let Babylon, Egypt, or Israel, up to date, answer. Let Greece or Rome give evidence. Is Europe at the close of the nineteenth century the abode of truth and righteousness? Are the nations ashamed of sin? Is it possible to identify

e. g., each European nation armed to the teeth, and, as a whole, ready to put ten millions of soldiers on the field of slaughter, as having anything in common with the will of God? When our Lord Jesus Christ reigns in power and great glory, as He assuredly will, "the nations will learn war no more."

Is it not the fact that national history has been a pitiable spectacle and a splendid failure? Nation has risen against nation, kingdom against kingdom, ruthless ambitions and devastating wars have been the rule. From the days of Nebuchadnezzar, the great despotic king, right onward through monarchical and constitutional governments of modern times, the same testimony of violence, corruption, and failure comes; six thousand years of human rule is closing amid universal disquiet, unrest, and fear. Not a single European government rules in righteousness today!

Then, too, it is important to bear in mind that there is no form of government possible to man which has not been tried. Notice the remarkable fact that the verge of the last century of the sixth thousand years (the limit, as I believe, of man's trial in regard to fitness for government) sees yielding the latest exhibition of national life in a manifold and complex sense. English, German, Irish, French, Italian, Chinese, Asian and African, indeed all Old World national life, is being incorporated in the structure of the United States Republic. Can this latest manifestation of human government be pronounced a success? Are the great cities of the United States eminent for righteousness and the diminution of iniquity? Is it not true that the drift of government in the New World is not the way of God? Far be it from me to speak ungenerously of a great people among whom I love to preach Christ; but I cannot say that I have returned to England enamored of AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

In the year 1884 no less than thirty-three hundred and seventy-seven men and women were murdered. This is an appalling fact, indicating a condition of lawlessness and a disregard of the sacredness of human life alike fearful and terrible. Not less alarming is the fact that one hundred and eleven only of these murderers suffered the penalty of the divine law. In one large city a prominent judge told me that the year 1884 yielded no less than three Divorce Court cases a day; in round numbers, eleven hundred cases of divorce in that section of the population, which does not exceed one hundred thousand men and women. Preaching in one of the prisons of the city, I counted twenty-three murderers in one row of cells.

In the light of these facts, can it be contended that the latter end of the nineteenth century shows man to be improving or approximating to good government? Can we wonder that God is about to close the long and dark chapter of human iniquity? Shall we not adore His wisdom and goodness in that He has invested all governmental power and authority in His blessed Son, who, as Paul puts it, "in His times shall show who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords"? (1 Tim. 6: 14, 15).

THE GREAT CRISIS DRAWS NEAR

when the Lord Jesus Christ shall "dash in pieces like a potter's vessel" existing governmental power (Ps. 2: 9; Rev. 2: 27). We are looking for the fulfilment of the words of the Prophet Daniel, "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and break them in pieces . . . and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth" (Dan. 2: 34, 35). We await with intense expectancy the supreme crisis of which the everlasting Word thus speaks, "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in Heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our God, and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever" (Rev. 11: 15).

The world smiles at such an expectation. The Apostle Peter, speaking of the last days of this wicked and adulterous age, says, that "there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as from the beginning of the creation." Their objection to the truth of the Lord's coming, you will notice, is described as an outcome of lust, not the lust of the flesh, but of the mind, the scoffer's jest. That is what we see. The Materialists regard our strong confidence in the personal appearing of our Lord as the delusion of childish minds, minds without intellectual growth, children in the sense of weakness and non-discernment of "the great strides which humanity is making." Our strong confidence in excites the smile of pity; they neither care for these things, nor do they believe them. But all the scoffers and doubters will be silenced by the wonders which will take place when He comes whose right it is to reign. There will be no room for the scoffer's ribald jest then, "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God."

May we not console ourselves and rejoice in the prospect described in the prophetic words of the Seventy-second Psalm concerning the reign of Christ, "In His days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him, all nations shall worship Him. His name shall endure forever. His name shall be continued as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in Him. All nations shall call Him blessed, and blessed be His glorious name forever; and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen, and amen."

THE FATAL VIRUS.

From a Sermon preached by Rev. Sam Jones at Indianapolis.

(Specially Reported for the Christian Herald.)

"As righteousness tendeth to life; so he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death."—PROV. 11: 19.

REALLY, brethren, I need no Bible or preacher to convince me that sin will ruin a man. I can walk the streets of the city of Indianapolis twenty-four hours and find living, that sin is ruining, that sin is dooming, not only individuals, but whole families in this city. Every poor, drunken wretch that staggers along the streets of your city looks out of his bleared eyes and tells me sin is ruining him. Every thin, pale, halting woman, whose character is gone forever, as she gazes at me in her lost estate, tells me too plainly, "I am ruined; I am lost, world without end." Brethren, it is sin that dooms and sin that damns, and the duration of hell will be determined by the duration of sin, of unpardoned sin. If you will tell me how long that lie you told yesterday will last, I will tell you how long hell will endure; if you will tell me how long that act of murder committed will live in the annals of history, I will tell you how long the punishment for that crime will last, brother, for all sin is the very essence of hell; and when I am delivered from sin I am delivered from hell. It is sin I fear, and whatever there is in hell is the natural, legitimate consequences of sin.

WALKING DEMONSTRATIONS

I rode in my buggy only two miles from my own town, some months ago, at the request and earnest solicitations of

A WIFE AND MOTHER.

When I walked up on the front porch, the wife met me, and the little children—six of them—stood around the mother and the wife, and the children with the tears running from their eyes. They looked up in my face, and I spoke to them. I thought in my heart, "Oh, what is the trouble? What is the matter?" I walked into the hall and passed the first door and entered the second door, the wife leading the way, and when we walked into the room there was the poor, besotted, drunken husband lying on his bed; and when I looked at him and looked at his family, I said in my heart, "Oh, God! Sin is dooming and sin is damning this whole family; they are being dragged down to death—down to death and hell by the sin of the father." And we say to you, brother, that the natural, legitimate end of a wicked life is hell—of a good life is heaven. Now, as righteousness tendeth to life, so he that pursueth evil, pursueth it to his own death.

I have not time or disposition to-night to stand here and discuss the meaning of this word "evil" in the text. Brethren, I am no theologian; I never aspired to be one; but I will say this to you: whether depravity is partial or total, or simply developed, this much I can look in the face of every man and tell him, "You have got enough natural meanness in you to damn you, and if you ever want any more than that, you are greedier than ever I have been." I am conscious I can say that to every man, and that is the truth of this whole question. Leaving the theological hair-splitting out of the question, all that a man needs to do is to follow the natural bent and tendencies of his own wicked nature. Sin is an awful thing. It is a disease as well as a fearfully wicked life.

When Senator Hill, of our State, of national reputation, the most gifted orator the South ever produced, had some trouble on the side of his tongue, they made light of it, and said it was caused by a fractured tooth. A few more days, and I read that he had been under the knife of

and they had cut out about one third of the tongue. The next I read they said, "He will soon recover." Again I read, "He is back under the knife of the surgeon at Philadelphia;" they had taken all the glands out of this side of his face and neck; and a son of the Senator said, "Now, doctor, is there any chance for my father?" The doctor said, "Yes, sir; if we have extracted all that virus of cancer from his system he will certainly get well; but if there is the least particle of that virus of cancer that has strayed off into some other gland he will certainly die." A few more days and I read he was at the famous mineral springs in the West. A few more days and I walked down to the depot of my town; I was standing there waiting for the passenger train. In a few moments it rolled down and, trembling under its air-brakes, stopped, and I thought I saw the outlines of Senator Hill's face as I looked through the car window. I walked down toward the car, and he pushed his bony hand out through the window and took my hand, and I looked him in the face, and I thought to myself, "Is this all that is left of Senator Hill, the grandest man that this State ever produced on the forum or rostrum?" In a few more days I picked up the Atlanta Constitution. It said Senator Hill's remains were carried to the cemetery and followed by the grandest procession that ever marched out of Atlanta to the cemetery.

IT KILLS.

Now, my brother and my sister, hear me. Just as certain as the virus of cancer killed Senator Hill's body, just that certain the virus of the cancer of sin will kill your soul at last, and it is not a question of where you have been baptized. Understand that. It is not a question of what church you belong to. It is not a question of your official capacity in that church. It is not a question of how much you pay to maintain that church. The question for time and eternity is, Have you been down under the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, and has this taint been washed out of your nature, and have you been redeemed by the only remedy in heaven or on earth that can cure the human soul? I say the natural tendency of men and of man is downward and hellward. If you follow your greed for gold, your licentious passions, your wayward life—if you follow it, you just as naturally and legitimately tend toward hell as grace ever helped a man toward heaven.

We propose always to be practical at the expense of everything except truth; and to be practical sometimes costs a man a good deal in the way of criticism. I want to say right here, I don't care what you think of me. If you say you have got if you will write it out and bring it to me, I will sign it, for God knows I have got none in him. I have not. I tried him for twenty-four years, and he took me right to the gates of hell, and I never intend to have anything more to do with him, if I can help it, God being my helper. I put my hand in the hand of my Heavenly Father, and say, "Father, lead me by Thy right hand; I cannot go—I will not go unless Thou dost help me and guide me," and I do not give myself any uneasiness upon that score. I do not care what you say that is bad about me. If it is true, I am so sorry that I cannot get mad about it, and if it is a lie, I am so glad it is a lie that I cannot get mad, and I am going to stay in a good humor until God calls me home to heaven.

I don't care what you say about my grammar. I have found out at last that if the pulpit will use the language that you all use down in your stores to convey your ideas and transact your business, that is the nearest way to a man. You can go away from here and say what you please about my rhetoric and my grammar, but if you have got a thimbleful of brains, you cannot, none of you, say, "Well, I didn't understand that fellow; I didn't understand him." I say, to give a practical turn to the discussion, I hope you will give me your prayers, that God may stop some soul in its downward career to-night.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Unprecedented Number of Vetoes were sent by the President to Congress last week. On one day six were sent to the Senate and nine to the House. On another day he added thirty to the list. They were chiefly private pension bills and appropriations for public buildings. The President intimates in his messages that Congress has fallen into a habit of hasty legislation on both these matters. One of the pension bills is for the relief of a woman whose name has been on the rolls nearly a year, and who was therefore in no need of the special bill. In other cases it appears Congress has acted hastily and carelessly. The principle laid down by the President as to public buildings will involve him in some unpopularity. He is opposed to the erection of a federal building in all places where the needs of the public service do not call for it. He contends that the fact of a thriving community desiring the erection of a handsome building is not sufficient to justify an appropriation. He also reminds Congress that there are eighty buildings now in process of construction upon which two millions and a half have been expended in a single year.

The Senate Voted to Reconsider the Measure to prevent members of Congress acting as attorneys for railroads which have received aid from the Government, and last week sent it to the Judiciary Committee, where it will probably be killed. There is nothing surprising about this decision; the surprise was about the previous vote in its favor. Of the seventy-six Senators, sixty-five are lawyers, and many of them would lose about half their incomes if this bill became a law. Mr. Evarts and Mr. Edmunds strongly opposed the bill, though Senator Hawley was the nominal leader of the movement. Thirteen Senators who voted for the bill in the first instance voted against it last week, and it was lost by a vote of thirty-one to twenty-one. In spite of the decision of the Senate, there is a strong feeling in the public mind that men who are paid by corporations ought not to have the power of voting public money to those corporations.

The Fishery Difficulty with Canada is Placed in a new light by the statement of the Hon. Peter Mitchell, one of the Queen's Privy Counsellors, in an interview with a reporter of the Boston Globe. He said that he held that there was no authority for seizing the Adams or any United States vessel that had observed the customs laws, and had urged the Dominion Government not to engage in any international contest on such "a weak and worthless case, as the opinion of the commercial world would be against them, and we could not afford, as a country aspiring to a national position, to have this influential element condemning us." The concessions now made cover the whole case except the headland question. It still remains to be determined whether the three-line limit is to be measured from the headlands or from the shores of the bays. The position now is more favorable to American fishermen than it was under the treaty of 1818.

The Famous River and Harbor Bill which President Arthur vetoed is likely to be equalled, if not exceeded, by that now in progress. When it was reported to the House it was a little over eleven millions; but as the committee had looked too well after their own districts to the neglect of others, other appropriations were added during its passage until, when it reached the Senate, it called for more than fifteen millions. The Senate Committee now has it in hand, and has cut off $615,000 and added $3,483,275. It is now over eighteen millions, and it is not through the Senate yet. Members of Congress seem to have forgotten what happened to their predecessors in 1882 who engineered the former bill.

Renewed Labor Troubles are Reported from Chicago. On June 23d seventy-seven switchmen on the Lake Shore Railroad went on strike, and the railroad officials apprehend that the step is the initial one in a general movement. The trouble grows out of the agreement under which the men went back to work after the recent strike. The employees allege that the company has not fulfilled its promises, and that men whom it promised to discharge are still in its employ. On Friday the switchmen prevented any freight being moved, and on Saturday, though four freight cars were sent off, there was a regular fight, in which revolvers were used and much damage was done.

An Expedition to Explore Alaska Territory has been fitted out by the New York Times, and placed under the command of Lieutenant Frederick Schwatka, of Arctic fame. Although nineteen years have passed since this territory was acquired, little is known of it beyond the coast. In 1883 Lieutenant Schwatka explored the Yukon, the great river of Alaska, from its source to its mouth. During his journey he conceived the desire for a more extended exploration, which, through the liberality of the Times, he is now enabled to take. One of the most important features of the expedition will be the attempt to scale the St. Elias range of mountains, which are the highest on the North American Continent. The explorer hopes to climb to the top of St. Elias itself, which is nineteen thousand five hundred feet above the sea level. The expedition intends to carefully examine the timber lands between the mountains and the sea, as, if the wood growing there proves merchantable, there are good harbors for its transportation, and the discovery will be valuable.

The Death of Ex-Senator David Davis, who during President Arthur's term was acting Vice-President of the United States, occurred at Bloomington, Ill., early on Saturday morning last. For a long time past Mr. Davis has been suffering from diabetes, and since the beginning of May he has also suffered from a carbuncle and erysipelas. He was seventy-one years old, having been born in Maryland in 1815. Though well known and respected throughout Illinois, to which State he removed in 1835, he did not gain a national reputation until President Lincoln's term. Lincoln and he were warm friends, practised in the same courts, travelled together, and spent much of their time in each other's society. Mr. Davis worked enthusiastically in his friend's interest at the Chicago Convention and during the campaign. After the election Mr. Lincoln nominated Mr. Davis Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and while serving in that capacity Mr. Davis won general esteem as an upright judge, against whose integrity there was never a whisper. He drifted away from the Republican Party in the Reconstruction days, and was nominated for the Presidency by the Liberal Party in 1872. He was in the same year before the Democratic Convention which finally nominated Horace Greeley,

In 1877 the Illinois Legislature elected him United States Senator, and it is a remarkable testimony to his high character that the election gave as much pleasure to Republicans as to Democrats. When General Arthur succeeded to the Presidency in 1881 Judge Davis was elected acting Vice-President, and presided in the Senate until the close of his term, to the satisfaction of both parties. Since 1883 he has lived in retirement.

The Prorogation of the British Parliament took place on Friday last. It was explained by the first paragraph of the Queen speech, in which she said, "I have determined to release you from your high duties before the full accomplishment of the regular work of the session in order to ascertain the sense of my people on the important proposal to establish a legislative body in Ireland for the management of Irish as distinguished from imperial affairs. With this object it is my intention to immediately dissolve Parliament." The elections commence on July 2d and end on July 14th.

A Manifesto by Lord Randolph Churchill was issued last week, which ought to do the cause he represents serious injury in the minds of thinking men. It consists mainly of personal abuse of Mr. Gladstone, and its language is that of an angry boy or a maniac rather than of a statesman. He says, "Gladstone has reserved for his closing days a conspiracy against the honor of Great Britain and welfare of Ireland more startling, base, and nefarious than any of those numerous designs and plots that for a quarter of a century have occupied his imagination." Further on he stigmatizes the Home Rule Bill as "insanity, trafficking in treason, condoning crime, exalting disloyalty, abasing loyalty, and a monstrous mixture of imbecility, extravagance, and political hysterics." Comparing these utterances with those of the man he assails, there would be no difficulty in deciding, even if there were no other grounds, as to which of the two men is best fitted to guide the policy of a great empire.

The Expulsion of the Princes from France was effected last week. The Comte de Paris has gone to England, where he received a cordial welcome from the municipal authorities at Dover. The Queen has also offered him hospitality, which, it is said, he has declined, preferring to remain in privacy. Before leaving France he issued a manifesto in which he intimated his expectation that his exile would be short, and that he would yet be needed there, and promised that he would be ready to respond to the call. There is pathos in the passage in which he says: "Passionately attached to my native land, whose misfortunes have but rendered it the more dear to me, I have hitherto observed without infringing the laws. To effect a breach between us the moment has been chosen when I return thither, happy in having formed a new alliance between France and a friendly nation." He adds: "They seek to separate from France the chief of that glorious family which led her during nine centuries in the work of her national unity, and who, associated with the people, alike in prosperity and adversity, laid the foundation of her greatness and prosperity. They hope that she has forgotten the happy and prosperous reign of my grandsire, Louis Philippe." The Count was scarcely wise to allude to his family. It is to his interest that they should be forgotten. If the French people think that he resembles his ancestors in any way they will be little likely to offer him the throne.

A Discovery in Central Africa, Announced last week, leads to the hope that the whole of the continent will be opened to Christian effort sooner than was expected. A cablegram to the New York Herald from Brussels states that the Congo State Department has received from its agents a report of the grand discovery that the rivers of Sankauron and Kassai are fully navigable, by which also the eastern region of the Congo State can be reached without a long detour to the North. These rivers have valuable resources on their banks.

The Appointment of the Protestant Bishop of Jerusalem has since 1841 been vested alternately in the Governments of Prussia and England. Since the death of Dr. Gobat, in 1881, there has been a difficulty between the two Governments about the appointment of his successor. The deadlock having continued five years, and there being no prospect of breaking it, Prussia has decided to withdraw from the agreement and found an independent bishopric. Dr. Reitter, the missionary, is expected to be the German bishop.

The Gospel Meetings Conducted by Messrs. Avis and Brown at Brainerd, Minn., closed on June 20th. The Brainerd Tribune says that the interest continued unabated to the last, and a large number of persons have made a profession of faith. The singing of Mr. Avis appears to have been much blessed, the audiences listening spellbound to his melodious voice, which seemed to thrill them, and often melt them to tears. Many of the solos and choruses he uses are his own composition. Mr. Avis is a Canadian, and was born in Leamington, Ont. He has been actively engaged in Christian work for eleven years. For the past five years he has devoted his entire time to this work, having travelled with the well-known English Evangelists, Henry Varley and George and Thomas Needham.

A Successful Evangelistic Effort in New York has been conducted for some time in a modest way with many tokens of encouragement. It commenced in December, 1884, by the preaching of Mr. Jarvis Worden, in a hired hall on East Eighty-eighth Street, where there is much need of Christian work. During last summer the meetings were held in a tent, and, in the fall, finding that there was a regular congregation of four hundred persons, with a membership of about a hundred, and a Sunday-school of two hundred children, a fund was opened for the building of a church. A plain, commodious building was erected, at a cost of $3000, half of which was collected before commencing operations. The church is filled with a poor but earnest people, who are working earnestly to raise the remainder of the debt. It is one of the most interesting cases in this city of God's blessing on single unaided effort.

The White Cross Army in New York Now numbers seven hundred members. Bishop Potter has received a letter of congratulation on this result from Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, England, who originated the movement. In the course of it he says: "We have heard with much joy, from time to time, through Dr. de Costa, of the efforts which are made to promote the White Cross movement in New York. It is a great encouragement to us in England to hear of its progress on the other side of the Atlantic, and we shall be stimulated, I trust, by the tidings to fresh exertions. I am glad that the movement seems to be taking root in several British colonies, and I trust we may live to see a network spread over all the English-speaking peoples of the world. In England we have taken the step of appointing a general secretary, who will devote his whole time to the work of organizing the movement and of spreading information. This has already borne good fruit, and I look confidently forward to greater results from it in the future. But nothing will cheer our hearts more than news of progress from you across the wide ocean."

A Series of Resolutions Passed by the Christian Convention held at Topeka, Kan., at the close of Major Whittle's labors in that city, show that the Christian community there have made a discovery which cannot too soon be realized throughout the world. It is that card-playing, theatre-going, dancing, and non-observance of the Sabbath are practices inconsistent with the Christian life. It would be well if Christian ministers in New York arrived at the same conclusion. We should then be spared the humiliating spectacle of a clergyman sanctioning dancing parties by his presence. The keynote of the resolutions passed at Topeka is the following: "Resolved, That we, as a body of Christian people of various denominational connections, do hereby solemnly place on record our belief that the spirit, principles, and purposes of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and those of the kingdom of this world, are wholly and forever irreconcilable—and that the effort to bring them into harmony, by whomsoever or under whatever pretext made, is confronted by the irreversible word of Christ: 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.'"

A Curious Old Prophecy, Worded in the style common to these old sayings, is published in the New York Telegram. It states that in the church at Oberom-thal, near Prevon, in Germany, is the following inscription, centuries old, in stone: "When Mark shall bring us Easter, and Anthony shall sing praises at Pentecost, and John shall swing the censer at the Feast of Corpus Domini, then shall the whole earth resound with weepings and wailings." The whole of these coincidences are found in ecclesiastical almanacs this year: Easter falls on St. Mark's Day, April 25th; Pentecost on St. Anthony of Padua, June 13th; St. John Baptist on Corpus Christi, June 24th.

An Immigrant's Shawl Caused Her to be Returned to Europe last week by the immigration commissioners at New York. Uncle Sam's hospitality is so lavish that it will be a surprise to most people to learn that although he has opened his doors to the scum of Europe he refused to allow a woman to land because she was wearing a particular shawl. It is true, however, as the disappointed woman has discovered to her cost. She was among the steerage passengers on the steamship City of Berlin. Her demeanor was quiet, and she appeared modest and well behaved, but the commissioner singled her out from among the other passengers, and calling her to his desk, questioned her about the shawl she was wearing. A consultation with the superintendent followed, and then the woman was kindly but firmly informed that she must not remain in the United States, and she was taken back on board the vessel to be returned to Europe. On being asked if he had become fastidious about the fashions, the commissioner said, "No;" but he had recognized the shawl as one of those which the prison authorities in Ireland give to discharged prisoners, and though he was sorry for the woman, it would have been a violation of the law to allow her to remain. When Christ scrutinizes the garments of those who seek an entrance into His kingdom He will not reject those whose dress indicates that they have been evil-doers, but those whose dress shows that they claim to be righteous (Matt. 22: 11-13).

An Anomalous Decision Was Rendered by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on June 21st. An indictment was before the court of an agent who was charged with defrauding the Cherokee Indians of a quarter of a million dollars. After a brief argument, the court granted a motion of the defence to quash the indictments, on the ground that the Cherokee Indians, against whom the offence was alleged to have been committed, are a foreign nation; and, therefore, the offence could not be a violation of the laws of the United States. This decision may be good in law, but it is inconsistent with the conduct of Congress, which during its present session has passed several bills granting rights of way to railway companies through the various Indian reservations, and has in past sessions been very generous in this respect to several companies that want to run lines through the Territory of these same Cherokees who are pronounced a foreign nation. If this decision is right, Congress has no more authority to vote a right of way through the Cherokee nation than through India or Persia. Senator Dawes, who is Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, referring to the decision, said that he considered our relations with the Indians were anomalous and ridiculous. When we fed them they were the wards of the nation; when we made treaties with them they were foreign powers; and when we wanted their lands they were without rights, like the bears and buffaloes. They appear now to have no standing at all in law. Happily the missionaries who go preach the Gospel to them can tell them of a better kingdom, from which foreigners are not excluded (Eph. 2: 13, 19).

A Prayer Boycott on the President Has Been adopted in a church in Washington, D. C. The Baltimore Sun states that an elder in one of the Washington churches was recently dismissed from a lucrative position in the civil service. He had done no wrong, had not been remiss in his duties, and no charge was made against him. His place was wanted for a friend of the Administration, and consequently his services were dispensed with. His discharge has awakened a strong feeling in the church of which he is a leading member, and both pastor and people show much sympathy with him. The pastor, it is stated, criticizes the Administration very freely in his sermons, and has even gone so far as to omit the usual prayer for the President in the services. If the report is true, it would appear that the pastor has allowed his sympathy to get the better of his discretion. On all accounts the prayer should be resumed, and should be all the more earnest and frequent on account of the trouble. Mr. Cleveland has, as President a claim on the prayers of all Christian ministers (1 Tim 2: 2), and as an enemy he has a special claim on the prayers of this particular minister (Matt. 5: 44).

Two Brothers in Prison in Huron County, Ohio, owe their ruin and disgrace to stock gambling. Local journals say that only three years ago no family in the county seemed more secure in the esteem and confidence of the public. The brothers were conducting a large and apparently profitable business in the town, where they had lived for many years, and there was no reason to expect anything less than their continued prosperity and good repute among their fellow-townsmen. One was the popular and trusted treasurer of the county, and both were men of influence. Now both are in confinement for defrauding the public. This is all the work of speculation. Margin gambling is responsible for the whole work of ruin from first to last. It was the craze for sudden and easy gains through this machinery of evil which tempted one to squander the money intrusted to his care, and the other to raise money by fraudulent means. A moderate fortune would have been secure to each of them from the prosperous business they were in, but by embarking in speculation they were brought to poverty. In a frantic effort to retrieve their losses they committed crime. In these days of mammon worship the apostolic warning ought to be kept constantly before every man (1 Tim. 6: 9, 10).

A Clergyman Successfully Treated a Baby who was disturbing him in a recent lecture. The Indianapolis Sentinel says that while the Rev. J. H. Carroll, D.D., was delivering a lecture he was much annoyed by the crying of an infant. He went on speaking, but it was evident that the noise seriously disturbed him. The room being crowded, the mother and child could not easily retire, and in spite of all the mother could do to soothe the baby the wailing continued. The doctor stopped at last, and for a minute or two the child had the privilege of entertaining the audience without the competition of the lecturer. Dr. Carroll made another effort, but was again overpowered by his infantile rival. Then an idea seemed to strike him, and the Doctor of Divinity left the platform, walked down the aisle to where the baby was, and drawing a large stick of licorice from his pocket presented it to the child. The youngster thrust one end into its mouth, the squalling ceased, and amid laughter and applause the doctor returned to the platform and resumed his lecture. The lecturer acted prudently in thus purchasing the good behavior of his disturber, but it may be hoped the parents will not follow his example, or the child, as it grows older, may think that the best way to get the sweets of life is to do evil. That would be bad for them and the child, too (Sam. 3: 27).

WHO FOUND IT OUT?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And there were four leprous men at the entering in of the gate: and they said one to another, Why sit we here until we die? If we say, We will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there: and if we sit still here, we die also. Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Syrians: if they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we shall but die, etc."—II KINGS 7: 3-7.

Biblical Annals of the Poor—I. A Great Work Entirely Unknown—The Horrors of the Besieged City—Famine and Cannibalism—The Siege Raised—Unconscious Freedom—Starving in the Midst of Plenty—A Sad Parallel—II. The Singular Discoverers—Diseased and Starved—A Personal Reminiscence—Driven by Despair—Discover Food and Riches—Their Report—Testimony not Argument—III. Why They were the Discoverers—Their Extremity Direst—Could not be Worse—Only One Course Open.

THE story of four leprous men inserted in the Book of the Kings of Israel: is it not singular? No; it is not singular for the Bible. If you were to take out of the Scriptures all the stories that have to do with poor, afflicted men and women, what a very small book the Bible would become, especially if together with the stories you removed all the psalms of the sorrowful, all the promises for the distressed, and all the passages which belong to the children of grief! This Book, indeed, for the most part is made up of and despised. Think for a minute what a space is occupied with the life of the man who was separated from his brethren, sold for a slave, and put in prison in Egypt! What a large part of the Bible is occupied by the writings of one who was a babe exposed on the Nile, and afterward kept a flock for forty years in the wilderness! We could not part with the account of the man who lost all his property and children in one day, and sat among the ashes, covered with sore boils. We could not spare the story of the two widows who came together empty-handed from the land of Moab, one of whom went to glean in the fields of Boaz; nor the history of that woman of a sorrowful spirit, and her little boy, around whom the hope of Israel gathered in the dark days of Eli's feeble rule.

Page after page of holy writ is enriched with the experience of that youth who was taken from tending the flock to become the champion of his country, and was afterward hunted like a partridge upon the mountain by the envious king. We could not give up the history of the prophet of sorrow, nor of the fugitive who was cast into the sea, nor even the minor incidents of the widow of Sarepta, and her barrel of meal, and the prophet's widow whose creditor was about to seize her children for her husband's debts. Nor do lepers fall behind; we have two stories of lepers close together—Naaman the Syrian, and the four in our text at Samaria's gate. They were wisely put forth from Israel, but they were not put forth from Israel's God.

Remember that the New Testament runs in the same strain. Under the economy of grace our Lord Jesus Christ is seen living among fishermen and peasants, and calling the poor to be His disciples. 'It is worth while to be among the poor, the despised, and the sad, to have your record on high, and to magnify the condescension of the Lord. It is in the hope that some disconsolate ones may be cheered that I speak at this time. Oh, that some leprous ones may go forth to-day, and make a grand discovery!

I. First, I call your attention to

A GREAT WORK ENTIRELY UNKNOWN.

The city of Samaria had been shut up for some time by the Syrian army; famine had fallen upon the people, and driven them to horrible straits. One can hardly bear to read of mothers devouring their own babes through stress of hunger. God sent His servant, Elisha, to tell them that the next day there should be a superabundance of food in the gates of Samaria, but the message was received with open ridicule. No sooner was the promise given than the Lord began to carry it out. It is the way with Him, to be true to His word. However great the promise, it is as sure as it is great. And so, ere the sun went down, the Lord had caused Israel's enemies to flee away, and had opened magazines of food for hungry Samaria. Without human aid Jehovah had accomplished His promise, and much more.

The siege was raised from around Samaria. Armed men had stood in their places, and kept the way, so that none could go in or out; but they are all gone, not one of them is left. The troopers had fled on foot, and left their steeds tethered in rows; captains and common soldiers had alike taken to their heels in hot haste, flying helter-skelter, like frightened sheep. No host threatened the city; it sat on its hill in the twilight, lonely and free. Yet in the city of Samaria they thought themselves cooped up, and set their warders on the wall because of fear in the night. Everybody who went to bed that night felt that he was still in that horrible den where grim death seemed actually present in the skeleton forms of the hunger-bitten. They were as free as the harts of the wilderness had they known it: but their ignorance held them in duration vile.

God has provided plenty for them. The wretched Samaritans drew the hunger-belt more closely about them, and each man hoped that he might sleep for many an hour, and forget his bitter pangs; yet within a stone's throw there was more fine flour and barley than they could consume. They were pinning, when they might have been feasting. They believed not God, and looked not for relief. Was not that a strange thing? A city besieged, and not besieged; girt with enemies, as they thought, and yet not an enemy left; starving, and yet near to a feast! See, dear friends, what unbelief can do. They had been promised plenty right speedily by God's own prophet; but they did not believe the promise, nor look out for its fulfilment. Had they been upon the watch, they might have seen the unusual movement in the Syrian camp, and noticed the absolute stillness which succeeded it.

I know a sad parallel to this. The Lord Jesus Christ has come into the world, and has put away the sin of His people; and yet many of them are complaining that their sin can never be put away. The Lord Jesus Christ has routed all the enemies of His people, and yet they are afraid of innumerable evils. None is left to harm them, but they do not remember that the Lord reigneth: they are afraid of this, and afraid of that, and yet in one tremendous battle the Champion of the cross has routed all their foes. They are no longer shut up as prisoners; the Lord has brought them liberty; but they are not aware of it by reason of their unbelief.

Out of the whole population of Samaria there was not one who had such faith in Elisha's promise as to drop over the wall from a window, and go out to see whether the Lord was fulfilling His word. It was solemnly promised, it was grievously needed, and yet not a soul believed in it. Even thus we are constantly seeing the Lord's elect and redeemed ones counting themselves rejected, and fearing that they shall perish. Alas, the case is common!

II. When you have realized the picture of the city abiding in sorrow though its deliverance had already come, I want, in the second place, to remark upon a band of very SINGULAR DISCOVERERS.

A choice quaternion at last found out what the Lord had done, proved it for themselves, and made it known to their fellow-townsmen. Is it not remarkable that these discoverers were lepers? These were the first to discover that Jehovah had gotten the victory, and scattered the armies of Syria, and brought help to His people. These poor diseased beings were compelled to live in shanties outside the city gate, and to keep themselves apart from all others. Fed from day to day with food passed over the wall, so long as there was any to pass over, they rotted away in horrible loathsomeness. What a wretched sight!

I will not ask you to step into the hut. There are four living skeletons; for what of flesh remains to them is foul with the hideous marks of leprosy. Their bodies are corrupting in life. They move about, poor sick things as they are, more than half dead. They have had no food sent to them of late, and they must not go for relief. No man cares for them; the best thing that could possibly happen to them would be to die, and yet they have a clinging to life. They were outcasts, offcasts. These were the discoverers of what God had done! It is a wonderful thing that those who are most conscious of sin, most despised of men, and least likely to be favored, are often those upon whom Jehovah has fixed the eye of His electing love. Lepers are not the only ones whom men cast out, nor are they the only persons whom to bless. Some who feel loathsome, and vile, and self-abhorred may be before me now, dreaming that it is impossible for God to bless them; yet these are the characters whom He delights to save.

These men could not hope for a welcome from the Syrians; poor objects that they were, they would be hated as Israelites, and abhorred as lepers; yet they went, and in that camp they found all that they wanted, and much more than they expected. Am I not speaking to some who are saying, "For me to go to Christ would be all in vain: I can suppose His blessing my brother or my friend, but He will never receive one so altogether unworthy as I am?" That was my imagination once. I believed in the salvation of everybody except myself. It seemed to me as if a special plague and a peculiar curse had lighted upon my nature, and withered my heart. It was not so, as I soon proved when once I went to Jesus.

O poor soul! I wish I could take you by the hand, and go myself with you again to my dear Lord as I went to Him at first. I went to Him in the most despairing fashion. You have heard the story of the English king who is wroth with the burgesses of Calais, and declared that he would hang six of them. They came to him with ropes about their necks, submitting to their doom. That is the way in which I came to Jesus. I accepted my punishment, pleaded guilty, and begged for pardon.

Another thing to be noticed about these discoverers of the Lord's work is that they were a people who dared not have joined themselves to God's people. They were not allowed inside the city walls:

was without the gate. They were recognized in some sort of a way as belonging to the congregation of Israel, for their place was near the city gates; still, Israel would have none of them; they must not enter one of her houses to take a meal. Some of you have been attending the Tabernacle for years, I know, but you dare not join the Church; you would not venture to baptism, or to the Lord's Supper, because you feel so unworthy. You hang on to us after a sort; you would not like quite to give up all connection with the people of God; but yet you would not dare to say that you belong to them. In your secret hearts, your bitter cry is that of the leper, "Unclean, unclean, unclean!" These poor creatures Israel would not own, and yet they were the first to find out what the Lord had done for His people. How often does it happen that those who are rejected of men are accepted of God!

To describe these discoverers yet more fully, they were men who at last were driven to give themselves up. They said, "We will fall unto the Syrians; and if they kill us we shall but die." Blessed is that man who has given himself up, not to the Syrians, but to the Lord! As long as we can do something, we keep on doing that something to our ruin; but when it is all over with us, and we can do no more, then man's extremity is God's opportunity. The man who struggles as he sinks is hard to be rescued; but when the drowning man has gone down twice, and is just going down for the third time—now is the opportunity for the strong swimmer, who comes in and grasps him firmly, and swims with him to shore. You that are going down a third time, you lost ones, listen to this, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost."

These four lepers went to the Syrian camp, and SAW FOR THEMSELVES.

I think I can see them in the dim twilight, stealing along until they come to the first tent, expecting to be challenged by a picket, and wondering that they are not. They heard no sound of human voice. "There are no men about," cried one of them, "nor signs of men. Let us go into this tent." They stepped in. A supper was ready. He who had spread that table will never taste it again. The hungry men needed no persuasion, but immediately began to carve for themselves. They took possession of the spoils of war left on the field. After they had feasted, they said, "To whom does this gold and silver belong? The prey belongs to us, for our enemies have left the treasure behind them." They took as many of the valuables as they could carry, then went into another tent: still no living soul was seen. Who can conceive the delicious joy of those four lepers in the midst of such abundance?

Do you see what these men did? First, they went and saw for themselves, and then they took possession for themselves. The whole four of them did not own a penny before, and now they are rich beyond a miser's dream. They have enjoyed the feast, and they are FILLED TO THE FULL.

They are fully qualified to go and tell the starving city of their discovery, because they are clear that they have made no mistake. They have satisfied their own hunger, gratified their own desire, and tasted and handled for themselves, and so they can speak as men who know and are sure.

The leper, fed and enriched, stands outside the city gate, and calls to the porter, and wakes him up at the dead of night, for he has news worth telling. The experienced believer speaks with the accent of conviction, and therein imitates his Master, who spake with authority. The Lord made a good choice when He selected these lepers to be discoverers of His great work. He does wisely when He takes those who are saddest, and fills their mouths with laughter, and their tongues with singing, for these will command attention. These poor wretches could not have made up so amazing a story, nor feigned such joy: sorrowing castaways could not have invented the story of free grace. It must be true. Oh, that men would believe it!

III. So far we have come by the Lord's help. I now wish to spend a minute or two in noticing to make this discovery. These four lepers, how did they come to find out the flight of Syria? First, I suppose, they made the discovery rather than anybody else, because the famine was sorest with them. You see they were lepers outside the gate. In good times they received a daily portion from the town; but you may be pretty sure that the townsmen did not deny themselves on their account. If anybody has to go short, it will probably be those who are dependent upon charity. Nobody in the East is excessively eager to feed lepers in times of famine. Probably the Samaritans thought, and even said, "They are best dead; they are no good to anybody; they are suffering; they cannot earn anything, let them die." Besides, when the supplies within the city were exhausted, you could hardly blame the citizens if they sent nothing to the lepers; for those who were themselves without food had nothing to give. Then it was that they woke up.

Truly, necessity is the mother of invention; and the mother of that blessed invention which finds the Lord Jesus Christ and His finished salvation is the awful necessity of a perishing soul. Let but some men feel the burden of sin, and they will never rest till they come to Jesus. Oh, that you were utterly bankrupt! Not a kind wish, say you. Yes, it is. Our complete emptiness constrains us to seek the divine fulness. Look at the prodigal son; so long as he had anything left he did not go home to his Father; but when he had spent all his substance, and had become so hungry that he envied the very hogs he fed, then he said, "I will arise, and go to my Father." Spiritual necessity is that which nerves the soul with courage to cast itself upon sovereign grace in Jesus Christ.

These lepers were driven to go to make the discovery because they felt that they

than they were. They said, "If we sit here we shall die; and if the Syrians kill us, we shall but die." That feeling has often driven souls to Christ.

"I can but perish if I go;
I am resolved to try;
For if I stay away, I know
I must forever die."

They could but die, and they were sure to die if they sat where they were. Poor soul! are you within reach of my voice? Is your case desperate? Well, then, try faith. You cannot be any worse, and you may be better. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. If He should reject you, you cannot be any worse; but then, He cannot reject you; for He says, "Him that cometh to Me, I will in nowise cast out." I would pray for mercy if I were you. Suppose you are not heard; you cannot be the worse for praying. I would cast myself on Jesus if I were you; you could not be the worse for doing so. Every day I say to myself:

"What though my eye of faith be dim, I'll hold on Jesus, sink or swim."

I cannot be blamed for trusting to One who has saved so many. Oh, my hearer, there is no risk in the matter: you must be infinitely better for coming to the appointed Saviour! Come and try Him. Come at this moment.

These lepers went to the camp of the Syrians because they were shut up to that one course—"If we say, we will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there; and if we sit still here, we die also."

was open. I am always glad when I am in that condition. If many courses are open to me, I may make a mistake; but when I see only one road I know which way to go. It is a blessed thing to be shut up to faith in Christ—to be compelled to look to grace alone. I spoke to a friend this week who is sore sick, and I said, "You are resting in Christ, my brother." He replied, "I have nothing else to rest in." While we have fifty ways of salvation we shall be lost; but when we see that "other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, even Jesus Christ the righteous," then we shall build upon it and be safe.

These lepers were not the men to theorize; they were in such a plight that they must come to prompt action. Many ladies and gentlemen treat religion as a science, and therefore they never know its real powers. Many professors and learned doctors speculate upon theology as if it were part of a liberal education, but by no means a practical matter. People who have no sin to wash away, and no great spiritual trouble to bear, play at religion; but those who are ready to perish look on matters in another light.

These lepers discovered what the Lord had done because they did not give themselves up to dreams and guesses, but came to downright matters of fact. May God drive every unconverted sinner into a corner, and so compel him to yield to grace! May He bring you to act in earnest; may He drive you by the extreme necessities of your case to seek and to find, to search and to discover!

You poor lepers you poor lost and ruined ones, come to my Lord Jesus! Believe it, the whole land is before you; the land that floweth with milk and honey is for you. This world is yours, and worlds to come. Christ is yours; yea, God Himself is yours. Everything is to be had for nothing. Heaven and all its joys are to be had upon believing. God make you the discoverers this day of His wondrous grace, and to Him shall be praise forever and ever! Amen.

AN AFGHAN BRIGAND.

THE remarkable conversion of a notorious brigand is related by Rev. Thomas P. Hughes, formerly missionary among the Afghans, in an interesting letter to the Independent. The facts related leave no doubt either of the desperate character of the man before the change or of the earnest, vigorous Christian life that followed it. The following is a brief summary of the narrative:

Dilawar the "Brave" was born in a little village on the right bank of the Cabul River, and not far from its confluence with the Indus. He belonged to one of the most renowned Afghan tribes, and was descended in direct line from Khushhal, the warrior-poet of the Khat-taks. When a youth he received the usual theological instruction of a village mosque, and in course of time became the favorite pupil of a celebrated teacher, the Gamaliel of his day. He attained great eminence as a student of religion; but as the sedentary life of the mosque did not suit the physical energies of Dilawar, he, in due time, exchanged the life of the sanctuary for that of the highway, and commenced to earn his living by plunder and robbery.

His favorite plan of operation was to get early intelligence of aristocratic marriages, and then waylay the bridegroom and carry him off to one of his fastnesses, where he would be held for ransom, and killed if the ransom was not paid, which was a rare case.

When the British occupied the Peshawur Valley Dilawar was induced by Major Lumsden to enter the British service in the newly-formed corps of guides. A great deal of fighting was going on, and Dilawar's daring and intrepidity won him the respect of the British generals, and he was promoted and enjoyed much distinction.

One day, when he was strolling along the streets of Peshawur, he saw an English officer seated on his horse and preaching to the people. Dilawar understood very little of the officer's sermon, but he was much impressed with the sincerity of the religion which would prompt an officer of the army to preach to a bigoted and fanatical crowd. He begged for instruction. Colonel Wheeler (for that was the officer's name) said, "I cannot discuss with you, for I am a poor, ignorant soldier, like yourself. If you want to discuss, you must go to the missionaries." Dilawar went to the missionaries in Peshawur, and was after some instruction baptized, at the close of the year 1858.

Mr. Hughes met him when he went to Afghanistan in 1865, and soon a warm friendship was formed between them. It was Dilawar's delight to accompany his friend on his preaching excursions. One incident from among others, related by Mr. Hughes, shows the character of the assistance he rendered. Mr. Hughes says: "We encamped close to a well-known shrine where there was a mosque and a school of divinity. We were soon visited by the Moslem priest and his students. Dilawar was quietly seated in the corner of my tent as I commenced an exposition of Christian truth. To my great annoyance, he interrupted my discourse and engaged me in a religious discussion. The people were intensely interested, while I was somewhat pained at the spirit of opposition which seemed to characterize his conversation. When the crowd became thoroughly interested he threw off the mask of an inquirer and vigorously attacked Mohammed and his religion, quoting passage after passage from the Koran and the traditions in the original Arabic, to the astonishment and the complete discomfiture of the moulvies of the place. 'Who is he?' 'Who is he?' said one after another in suppressed whispers, when an old man of the company exclaimed, 'It must be Dilawar.' I was often distressed at his polemical spirit. 'Every man to his work,' he would say. 'It is mine to cast down; it is yours to build up.'"

TWENTY DOLLARS FOR SMILES.

IN a recent sermon, while expounding the passage, "Delight thyself in the Lord" (Ps. 37:4), Rev. Sam Jones said: Down in a town in Georgia, where I was a pastor of a church, there was a carriage-maker, and he called up all his hands one Christmas eve and had a full settlement with them. After he had settled with all the hands he called back a yellow boy, Jerry, and said to him, "Jerry, come here; here is twenty dollars, and he handed him a twenty-dollar gold piece." Jerry said, "Why, boss, you've paid me once." "I paid you for working, but this twenty-dollar gold piece is for the smiles that have played over your face all the year. Whatever I bid you do during the whole year, you always went about the task with a smiling countenance." Brethren, the Lord pays you clean cash for what you do, and pays you double for the way you do it. Good Lord, help us to get into this double-pay business!

THE IRISH DISTRESS.

(See Illustration.)

WHILE the electoral battle is going on in Great Britain a question even more urgent than that submitted to the voters demands settlement. In Mayo, Galway, and Kerry on the south, and Donegal on the north, all along the coast, the fishermen and their families are absolutely without food or the means of procuring any. On June 20th Father Grealy, the parish priest at Newport County, Mayo, telegraphed that "the work of relieving the starving fishermen on the west coast is at a standstill, and myself and my curates are in a state of siege, with crying applicants craving food to save the lives of their little children."

This state of affairs has been gradually developing for more than seven years. In 1879 it was seen by visitors that unless prompt measures were taken a famine was inevitable. The fishermen could only just live; they could save nothing for a rainy day. At the year's end there was nothing left; their families had been fed and clothed after a fashion, but to do that had exhausted the proceeds of their year's labor. Meanwhile boats were wearing out, new appliances were needed, and the quantity of potatoes saved for seed diminished year by year. It was a steady progress toward starvation, and now it has reached that goal.

Private generosity has done something to alleviate the distress, but it can do nothing toward providing a radical and effective remedy. The fund raised by Mr. James H. Tuke, a member of the Society of Friends, has kept alive many families which must without it have perished. But relief is merely a reprieve. At Achill, where there is a population of seven thousand, there are six thousand who have nothing to eat but what is supplied by charity. At Inishboffin the whole place was destitute of food until the Government war ship arrived there with a cargo of meal and potatoes. From the decks of the ship a lean, hungry crowd could be seen on the beach pointing to the ship and encouraging each other with the prospect of food. It is a sad case, and it may be hoped that it will commend itself to the Christian sympathy of all alike, and that political passion will not deter any from co-operating in the work of relief.

LEVUKA, THE CAPITAL OF FIJI

THE SCENE OF THE RECENT CYCLONE.

(See Illustration.)

IN our issue of February 11th was a report of the Jubilee services held in the Fiji Islands to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the introduction of Christianity. Then all was joy and thankfulness; now the place is the scene of wide and complete desolation. The island has been visited by a cyclone which has swept the place clear of buildings of all kinds and has scattered the contents over the island.

The details of the disaster which have come to hand indicate that the visitation was of the most destructive character. On March 4th the barometer at Levuka, which is the metropolis of the Fiji group, sank to 27.62. The wind had been gradually rising for several days previously, but on that morning it assumed the character of a cyclone, which struck the town and passed clear across the island. The roofs, which were chiefly made of corrugated iron, flew about like scraps of paper; the air was thick with them and with heavy beams, planks, and lesser articles of all kinds. The Good Templar's Hall was "lifted ten feet bodily out of position, and utterly wrecked." Churches, clubs, and public buildings were turned into heaps of ruins. At Vuna Messrs. Connell and Tarfe had to dig their goods out of the beach. They found their safe, weighing over a quarter of a ton, fifty yards from its usual position."

The heavy rain which fell caused disastrous floods, which have deposited sand in large masses; while the sea, on the other side, sent high waves, sweeping away by its force roads, piers, houses, and whatever came in its way, at the same time throwing up far from the usual shore beaches of rubbish. The damage to crops has been great. The bread trees are all destroyed, as well as the fruit trees of every kind. This means threatened starvation to the natives. Among those who are acquainted with the Fijians there seems to be some fear that this terrible storm might tempt them back to their old custom of cannibalism. It is not so long since it was given up. Miss Gordon Cumming in her work, entitled "At Home in Fiji," states that only about ten years ago she saw men who had eaten their fellow-creatures; and on being asked if bokola—the Fiji word for human flesh—was better than beef or pork their answer was that no other meat could compare with it. From this it will be seen that the old taste for this, to them delicate kind of feeding, must yet be a memory of many still living in the South Sea Islands; and should famine come as one of the results of the late storm, a backsliding to their old heathenish practices is perfectly within the possibilities of the case.

So great is the fear regarding the natives and their danger of relapsing, that the Rev. Mr. Calvert, one of the oldest and most experienced missionaries in that part of the world (whose portrait appeared in this journal on February 11th), has, although now an old man, determined to start immediately for Fiji, to exert his influence on the distressed natives, and assist in devising means to rescue them from famine.

"HEADLEY looks as if he had received a death-blow," said a gentleman to an acquaintance, as they were riding in a horse-car.

"That is so," said the other. "I believe he got off here lest we should speak to him. This is not his block. I tried to console him the other day, and as soon as I mentioned his loss, he turned and walked away as if I had struck him. His heart seems to be broken."

"There are not many men who would grieve like that over a wife, and they say she was no beauty. A common, mean-looking woman!"

"You did not know her, I see. Why, sir, she made Headley what he is. I knew him at college. He was a wild, random fellow then, as lazy and shiftless as any fellow there. He seemed booked for State Prison or the poor-house. Well, sir, he fell in love with that girl and married her. They had to live in a flat at first, but he set to work like a beaver, dropped his idle acquaintances, turned sober, got religion, and became altogether respectable. I went to see them two or three times, and I soon learned how the change was wrought. His wife just loved him, and her love seemed like new life to him. She believed in him, and got him to believe in himself. She encouraged him to work, painted the future for him in bright colors, persuaded him that life was too good to waste, and led him to church and among religious people. She had more sense than most women; instead of trying to extirpate the evil by rating and scolding, she tried to foster the good in him by praising every good thing he did. I tell you she educated that fellow, and made a man of him. 'A common, mean-looking woman,' I think you said. She was a queen among women, and Headley owes her all he is and has."

"She must have been a paragon. I never saw you so enthusiastic."

"Well, sir, the subject is worthy of it. I have seen dozens of promising young men drop into poverty and misery under the influence of the frivolous girls whom they have married, and it does me good to see something on the credit side of the account. She was the only woman I ever saw who came up to Solomon's notion of a good wife—one who does her husband 'good, and not evil, all the days of her life.' I don't wonder Headley is broken by her death."

While this conversation was going on in the car, the bereaved husband was plodding homeward with spiritless step. Formerly, he hurried home cheerfully, with a heart that grew lighter as he neared his threshold. He knew then that, whatever his worry might be, there was one heart that would respond with sympathy and encouragement—one who would help him to see the bright side of things and remind him of the joy and privileges of his Christian standing. Now that home was desolate, and the desolation was in his heart, too.

He entered wearily, ate his solitary supper, and then went into his parlor to seek consolation in the book that has cheered many a generation of mourners. As he read, the door opened and his little two-year-old son came in and climbed on his knee. The father stooped and kissed the little fellow tenderly. Was he not a fellow-sufferer? And in his own agony he had almost forgotten the child. Now he put his arm around him caressingly, and spoke kindly to him. But Harry had come on business, and soon he propounded his question. Pointing to the portrait of his mother over the mantel, he said:

"Is mamma like that now, papa? Nurse says she is an angel, with wings and a gold crown."

"We don't know, my boy. She is worthy a crown. She is very happy, that is all we know."

"Did God take her, papa?"

"Yes; she is gone to be with Him."

"What for did God take her? Mamma said God loved Harry. I don't think He does, if He took my mamma."

That was a dreadful idea to get into the child's mind. The father knew that, but was not his own intense grief an indication that he, too, doubted whether God loved him? But the child must be put right; so Mr. Headley told him in simple language about the joy of the blessed dead, of their freedom from pain and distress, and their boundless happiness, and that God was good to take mamma to the place where she would be blessed.

Yes, the boy could understand that; but did He love those who were left? That was a more difficult matter; but the father did his best, and the very persistency of the child's scepticism drew him into clearer proof until, as the boy went away satisfied, the father applied his teaching to himself; and as he bent the knee in prayer, he was able to say, "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good."

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Change of Scene.

It was well for Juliet's peace of mind that her wish could not be gratified. If she had been present when her letters were opened, she would have seen something more than astonishment on the faces of her relations. It was something not unlike embarrassment. When the news of the wreck came, more than a year before, it was of course concluded that Juliet must have perished with the other passengers. No tidings of any survivor came to hand, and it was therefore natural to suppose that Juliet must have been drowned.

It was a shock at the time, but in the fashionable world there is too much excitement for protracted emotion. Becoming mourning was ordered and duly worn, but the wearers were more concerned about the effect on their complexions of the sombre garments than about the death of the lost one. Then there was, too, substantial consolation, as Juliet's fortune would fall into hands always active in disbursement. The money happened at the time to be more welcome than usual.

Imagine, therefore, the scene when the letters from Eschol are brought into a very elegantly furnished mansion in a fashionable quarter of London, where Lady Gathorne is entertaining her sister, Mrs. Delany, and a few other relations and intimate friends.

How came they all to be in London at the most unfashionable of seasons—in September, when all the world is shooting on the moors, yachting in the Channel, crowding seaside resorts, or flying over the Continent on the wings of steam? Are not the shutters of all the other houses in the "Gardens" scrupulously shut; are not painters sedulously at work at the fronts of mansions; are not carriages few in Belgravia, and the parks well-nigh deserted save by those whom Lady Gathorne would call the canaille?

It is a wedding that has recalled the family to their mansion in London. The Morning Post has already informed the fashionable world that "a marriage has been arranged between the Honorable Fitzwilliam Spendfast, fifth son of the Earl of—, and Gertrude Cecilia, only daughter of Sir Theodore and Lady Gathorne," and the ceremony of tying the nuptial knot is to be solemnized in St. George's Church, Hanover Square, on the morrow, with the due accompaniment of eight bridesmaids attired in dresses couleur de rose.

A casual visitor, on entering the drawing-room, would see at once that a wedding is at hand. On an ottoman is a box of bridal favors, white satin and leaves, with about as much depth of silver upon them as there is of real affection in the hearts of those about to vow, before Heaven, love to each other "till death us do part." Two large tables are adorned with wedding presents—bracelets, and envelope-cases, silver candelabra, carved card-cases, and elegant trifles. But the eyes of half a dozen ladies present are all directed toward the bride, or rather to the dress which she has been trying on, and has come down-stairs to display. The readers may imagine it, with its train of ivory satin and flounces of real Brussels lace, as it will be described, a few days later, in a fashionable lady's paper.

"Perfection, simply perfection!" cried Mrs. Delany, as the bride, by no means dissatisfied with the reflection, glanced at herself in a large mirror which was one of the ornaments of the room. "And how well poor Juliet's diamonds and pearls become you; they are just the thing for a bride!"

Yes, that was Juliet's necklace, inherited from her grandmother, which adorned the white neck of the bride; Juliet's diamond spray brooch that rested on the rich ivory satin; Juliet's bracelets that sparkled on Gertrude's wrists. And Juliet's five thousand pounds, divided between her sisters, had much to do with the elegancies of the coming wedding. Sir Theodore always lived up to his income, or a little beyond it, and the expenses of milliner, confectioner, and other tradesmen employed on the grand occasion would not have been easily met but for the windfall which, Lady Gathorne pathetically observed, had come in such a very sad way! Juliet's money is to pay for the costly trousseau, the carriage and pair spoken of as a magnificent gift from Gertrude's father, and the grand piano which is a wedding present from her aunt, Mrs. Delany.

The door opens, and a powdered footman, in livery of scarlet and green, brings in two letters on a silver salver.

"I declare, the letters give me quite a turn!" cries Lady Gathorne, "the handwriting is so like that of poor Juliet!"

"Exactly, one could have sworn to it!" cried Mrs. Delany; looking over her sister's shoulder, "and the postmark is London!"

Lady Gathorne broke the seal of the first letter, and gave such a start as she read the beginning, that the second epistle dropped from her hand, and lay unnoticed at her feet. She rather screamed than read aloud, "My dear Sisters; it is from Juliet, indeed!"

Every one in the room gathered around in eager curiosity on hearing the exclamation. Even the bride forgot her train, and crushed her flounces, pressing between two cousins who had stood between herself and her mother.

"Where is it dated from—where is it dated from?" she breathlessly cried out.

"Eschol, Labrador."

"It must be some heartless joke!" exclaimed one of the cousins.

"No joke at all," said Lady Gathorne, and she read aloud, to an interested audience, Juliet's account of her shipwreck, her voyage in the fishing-vessel, and landing on the Labrador coast. The lady was often interrupted by exclamations of "wonderful!" "thrilling!" "most romantic!" but not once by an earnest "thank God!"

"But where is she now—where is she now?" the postmark is "London," cried the bride. "Is there not a word of her return—of her plans? How could she send the letter? Why has she not come herself?"

"I can't see anything about it," said Lady Gathorne; "there is a long, mercilessly long, list of commissions."

"Perhaps this will tell us something," said Mrs. Delany, picking up the second letter from the ground. "How well one knows Juliet's seal—the impression of that seal which she always wore on her chain!"

Lady Gathorne eagerly took the second letter (the commissions might wait), and opening it, read aloud the following note:

"MY DEAR SISTERS: My first letter will have informed you of my merciful preservation from a terrible death, for which I was totally unprepared. This, if it ever reach you, will tell you of more blessings poured into my cup. I have met here, in Labrador, with one with whom I have consented to share the rest of my life."

"In Labrador! a bear's den! what a place for a wedding!" exclaimed Gertie Gathorne. The other ladies exchanged looks of surprise.

"Read on—read on!" burst from several lips, as the astonished reader paused. Lady Gathorne went on:

"I cannot expect that you, dear sisters, will approve of, or understand, my entering on a course of life so very, very different from what you—or I myself—ever expected. I am to remain as a missionary here."

"A what?" exclaimed every voice in amazement, as if no one could credit her own ears.

"For he to whom I trust to be united next July is one of the noble Moravian Brethren, who devote their lives to spreading the Gospel among the poor Esquimaux."

"She is crazed—perfectly crazed!" exclaimed Mrs. Delany; while Gertrude threw herself down on a chair, convulsed with laughter, which was so infectious that her aunt could not help joining in it with the rest of the ladies, except Lady Gathorne, who was too angry to laugh.

"To think of one of our family so degrading herself!" cried the indignant woman of the world.

"Then the list of commissions is doubtless for the bride's outfit—one would be curious to see the items required for a Labrador trousseau," said the youngest lady present, possessing herself of the first letter.

"Read it pro bono publico," cried another of the bridesmaids.

"First item: 'five hundred yards of thick red flannel.'"

"Five hundred!" was echoed around; "surely it must be fifty!"

"A small but fine-toned church organ formed to endure a climate where the thermometer sinks below zero."

"Poor Juliet!" exclaimed one of the ladies.

"Then here come directions about a double set of linens, plain and good, one to be marked Anna S., and the other J. E. But—but here is the oddest thing of all!"—the reader paused, for her mirth made it difficult to bring out the words—"a doll-house."

"Juliet has gone mad!" exclaimed Mrs. Delany.

The reader went on rapidly with the list of boxes fitted with thread, needles, bobbins, and tape—knives, scissors, and many other articles more or less needful, till she stopped in amazement at "a large strong axe."

"That will be for chopping up wood; I wonder if Juliet means to perform that duty herself," cried Gertrude, with a satirical laugh.

"I still think that the whole thing must be a hoax," said the incredulous cousin.

"It is no hoax at all!" cried Lady Gathorne, who had impatiently taken the letter out of the hand of the reader, and was now, with flushed face and knitted brow, perusing its contents.

"It is a regular business affair, signed and countersigned by witnesses, too! 'I request that all my money be placed in the hands of the Managing Committee of the United Brethren, who will yearly forward to us according to our need.'"

"The will, for I can call it nothing else, must be disputed!" cried Mrs. Delany.

"Nor are the jewels forgotten!" exclaimed Lady Gathorne, biting her lip with vexation.

"Look here! 'My jewels must all be sold; as they are valuable, the money which they will bring will go far to cover the expense of my various commissions, including fifty pounds to be forwarded to the Rev. J. Selden, of Carey Vicarage, Devon.'"

The bride petulantly unclasped the diamond necklace which she wore, and threw it down on the ottoman near.

"Will you fulfil all these commissions?" asked a bridesmaid; "there seem a good many more on the list."

"I will never go bargaining about the sale of paltry jewels, or trouble myself with the purchase of tapes, flannel, and rep," exclaimed Lady Gathorne, haughtily. "Cecilia, I will make over the list to you!"

"I wash my hands of it!" cried Mrs. Delany.

"If these Brethren—whatever they call themselves—are to have charge of the money, they may have charge of the commissions, too!" said Lady Gathorne. "Juliet has chosen to break away from all her early associations—she has cast in her lot with Esquimaux—I never wish to hear her name uttered again."

The lady had not recovered her temper or spirits even on her daughter's wedding-day; and Sir Theodore certainly lost his when long bills from milliner, coachmaker, etc., came in.

Juliet's commissions were far more carefully and economically executed by the Moravians than they would have been by her sisters. The warm-hearted Brethren exulted over the mighty rolls of flannel, and rejoiced in selecting the sweetest-toned organ for the little Labrador church. One thing that Juliet had sent for she was not allowed to pay for.

"She asks for a Bible," said Fritz's father, who had read with more than usual interest and pleasure this year his son's annual journal dispatch. "The most beautiful copy that I can find in London shall go to my new daughter as a wedding gift from the most thankful of fathers."

He was truly thankful. He had sufficient acquaintance with human nature to be aware that such a commission as he and his brethren attempted to execute the year before involved a heavy responsibility. Fathers do often choose wives for their sons, and are sometimes more ready to choose than their sons are to acquiesce in the choice; but to the Moravian father the task had been one calling for much anxious thought and earnest prayer. The choice had been made, and at the last hour it seemed that it had been wrongly made. The chosen one could not go, and the father had found it difficult to understand the leadings of Providence. Having sought God's guidance, and acted as He supposed in accordance with the light given him, it appeared strange that the arrangement should break down when it was too late to find another lady suitable and willing to become his son's wife. The ways of Providence were mysterious to the old man, but he had walked with God too long to doubt that all things were working together for good. He did not understand, but he could trust.

Now all was explained. He could see why he had been led to choose the lady who proved unfit for the sphere of labor, and why her unfitness had not been manifested until the last moment. His son's letter showed that the marriage would have clouded his whole future life, and on his knees the father thanked God for frustrating his plans. Of Juliet's fitness for the relationship there could be no doubt, since the brethren at the mission and the captain of the Harmony indorsed the glowing report of Fritz. And then it had pleased God to give wealth in addition to spiritual gifts. The cause would be benefited, for already the lady was consecrating her money to the Lord's service. He spoke truly when he spoke of himself as the most thankful of fathers. He thanked God most sincerely, and prayed for a blessing on the young couple far away.

The blessing descended on the little mission home among the pines. There, even when the days were shortening, and the departure of the winged tribes gave notice that winter was at hand, Juliet had no cause to envy the lot of her relatives in a milder clime. The fair Gertie, with expensive tastes but narrow means, trying vainly to forget her difficulties, and get rid of the ennui of a loveless life in the pleasures of the world, was far less happy than Juliet, busy from morn till night in the Labrador home.

There was now no painful restraint in her intercourse with Fritz. Young Edelstein, no longer constrained by honor and conscience to wrestle with his inclinations, and shun the presence of her whom he loved, showed all the frank joyousness of a genial nature. The pendulum of his feelings had been so powerfully drawn in the direction of self-restraint, that it rebounded into exuberance of spirits. No task seemed difficult, no effort painful.

Juliet's lessons in the Esquimaux language were resumed, and many a pause was made in them to talk over future plans, or to review with thankfulness both the blessings and trials of the past. Fritz saw with admiration which he could not conceal the cheerful courage with which Juliet faced the numerous hardships of her lot, making the inconveniences inseparable from Labrador life a subject of playful mirth.

"You are a good pupil," said Fritz to her one day, as they were busy over their little Labrador Grammar, "but there is one thing which I think that you never will learn."

"You think me so stupid, then, when I have mastered all these verbs!" said Juliet, gaily.

"What is it that I never will learn?"

"To grumble," was Fritz's smiling reply.

"Oh, but you have never tried to teach me! You have never mastered the art yourself."

"I have nothing on earth to grumble at!" exclaimed Fritz. "I had many blessings before, and now to all is added one of the richest, most precious gifts that man can receive or a kind Providence bestow."

"I remember some one—but she had more romance in her than religion—observing, that where there is mutual love there is nothing else needed for happiness," said Juliet; "she affirmed that to wish to add aught to such perfect bliss would be, as Shakespeare says, to gild refined gold or paint the lily."

"She forgot that it is the sunshine that makes the lily grow and the gold glitter," observed Fritz. "How unspeakably is our happiness enhanced by the knowledge that it is bestowed by Him who delights in making His people joyful."

"And that ours is a lily that will not wither—gold, that not even death can rob us of!" said Juliet, her eyes glistening with thankful tears.

In these happy days, when she realized what it is to have hearts united "in the Lord"—when she proved how different a Christian's deep, pure love is to that of the worldling. Juliet despised herself for the folly which had once held possession of her light and frivolous heart. How could she ever have been pleased by the empty flattering of Captain Fincham, or have felt gratified by the attentions of Dermot Denis! All her former bubbles had broken, but jewels lay in their place. With Juliet

"Love took up the harp of life, and smote on all its chords with might, Smote the chord of self, which, trembling, passed in music out of sight."

And the good pastor and Anna heartily sympathized with and shared in the happiness of their young friends.

JESUS THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 11, John 10: 1-18. Golden Text, ver. 11.

Characteristics of the Sheep—Negligent Shepherds—Only One True Shepherd—One Approach—Messengers Running Unsent—The Shepherd's Voice—Doubts about it—How to Be Sure—Jesus Going Before—The More Abundant Life—The Other Sheep.

"I AM the good Shepherd," said our blessed Lord, when He walked on earth. But more than a thousand years before He had said the same thing to the heart of David, and the sacred Psalmist from the fulness of his heart returned the answer, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps. 23: 1). Few there were in David's time who entered more fully into this relationship of God than did he, and few there are still whose freedom from all the burdens which try others, and whose constant confidence in God says, "The Lord has undertaken me; I shall not, do not, cannot know want in any respect whatever." The sheep is the most helpless and most defenceless of all animals, therefore the shepherd must do everything for it. It is not adventurous enough to find pasture for itself, therefore the Shepherd says, "I will feed My flock." Sheep cannot find their way alone, therefore He says, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick" (Ezek. 34: 15, 16).

Our blessed Lord spoke His parable of the good Shepherd to the Pharisees, who were offended with Him because He had healed the man born blind, and because He had done so on the Sabbath day. They were, professedly, the shepherds or leaders of the people, but the diseased had they not strengthened, nor healed that which was sick, nor bound up the broken; nor brought again that which was driven away, nor sought that which was lost (Ezek. 34: 4); and when a poor man, blind from his birth, was healed in their very midst, instead of rejoicing and congratulating him, they persecuted him. Theirs was no true shepherding.

Jesus said to them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." There is but one Shepherd of Christ's sheep. To approach them except through Jesus, in His name, in His authority, in His spirit, is to wrong Him and His sheep too.

"I AM THE DOOR:

by Me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture." "He that . . . climbeth up some other way" robs God and his own soul, and he can do nothing but steal, and kill, and destroy. "Ye have caused many to stumble at the law," is the Lord's condemnation of unspiritual pastors (Mal. 2: 8). Jeremiah says, "Mine heart within me is broken because of the prophets. . . . For both prophet and priest are profane; yea, in My house have I found their wickedness, saith the Lord. . . . I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem a horrible thing: they commit adultery, and walk in lies; they strengthen also the hands of evil doers, that none doth return from his wickedness" (Jer. 23: 9, 11, 14). What was at the root of all this terrible defection in the spiritual shepherds of Israel? It was that they had not entered the sheepfold by the Door; they had not come to God; they had not been sent by Him into the work; they had thrust themselves in all unprepared, and Satan had taken advantage, and made them the ministers of unrighteousness! It is an awful thing for a man to enter the ministry, or for a woman to take up any spiritual work (Sunday-school teaching or aught else), if he or she have not entered by the Door, and have not been sent of God to the work. "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied. But if they had stood in My counsel, and had caused My people to hear My words, then they should have

TURNUED THEM FROM THEIR EVIL WAYS and from the evil of their doings." Yet these were they who strengthened the hands of evil doers!

"But He that entereth by the Door is the Shepherd of the sheep." Can Jesus enter by Himself? Yes, truly; "by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place" (Heb. 9: 12). The under shepherds enter in only by Him. They are not mentioned in the parable. Why should they be? Only as they are one with Christ, only as they manifest Him, can they feed the flock; their office is to lead to Him. "To Him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear His voice; and He calleth His own sheep by name, and leadeth them out." An Eastern shepherd guides by his voice, whether by night or by day; it is essential, therefore, that the sheep shall know their Shepherd's voice. Perhaps the greatest mistakes which we make about guidance arise from a doubt about the Shepherd's voice. "How may I always know whether it is the Lord's voice which speaks to me, or whether it is the enemy?" said one. A friend answered, "You cannot always know; but you can ask Jesus, and He will tell you." There are many times when the voice of Jesus is so distinct that we cannot mistake it. But His voice always calls us to follow Him. "When He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him; for

THEY KNOW HIS VOICE."

His voice speaks His presence just at hand, just on before, making the way plain for His sheep. His voice makes it perfectly easy to follow Him. When, therefore, a suggestion arises to do some impossible, impracticable thing, with an awful sense of condemnation if we do not do it, which clouds out Jesus from our view, we may be sure that this voice is not His. The true sheep of Jesus will not follow a stranger; "they will flee from him; for they know not the voice of strangers." Nothing fills our hearts more with joy and praise than to know certainly the mind and will of God, and to have the presence of Jesus with us to perform His will. When, therefore, an impression which arises in our minds fills us with perplexity, it is either because, for some reason, we are not willing to do the will of God, and are kicking against that which He shows us, or it is because Satan is deceiving us and attempting to break our rest in the Lord by imitating the voice of Jesus, and so misleading us.

Wherever Jesus leads His own sheep, He always goes before them. We cannot have a temptation or a trial of any kind in which Jesus is not on before us. "In all their affliction He was afflicted" (Isa. 63: 9). He "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. 4: 15). But what about those who go before Jesus? "All that ever came before Me are thieves and robbers." Every bit of self-dependence, every dependence on others, everything that takes the place He is so jealous over, robs Him and robs His sheep, too. "The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy; I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep; and that, not by compulsion. "I lay down My life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." He came that we might have life, but it was "newness of life" (Rom. 6: 4), not a strengthening of our own life, but an impartation of His. "If when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son; much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life" (Rom. 5: 10). We are saved indeed from condemnation by the death and resurrection of Jesus, but only His life in us, that life more abundant, can save us from the power of sin day by day, as our life, our self, our will, yields before it. It is Christ's vocation to care that we have life, and equally so that we may have life more abundant. Let us trust Him with the care of it, and so, without any feeling, say to our souls, "I shall not want, for it is impossible that He should fail me." If He came that we "might have life . . . more abundantly," then He only waits to bring about that abundance in our hearts.

"I am the good Shepherd, and know Mine own, and Mine own know Me, even as the Father knoweth Me and I know the Father" (Rev. Ver.). Thank God, this is to know Jesus as He knows the Father, to know Him as He knows us. How do we come to know one another? It is not by a forced acquaintance, but by letting ourselves go out into sympathy and interest one with another. We form deeper acquaintance with Jesus as we acknowledge Him, listen to Him, refer to Him on all occasions, and take His word always for true. We never rightly know a man until we have trusted him, and so with Jesus—we know Him as we recognize Him, speak with Him, listen to Him, and, above all, venture upon Him. We may have to experience something of "the valley of the shadow of death," but if there we are occupied with Him, and know that the very "Light of the world" is with us, though we see only darkness and perplexity, we can still say, with David, "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me. Thy rod and Thy staff comfort me." But if we know Him, we follow Him. "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of My hand." There are many who profess to be Christ's sheep, and stand persistently on this word, who neither know Christ nor follow Him, but who follow their own wills and inclinations. Are not these they of whom Jesus says, "Not every one which saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 7: 21)?

AND THEY FOLLOW ME;

The Jews were not enough for the heart of Jesus; "other sheep I have which are not of this fold," He said. Seven hundred years before His Father had said to Him, "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be My Salvation unto the end of the earth." Thank God, the Gentiles are being gathered from all parts of the earth, and the good Shepherd is increasing His fold. Lord, go on, until Thou hast made up Thy bride and canst come again.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THY SWEET WILL.

Clouds that gather round my head
Seem the wings of God outspread;
Hours of thought and worldly care
Full of sweetest comfort are;
Words of bitterness and sneer
Fall like music on my ear.

Once I could not thus partake
Of each cup for Jesus' sake,
But I learned, one bitter day,
To look up and meekly say,
"Thy sweet will, dear Lord, not mine, Thy sweet will, and only Thine."

As the dear Christ on the sea
Hushed the billows, so to me
Did He speak, and gently say,
"Peace, my brother, peace away;"
And upon my soul He breathed,
I the peace of heaven received.

Like a quiet little child,
Striving to be meek and mild,
Day by day I try to take
All that comes for Jesus' sake.
On this thought my soul doth rest,
"God for me will do the best."

Oh! how easy now to see
All things are for good to me;
Pain and loss, or smile and cheer,
Christ in all is very dear;
For my heart is whispering still,
"Thy sweet will, Lord, thy sweet will."

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."
This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.
This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan address the Company, giving your nearest age, and a statement will be sent to you. Mention this paper.

Dr. JOSEPH WOLFF, the Jewish Missionary—Scenes in his Life.

Born in Franconia 1795—His Father's Opinion about Jesus—A Barber's Advice—Leaves Home—A Friendly Shepherd—Teaches Hebrew at Frankfort—Enters the University of Vienna in 1812—Baptism at Prague—Meeting with Mr. Haldane—Embarks for Gibraltar 1821—Missionary Experiences at Alexandria—Made Prisoner by Arabs—Earthquake at Aleppo—Bastinadoed by Kurds—Marriage—Flogged and Robbed in Khorassan—Death.

THE Jewish race in our day is like a magnificent cathedral that is being used as a market—a place in which the worship of mammon has superseded the worship of God. The race possesses still its old superiority of mental gifts. In every clime where Jews are to be found we hear of their prominence, and often the report is made with howls of execration and hatred. In the professions and in business they succeed, notwithstanding the prejudice against them. Their shrewdness, genius, and persistence give them the victory over obstacles that would be insurmountable to ordinary men. Though no longer the recognized leaders in spiritual matters, their powers are not dead, but slumbering, and the time is coming when they will awake, the veil will be taken from their eyes, and the gifts now used in sordid employment will be consecrated to the service of the Son of David. How much may yet be accomplished through their instrumentality when they accept Christ we can infer from a few bright examples. Such an example is that of the venerable Hebrew whose portrait appears on the first page. To him toil and travel, danger and hardship, were of no account if he could only preach Christ to the world. His life was so full of labor and successful service, that it is impossible even to summarize it; we can but give a few isolated incidents from it, which must serve as indications of the whole.

Joseph Wolff was a German. He was born near Forchheim, in Franconia, in 1795, and died on May 31st, 1862, at the age of sixty-seven. In 1802 his father removed to Ulfield, Bavaria, where he had been appointed rabbi of the Jewish synagogue. The child displayed, even at this early age, a bright and versatile intellect, listening with eager interest to the daily conversations in his father's house, where devout Hebrews assembled to talk of the glories of their far-off Zion, and of the prospects of the restoration of their people. These were favorite themes of his father, who never wearied of predicting the prosperous future of his nation, when "the true Messiah" should come.

Sometimes he spoke of Jesus of Nazareth, and always with profound respect. The boy heard him, and inquired who this Jesus was. "A man of the greatest talent," was the reply; "but because He pretended to be the Messiah, the Jewish tribunal sentenced Him to death." "Why, then," said

THE YOUTHFUL INQUIRER,

"why is Jerusalem in ruins, and why are we in exile?" "Alas, alas!" replied his father, "because the Jews murdered the prophets." Suddenly the thought flashed upon the boy, "Perhaps Jesus was also a prophet, and the Jews killed Him when He was innocent!" and it took such strong hold upon him, that whenever he passed a Christian church he would stand outside, listen to the preaching, hoping to learn more.

While he was occupied with these reflections, he made daily visits to the house of a neighboring barber-chirurgeon, to whom he often spoke of the Jewish faith. One day the old barber gravely said to him, "Dear boy, I will tell you who the real Messiah was: He was Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God, whom your ancestors crucified. Go home and read the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and you will be convinced that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." These words "entered like a flash of lightning into the boy's heart; conviction came to him suddenly; he believed and was dumb."

Returning home, he read the chapter in Hebrew, and then said to his father, "Dear father, tell me of whom does the prophet speak here?" His father gave him the current Jewish theory, but the boy was unconvinced. He continued to read and study until he was sent to Bamberg, where he studied at the Gymnasium, and there finding some Roman Catholic students, he sought from them Christian instruction.

He remained but a short time there. A spirit of roving and adventure took possession of him, and he set off toward Wurtzburg, without a farthing in his pocket. On his way he fell in with a shepherd, who proved to be a Roman Catholic, and he asked him to give him shelter for the night. The shepherd at once assented, and led him to his humble cottage. He then asked Wolff of what religion he was. The lad replied by giving him a short outline of his story, and after they had partaken of a frugal meal, the shepherd knelt down with his family to pray "for the good of the soul of this poor Jew." In the morning, before Wolff left, the shepherd said to him, "Friend, you are in distress; allow me to share with you what I have. I will give you a couple of florins, which will carry you well to Frankfort." (See Illustration No. 1.)

Wolff went to Frankfort, where he gained a bare livelihood by teaching Hebrew; thence to Halle, and finally to Weimar, where he had the privilege of sitting at the feet of Goethe. Toward the end of 1812, when he was in his seventeenth year, he at the hands of a Roman Catholic priest, and entered the University of Vienna. As a student, his fame increased, and he made his way into the highest circles of Vienna. A perusal of the life of Xavier inspired him with a fervent, and ultimately an irresistible desire to become a missionary, like the famous Jesuit, and to preach in every part of the world where his Jewish brethren were scattered the Gospel of Jesus.

After a brief residence at Tübingen, Wolff visited Rome, in 1816. As a convert from Judaism, he attracted much notice, and was introduced to Pope Pius VII., who treated him with marked favor. Young Wolff, however, carried away by the condescension of the Pontiff, forgot the difference of position, and by an act of familiarity horrified the court. (See Illustration No. 2.) Other acts of youthful levity followed, and after a short time it was thought best to get rid of the young man. One night messengers from the Vatican aroused him, hurried him into a carriage, and took him to Vienna. (See Illustration No. 3.)

After wandering for some time through Austria and Prussia, from monastery to monastery, he found his way into Switzerland, and thence into France. At Paris he made the acquaintance of the well-known Mr. Robert Haldane, who conceived a strong liking for the young man, and discerning his gifts, sent him to England, with introductions to eminent Protestant clergymen. Among these were Rev. Charles Simeon, the leader of the Evangelicals, Dr. Marsh, and Dr. Hawtrey. Under their teaching, he saw and abjured the errors of the Papacy, and henceforward became an earnest Protestant. Funds were found to support him at the University of Cambridge, and he went there to prepare for a missionary career. Two years later—in April, 1821—he being then twenty-six years of age. From that time on his life was consecrated to the work of preaching to his Jewish brethren Jesus of Nazareth, the Saviour of the world.

His first halting-place was at Alexandria, in Egypt, where he encountered an aged Polish Jew on his way to Jerusalem (see Illustration No. 4), to whom he preached Christ. In November, 1821, Wolff paid a visit to the Holy Land, and there met with a serious adventure at the outset of his journey. Just as the party had left the monastery on Mount Horeb they were captured by Arab brigands, who, finding that no ransom could be obtained for them, insisted on their going back to the monastery and getting the monks to pray for rain. They were conducted to the walls, and a colloquy was held. (See Illustration No. 5.) Prayers were promised, and the prisoners were soon after set at liberty.

AT JERUSALEM,

where Wolff arrived in 1822, he commenced active work of the severest kind, arguing with the rabbis and preaching Jesus in the streets. He often visited the place of wailing, joined in the prayers for the restoration of Jerusalem, and afterward spoke of Jesus to his fellow-worshippers there. (See Illustration No. 6.)

The missionary next proceeded to where he freely circulated copies of the Word of God in Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian. Leaving Aleppo for Latakia, Wolff halted for the night at the village of Jascea. Its inhabitants, the ancient Anzairees, offered him the shelter of their homes, but he preferred sleeping in the open air. The Anzairees and Wolff then smoked the customary pipe of peace together, while a party of Bedouin Arabs, who had their tents pitched close by, sat silent around their fires. Presently Wolff took out his Bible, and began to read from it to the Anzairees, when suddenly he felt something move under him, and he started to his feet with the feeling of terror that is produced by an earthquake. The ground moved with a sickening motion, and around them were falling houses and public buildings all cast to the earth in ruins. The next day they learned that Aleppo, Antioch, Latakia, Hama and Hama had suffered from the earthquake, and that large numbers of persons—some said sixty thousand—had been killed.

From this scene of wretchedness, after having rendered all the assistance in his power, Wolff went to Cyprus, and arrived there just after the massacre of the Christians of Nikosia by the Turks. He afterward travelled in Upper Egypt, preaching the Gospel among the Coptic inhabitants of Thebes and Assouan, and made a second visit to Jerusalem, where he engaged in Gospel work with increasing energy until checked by an attack of fever. On his recovery he revisited Aleppo, proceeding to Mesopotamia, visiting Haran and Padan-aram. On the road to Mardun he was taken prisoner by some Kurds, who robbed him of everything, and with two hundred strokes on the soles of his feet. But the undaunted missionary went joyfully forward, preaching Jesus Christ at every opportunity, and awing the wild tribes of the desert by his serene indifference to death. Next he ascended the Tigris to Bassora, and discovered a Jewish community, with whom he had much conversation about Christ. After visiting the Mandaye or Sabeans, he went on to Bushire, where and at Bussora he established a school for the Christian education of children. We find him next at Shiraz, the ancient capital of Persia, whence he journeyed on until he arrived at Constantinople in February, 1826. A brief respite from labor became necessary, and he therefore returned to England on a visit to his friend, Mr. Drummond. During this visit took place. He was introduced to Lady Georgiana Walpole, daughter of the Earl of Orford. Between the brilliant Christianized Hebrew and this accomplished daughter of a noble house a warm attachment sprang up, and in the following February they were married by the Rev. Charles Simeon. Accompanied by his wife, he resumed his wanderings, and by way of Gibraltar, Cadiz, and Lisbon, proceeded to Malta, where he went on alone to Smyrna, Athens, and the Ionian Islands. At Alexandria he was rejoined by his wife, and in May, 1828, they embarked for Beirut. After many adventures, they crossed the Syrian Desert to Gaza, and thence proceeded to Jerusalem, where some enemies made an attempt to poison the indefatigable and self-denying missionary. The attempt happily failed, but Wolff felt the effects of the poison for a year afterward. In July, 1829, Wolff and his wife were at Cyprus, where the latter fell dangerously ill with fever. On her recovery, they sailed for Alexandria. Leaving Lady Georgiana there with his friends, Wolff went to Salonica, Rhodes, Mitylene, Lemnos, and on to Mount Athos and Kartalia. Arriving in due course at Malta, he was rejoined by his wife and son, who has since become the famous British diplomatist, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, and on December 31st, 1830, he started for Bokhara. Having hired four camels, which he loaded with Bibles for distribution on the journey, and engaged two Persian servants for protection, he joined a caravan bound for Khorassan. (See Illustration No. 8.) On the way the devoted missionary was captured at a place called Sangford by a company of Turkoman marauders, and was stripped naked and

SEVERELY FLOGGED.

They then dragged him to Torbud-Hydarca, where they threw him into a dungeon; but eventually he obtained an audience of the Khan, and was allowed to purchase his freedom.

We next find him at Meshed, "the holy city," preaching the Gospel of Christ to both Jews and Mohammedans, and in February, 1832, he once more set out for Bokhara. Sarakhs, Merv, and the frozen Oxus being passed, he safely arrived at his destination, where in a mixed population of 180,000 persons he found 15,000 Jews. He spent some time there preaching, and then set out for Cabul. On the way he fell into the hands of Mohammedan marauders, who threatened him with death unless he became a Mohammedan. He refused, and expected nothing less than a prompt execution. His captors, however, spared his life, but took everything from him, even his clothes. He travelled slowly and painfully forward until he arrived at Cabul, where he was welcomed and relieved. He then proceeded to India, visiting most of the chief cities and towns, and arrived at Calcutta in March, 1833.

A VISIT TO THE UNITED STATES.

In August, 1837, Wolff visited the United States. At New York he was admitted to the diaconate, and later preached before the Houses of Congress. The following spring he was admitted to the priesthood by the Irish Bishop of Dromore, and having preached before the University of Dublin, the diploma of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him.

HIS LAST JOURNEY

was on an errand of mercy. In the year 1844, leaving home and family, he set out on a mission to the King or Ameer of Bokhara. His object was, if possible, to save the lives of two officers, named Stoddart and Conolly. His arrival, however, was too late to effect his humane mission. In his clergyman's gown, doctor's hood, and shovel-hat, which he wore for prudential reasons, Wolff presented so novel an appearance that crowds of curious sightseers frequented his tent. He wore these full canonicals all the way from Merv to Bokhara, being resolute never to lose sight of his dignity as a moollah, or priest, on which he saw clearly his safety depended. "I also kept," he says, "the Bible in my hand. I felt my power was in the Book, and that its might would sustain me." Wolff's account of

must be given in his own words. "On entering the audience chamber I was placed opposite 'the prince of believers,' as disagreeable-looking a fellow as I had ever seen. He stared at me, and I stared at him. He presently said, 'Come up-stairs to me, and I will look at you.' I went up and sat down opposite to him, and the King, swaying himself from right to left, looked at me all the while, scrutinizing me. Then he said, 'Thou eccentric man! thou star with a tail! neither like a Jew nor a Christian, nor like a Hindoo, nor like a Russian, nor like an Osbeg—thou art Joseph Wolff.'" (See Illustration No. 9.)

In April, 1845, Wolff once more reached England, and he finally ceased from his wandering to and fro upon the earth. The remainder of his life was usefully spent as Vicar of Isle Brewers, near Taunton. There, in the midst of self-denying labors, he passed away on May 5th, 1862, at the age of sixty-seven.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Wealthy Man's Confession.—Mr. Cumming, in speaking of the uselessness of riches recently, said: "A very wealthy man, perhaps one of the richest in Scotland at that time, said to me, 'You are as rich as I am.' 'No,' I said, 'I am not.' 'But I maintain that you are.' 'Yes,' I rejoined; 'but not in this world's goods.' But still he held that I was. 'You get all you want,' he said. 'If you had any more you would just have more anxiety, and more than you need is only vanity and vexation of spirit. Many men have envied me for the fortune which I have, but not many men would like the care it brings.' He was a Christian, but he might have been a better one."

A Gloomy Heart Made Glad.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews said: "During one of our prayer-meetings lately I noticed a young man who had just arrived from the country. It was laid upon my heart to speak to him, and at the close I said to him, 'I would just like to know how it is with you, my young friend.' He shook his head sorrowfully, but did not speak, and then I guessed that all was not right, that he was not at peace with God through faith in Jesus Christ. I called one of our friends and asked him to lay the Gospel plainly before him. About half an hour afterward I was asked to come in and see the bright face, and shake hands with the lad, for he had found Jesus to be his Saviour."

Singing in a North-East Wind.—Mr. Bamford, a devoted Christian friend, observed: "The other night, when a cold north-east wind was blowing, there were twelve men standing singing, at our open-air meeting, a sweet Gospel hymn. Less than a year ago eleven of those men were intemperate, and far down in sin, and that night by their singing they were the means of leading four souls into our evangelistic hall, who saw their need of salvation, and gave their hearts to Christ. So we have proof after proof that God can and does forgive and cleanse the most wicked, and even qualify and use them for His glory in leading others into the joy of His great Salvation."

A Negligent Lighthouse Keeper.—Sergeant Mather said: "There was a lighthouse keeper who had the light, which should have been shining brightly to warn mariners of their danger, very dimly lighted—scarcely visible. A vessel steering its course homeward noticed the dim light, and when they got to land the captain at once went to the Board of Trade, reported the case, and lodged a complaint against the lighthouse-keeper, who was at once called to account for his carelessness. He could not give any reason for it, pleading that he was not aware such was the case. Dear Christian friends, shall it be said in heaven that your light is shining dimly, that it is scarcely perceptible by the mariners who are steering their way through a dangerous channel?"

Who Broke the Window?—The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie said: "Love your enemies" is good advice. I heard the story of a boy who had learned this very difficult lesson. He was only an errand-boy, and much disliked by the other boys in the same house of business, because he would not join them in planning mischief, and wasting their master's time. One day they set upon the poor boy as he passed, and threw stones at him. But they hit more than they bargained for, for one stone missed its mark, and broke a shop-window. Then all these cowardly boys fled, and when the enraged shopman came out to ascertain who had done the mischief, there was only the boy whom they had injured. 'Who broke the window?' demanded the shopman. 'I do not know,' said the boy, 'but I will pay for it.' Much doubting, the shopkeeper, who was a rough, godless man, went to the boy's master to make sure that the boy would keep his word. But there was no need for that; he was a Christian, and meant what he said. Week after week the boy, out of his scanty earnings, went with a shilling to the shopkeeper until the price of the window was paid. The shopkeeper saw the Christ-like action; his hard heart was touched. His wife, one day, found him in tears, and he told her that through the self-denying action of that boy he was led to give himself to Christ. That boy is now a man, and all is well with him, because he had early given his heart to the Lord."

A Reprieve on the Scaffold.—Mr. Somerville remarked: "Some time ago I heard of a man who was condemned to execution, but who built himself up in the hope of getting a reprieve. But his hopes were not likely to be realized. About two minutes before the time for his appointed execution a messenger arrived to say that no reprieve could be granted, and the execution was to go on. But though it was so near, it had not taken place, when another messenger arrived in breathless haste with the long-looked-for pardon. Thus, dear unforgiven and condemned sinner, sunk though you are in hopelessness and despair, know that for you there is a pardon, full and free; despond, then, no longer, but 'look unto Jesus, and be ye saved.' 'The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanses from all sin.'"

A Godly Clerk's Influence.—Mr. R. B. Stewart observed: "On one occasion when aboard a steamer, I spoke to a gentleman about the concerns of his soul, and his reply was, 'I suppose you are one of those simple fellows who believe everything that is in the Bible.' 'That is just what I am,' I replied. 'What is therein,' he rejoined, 'may or may not be facts, but it is the godly consistent life of one of the clerks in my office that attracts me; I cannot get over that; it is that which holds me back from becoming altogether an infidel.' Oh, how the world looks on and watches closely the Christian's life, to see if it harmonizes in all things with the profession which has been made! 'Be ye therefore not hearers only, but also doers of the word.' 'Living epistles of Christ, know and read of all men.'"

"The Manliest Young Men in the City."—A friend reports that a good work has been going on among young men, the sons of merchants, residing in Pollokshields, Glasgow. He said: "The converts are nearly all between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two. The awakening is largely due to the efforts of a young Glasgow merchant, who, addressing himself to the young men of his own class, exhorted them in a manly way to become Christians, and not to think of religion as fit only for women and weaklings. 'Go to my uncle,' he said one night, 'the head of our firm, and ask him if I am not a better business man now than I was nine years ago; go to my friends and ask them if I am not a better friend than I was then. I attribute it all to my religion. I am happier and I am better in health than I was before I decided to be Christ's. And no one can deny that among the young men who have recently come out on Christ's side in our city are the very manliest young men in our midst.'"

A Good Thing Done at Last.—The Rev. Mr. M'Kay reported: "We have had some Gospel meetings lately with the very happiest results. There were two young men whom I had been watching for some time, who were striving against God. At length, one night, I saw that in one of them a great change had taken place: yes, a saving change, out of darkness into the marvellous light of God. With him old things had passed away and all things had become new. The second one was the son of one of my office-bearers, and the eldest and only one of the family who was unsaved. I told him that he was fighting against God so long as he would not yield his heart to Him. Nothing seemed to move him, until last Sunday night he could resist no longer; he broke down completely, repenting deeply for trying so long to resist the strivings of the Holy Spirit, and that night he sweetly rested his weary soul on the word of God. I was telling this case to two friends, when they joyfully exclaimed, 'Thank God, we have been praying for that young man, and now God has graciously answered our prayer.'"

VOICES OF GARDENS AND FIELDS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, July 4, 1886.*

"My beloved is to me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi."—SONG OF SOLOMON I : 14.

Criticisms on Solomon's Poem—This Century Unfit to Criticize—Floral Representations of Christ—The Camphire Plant as a Symbol—I. By its Fragrance—The Import of Names—The Child Alarmed at an Eclipse—Experience of Great Men—II. It Gives Coloring—Grace in Business—III. It is a Restorative—For the Dying—For the Backslider—The Ghastliest Thing on Earth—Fragments of a Regiment—The Deathless Place.

SOLOMON'S song has been considered by many as fit only for moonstruck sentimentalists; written by a voluptuary, the story of a man crazed by a fair maiden; fit neither for family prayers nor for church. Indeed, we must admit that there were years in Solomon's life when he had several hundred more wives than he was entitled to; but he repented of his sin, and God chose him to write some of the best things about Christ that have ever been written. Besides that, I think the

upon the immodesty of the Bible comes with poor grace from a century in which the writings of George Sand come to their fortieth edition, and Christians cannot get to the prayer-meeting because they have tickets for places of amusement so depraved that they make the "Black Crook" respectable. I think, however, as far as I can see, in my stupidity, that there are things turned out upon the community to-day that bid fair to do more damage than the Song of Solomon.

Hear, now, one of his fresh and fair descriptions of Jesus. If I had twenty years to preach, I would like to employ ten of them in bringing out to observation those representations of Christ that have as yet been passed by. I do not know why the pulpit should hover over a few types of Christ when there are so many symbols of Jesus that have never been discoursed upon. Why should we employ all our time in examining a few lilies when the Bible is filled with fuchsias, and with daffodils, and with amaranths, and with evening primroses for the close of life's day, and crocuses at the foot of the snow bank of sorrow, and heart's-ease for the troubled, and passion-flowers planted at the foot of a cross, and morning-glories spreading out under the splendors of the breaking day? Some years ago I discoursed to you about "the white hairs of Jesus," and some of the newspapers supposed it was a mere fancy of my own—the poor fools not knowing that in Revelation, the first and the fourteenth, the Bible speaks of Christ—"His head and His hairs were white like wool, as white as snow"—symbolizing the eternity of Jesus.

Terraced on the side of the mountain were the vineyards of Engedi. Oh, they were sweet places! From a shelving of the mountain, four hundred feet high, waters came down in beautiful baptism on the faces of the leaves; the grapes intoxicate with their own wine; pomegranates with juices bursting from the rind; all fruits, and flowers, and aromatic woods—among the sweetest of these

of the text. Its flowers are in clusters like our lilac—graceful, fragrant, symbolical of Jesus; for "my beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

I. I will carry out the idea of my text, and in the first place show you that this camphire plant of the text was a symbol of Christ, because of its fragrance. If I had a branch of it and should wave it in your midst, it would fill all the house with its redolence. The camphor, as we have it, is offensive to some; but the camphire plant of the text had a fragrance gracious to all. The vineyards of Engedi bathed in it—the branches, the buds, the blossoms, dripping with sweetness, typical of the sweetness of Christ.

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer's ear!
It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds,
And drives away his fear."

The name of Cæsar means power; the name of Herod means cruelty; the name of Alexander means conquest; the name of Demosthenes means eloquence; the name of Milton means poetry; the name of Benjamin West means painting; the name of Phidias means sculpture; the name of Beethoven means music; the name of Howard means reform; but the name of Christ means love. It is that ever melted from lip or heart. As you open an old chest that has long been closed, the first thing that strikes you is the perfume of the herbs that were packed amid the clothing; so there are hundreds of hearts here which, if opened, would first offer to you the name of Jesus. Have you not seen Him? Through the dark night of your sin has He not flashed upon your vision? Beautiful when He comes to help, beautiful when He comes to save. A little child was crying very much during the time of an eclipse. It got so dark at noon that she was afraid and kept sobbing, and could not be silenced, until after awhile the sun came out again, and she clapped her hands, and said, "Oh, the sun! the sun!" Some of us have been in the darkness of our sin; eclipse after eclipse has passed over our soul; but after awhile the Sun of Righteousness poured His beams upon our hearts, and we cried, "The sun! the sun!"

Beautiful dawn in the straw of the Bethlehem khan! Beautiful in His mother's shawl, a fugitive to Egypt! Beautiful with His feet in the Galilean surf! Beautiful with the children hanging about His neck!

BEAUTIFUL IN THE HOME

circle of Bethany! Fairer than the sons of men; dayspring from on high; light for those who sit in darkness; rose of Sharon; lily-of-the-valley—altogether lovely! Oh, He is such a sinner-sunder, such a trouble-soother, such a wound-binder, such a grave-breaker, that the faintest pronunciation of His name rouses up all the incense of the garden and all the perfume of the tropics, while the soul, in ecstasy of affection, cries out, "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

FELT BY GREAT MINDS.

But how shall I talk of the sweetness of Christ's pardon to those who have never felt it; of the sweetness of His comfort to those who have refused His promise; of the sweetness of His face to those who have turned their back upon His love? Now, a great many people may think this is merely sickly sentimentalism. Jonathan Edwards was a cool man. He was harsh in some of his opinions, he was never afflicted with any sentimental ardor; and yet, when the name of Christ was mentioned, it threw him into a transport. Paul was a cool logician, with nerves unshaken in the Mediterranean shipwreck, a granitic nature, comfortable with the whole world against him, shaking his fist in the face of the governments of earth and the forces of darkness; yet the thought of Christ thrilled him, transported him, overwhelmed him. John Knox was unbending in his nature, and hard in some respects. The flash of his indignation made the queen shiver and the duchess quake; yet he sat down as a little child at the feet of Jesus.

Solomon was surrounded by all palatial splendor—his ships going out from Ezion-geber on voyages of three years, bringing back all the wonders of the world; his parks afloat with myrrh and frankincense and a-rustle with trees brought from foreign lands; the traces of his stupendous gardens found by the traveller at this day. Solomon sits down in this place to think of Christ, the altogether lovely and the altogether fair; and while seated, there comes a breath of the spices and aromatic woods and of the blossoms in through the palace window, and he cries out, "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

Oh, rich and rare, exquisite and EVERLASTING PERFUME!

Let it be in every poor man's windows; plant it on every grave; put its leaves under every dying head; wreath its blossoms for every garland; wave its branches in every home; and when I am about to die, and my hand lies cold, and stiff, and white upon the pillow, let some plain and humble soul come and put in my dying grasp this living branch with clusters "of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

It is many years now since I found the Lord, and I must in your presence tell you how good He has been to my soul. Often since then I have given Him a hard thrust in His sore side; but He has been patient with me by day and by night. It is the grief of my life that I have treated Him so badly; but He has never let me go. I have seen no wonderful sights, I have heard no wonderful sounds, I have no marvelous experience; it has been a plain story of patience on His part and of unworthiness on my part. Some of my dear friends before me have had more rapturous experiences. Christ to them has been the conqueror on the white horse, or the Sun of Righteousness, setting everything ablaze with light, or the Bridegroom, coming with lantern and torches. To me it has been a very quiet and undemonstrative experience. It has been something very sweet but very still. How shall I describe it? I have it now, "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

II. But I remark further: This camphire plant of the text was a symbol of Christ in the fact that

IT GIVES COLORING.

From the Mediterranean to the Ganges the people of the East gathered it, dried the leaves, pulverized them, and then used them as a dye for beautifying garments or their own persons. It was that fact that gave the camphire plant of the text its commercial value in the time of King Solomon; a type of my Lord Jesus, who beautifies and adorns and colors everything He touches.

I have no faith in that man's conversion whose religion does not color his entire life. It was intended so to do. If a man has the grace of God in his heart, it ought to show itself in the life. There ought to be this "cluster of camphire" in the ledger, in the roll of Government securities, in the medical prescription, in the law book. A religion is of no value to a merchant unless it keeps him from putting false labels on his goods; or to the plasterer, unless it keeps him from putting up a ceiling which he knows will crack in six months; or to the driver, unless it keeps him from lashing his horses to eight miles an hour when the thermometer is at ninety; or to the farmer, unless it keeps him from putting the only sound pippins on the top of the barrel; or to the shoemaker, unless it keeps him from substituting brown paper for good leather in the soles. In other words, the religion of Christ is good for everything or it is good for nothing.

The grace of God never affects us by piecemeal. If the heart is changed the head is changed, and the liver is changed, and the spleen is changed, and the hands are changed, and the feet are changed, and the store is changed, and the house is changed, and everything over which the man has any influence comes to a complete and radical change. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is not a pot of hyacinth to be set in a parlor bay-window for passers-by to look at, and to be examined only by ourselves when we have company; but it is to be a perfume filling all the room of the heart as "a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi."

The trouble is men do not take their religion with them. The merchant leaves it outside the counter, lest it disturb the goods. The house-keeper will not let her religion trail its robes in the kitchen on washing-day. The philosopher will not let his religion come in amid the batteries, lest it get a galvanic shock. But I tell you, unless your religion goes with you everywhere, it goes nowhere. That religion was intended to color all the heart and the life.

* This sermon is the first of a series of rural sermons, suggested by the scenes among which Dr. Talmage is spending his vacation.

But, mark you, it was a bright color. For the most part it was made of this camphire plant, one of the most brilliant of all the colors; and so the religion of Jesus Christ casts no blackness or gloom upon the soul. It brightens up life; it brightens up everything. There is no more religion in a funeral than there is in a wedding; no more religion in tears than in smiles. David was no better when he said he cried out of the depths of hell than he was when he said that his mouth was filled with laughter and his tongue with singing. The best men that I have ever known have laughed the loudest. Religion was intended to brighten up all our character. Take out the sprig of cypress from your coat and put in "a cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi." Religion's "ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." I have found it so. There are hundreds in this house who have found it so.

III. I remark again, that the camphire plant was a symbol of Jesus Christ, because it is

A MIGHTY RESTORATIVE.

You know that there is nothing that starts respiration so soon in one who has fainted as camphor, as we have it. Put upon a sponge or handkerchief, the effects are almost immediate. Well, this camphire plant of the text, though somewhat different from that which we have, was a pungent aromatic, and in that respect it becomes a type of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the mightiest of all restoratives. I have carried this Camphire plant into the sick-room, after the doctors had held their consultation and said there was no hope and nothing more could be done, and the soul brightened up under the spiritual restorative. There is no fever, no marasmus, no neuralgia, no consumption, no disease of the body that the grace of God will not help.

I wish that over every bed of pain and through every hospital of distress we might swing this "cluster of camphire from the vineyards of Engedi." Christ's hand is the softest pillow, Christ's pardon is the strongest stimulus, Christ's comfort is the mightiest anodyne, Christ's salvation is the grandest restorative. It makes a man mightier than his physical distress.

"Art thou weary? Art thou languid? Art thou sore distressed?"

'Come to me,' saith One—and coming, be at rest. If I ask Him to receive me, will He say me nay? Not till earth, and not till heaven pass away.

Finding, following, keeping, struggling, is He sure to bless?

Saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs, answer—"Yes!"

Nero tarred and put pitch upon the Christians of his day, and then set them on fire, that they might illumine the night round about the palace; but while they were burning and the crowd beneath were jeering, louder than all the noise went up the song of praise and triumph from the dying martyrs. John Bradford came out in the presence of the instrument of torture that was to put him to death, and said, "I am a Christian now. I have never been before." And so, again and again, the Lion of Judah's tribe has torn to pieces the wild beasts of martyrdom.

This grace is also a restorative

FOR THE BACKSLIDER.

Who do you mean by that? you say. I mean you who used to frequent the house of God, but seldom go there now; you who once used to pray, but never pray now; you who once sat at the holy communion, but take not the Lord's cup now; I mean you who once rejoiced in Christian society, but now sit amid scoffers. Backslider! Oh, what a suggestive word! Backslider! From what have you slid back? You have slid back from your father's faith, from your early good habits. You have been sliding back from Christ, from the cross—sliding back from Heaven.

When a man begins to slide he knows not where he will go. You have been sliding back toward darkness. You have been sliding back toward an unblessed grave, toward a precipice, the first ten million miles of which downward are only a small part of the eternal plunge. You were, perhaps, professors in the country; you have made shipwreck in the town. It may be that the club blasted you; it may be that fashionable society destroyed you; it may be the kind of wife whom you married. You have no more hope for Heaven now than if you had lived in Central Asia and never heard of Christ and the judgment.

Oh, where is that Bible you used to read? Where is that room where you used to pray? What have you done with that Jesus whose voice you once heard? Oh, murdered hours! Oh, massacred privileges! Oh, dead opportunities! Wake up now and shriek in that man's ear until he shall rouse himself from the horrible somnambulism, walking as he does, fast asleep, within an inch of hell. Oh, that he might cry out now: "Golden Sabbaths, come back! Communion seasons, come back! Wooings of the Holy Ghost, come back!" But they will not come. Gone! gone! gone! Sorrow will come, but not they. Oh, that you might save the few remaining years of your life, and consecrate them to Christ! I have seen sad sights, I have heard sad sounds; but I tell you outside the gates of the damned is a backslider's death-bed. Do you not feel like having applied to your soul this divine restorative? Do you not feel like crying out with David: "Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation?" For great sin, great pardon. For deep wounds, omnipotent surgery. For deaf ears, a divine aurist. For blind eyes, a heavenly oculist. For the dead in sin, the upheaval of a great resurrection.

But in the heavenly world we shall feel the chief restorative power of religion. This is a planet of weeping we are living on. We enter upon life with a cry and leave it with a long sigh. If I could gather up the griefs of this audience and put them in one sentence and then utter it, it would make everything between here and the throne of God shudder and howl. The earth is gashed deep with graves. As at the close of the war, sometimes we saw a regiment of one hundred and fifty men, the men that went out, so, as I stand before you, I cannot but realize the fact that you are the fragments representing hundreds of regiments of joyful associations that have been broken up forever. Oh, this is a world of sorrow! But, blessed be God! there will be no sorrow in Heaven. The undertaker will have to have some other business there. In the summer-time our cities have bills of mortality which are frightful—sometimes in New York a thousand deaths in a week; sometimes it has been two thousand in London; but in that great heavenly city there will be not a single case of sickness or death; not one black dress of mourning, but plenty of white robes of joy; hand-shaking of welcome, but none of separation. Why, if one trouble should attempt to enter Heaven, the shining police of the city would put it under everlasting arrest. If all the sorrows of life, mailed and sworded under Apollyon, should attempt to force that gate, one company from the tower would strike them back howling to the pit. Room in Heaven for all the raptures that ever knocked at the gate, but no room for the smallest annoyance, though slight as a summer insect. Doxology, but no dirge. Banqueting, but no "funeral baked meats."

NO DARKNESS AT ALL;

no grief at all; no sickness at all; no death at all. A soul waking up in that place will say: "Can it be that I am here? Will my head never ache again? Shall I never stumble over a grave again? Will I never say good-by to loved ones again? Can it be possible that the stream is past, that the bank is gained, that the glory is begun? Show me Jesus that I may kiss His feet." When the clock of Christian suffering has run down, it will never be wound up again. Amid the vineyards of the heavenly Engedi, that will be restoration without any relapse. That will be "The Saints' Everlasting Rest!"

A SERVICE OF PERIL IN BRAZIL.

UNDER date of Bahia, May 14th, the Rev. J. B. Kolb, writing to the Foreign Missionary, says: "After Dr. Blackford's return from Lorangeiras, in Sergipe, where he had been so badly treated, it was deemed proper that we should visit and remain in the same town for some weeks.

"It was with some trepidation that we approached Lorangeiras, but remembering the 'promises,' we landed. We were met by two or three of the believers, one of them a leading merchant, Senor David, and were by them escorted through the town to the house which we were to occupy, but never a word was spoken or thing done against us. But a few weeks before Dr. Blackford's life had been threatened, and a mob of hundreds of people escorted our colporteur to his home with clubs and stones, and tore up his books, throwing them into the river. Surely the Holy Spirit had quieted the troubled waters. The same quiet continued throughout our stay. When we arrived at our new home we found it all nicely furnished, a bountiful meal on the table, a cook in the kitchen, and a supply of food, all showing much forethought on the part of the brethren. You can imagine how much rejoiced the brethren were to have a pastor among them again.

"The first Sabbath there was a happy day. The services were well attended, fifty to sixty persons being present morning and evening. The attendance continued with the same interest until the end of our visit; at times our audiences were limited by the size of the room."

AN ANXIOUS NIGHT IN MEXICO.

IN the course of a letter published in the Foreign Missionary from Rev. E. M. Haymaker, describing a journey across the Sierra Madre, he says: "Our next trip out from Tlaltenango was to the rancho of Picacho and the city of Teul, one of the ancient residences of the Toltecs of historic note. Here we found an interesting congregation of only twenty-nine in number, but of unusual intelligence. This congregation has raised $60 to go toward the purchase of their church. Preaching here and visiting some ranchos in which there are beginnings of work, we returned to Tlaltenango, which we left on the following Monday morning. On our return we passed through the city of Colotlan, where we learned of three families of Creyentes (believers), and a little further on we heard of another believer who had become Protestant by reading his Bible. On our next trip it is our intention to hunt him up, not merely to get him, but because he is a man of considerable influence and great force of character, and also is well known among the Indians of the mountains, where we wish to get a foothold.

"We also passed on our return through the rancho del Fraile (of the Friar). A few years ago this rancho turned out one of the fiercest mobs that has ever been witnessed in Mexico. They caught a native minister and two Creyentes, and had the fire made and the victims stripped when the authorities arrived and persuaded the mob to give them over into the hands of the law, to be dealt with in the legal way, which they consented to do on the condition that they should be executed on the following morning. During the night, however, the authorities managed to contrive an escape for them, and the mob went home vowing vengeance at some future day. On this trip we passed the night here, and though we did not know whether they would cook us or not, nothing happened save that one stone was thrown against the house, and a good many looks were given that were considerably harder than the stone."

A NATIVE CHRISTIAN FARMER IN CHINA.

IN a letter from Ningpo to the Foreign Missionary the Rev. George F. Fitch relates an incident as an illustration of the work that is done by converts to Christianity. He says: It is among the people settled on the shores of Hangchow Bay, between the fourth and fifth dikes, the poorest people I have yet come upon, even in China, that the Gospel has found a fertile soil, and there is the most encouraging work going on that it has yet been my privilege to witness. A few years ago a native Christian, a member of one of our churches, an unlettered man, went to live among them—not as a paid agent, but a pioneer farmer, seeking to reclaim the waste land and obtain a living. In the course of time he brought to the church with which he was connected, which was some five or six miles away, nine applicants for baptism. The pastor was doubtful about receiving them at first, and proposed that they be tested, suggesting that each try to get another person to become a Christian. In the course of a year the nine came bringing nine more as fruits of their labors and proofs of their sincerity. The first nine were then received, and all exhorted to continue their efforts to secure more converts. To-day there are over twenty members in that region and some forty inquirers.

TWO MORE MARTYRS IN AFRICA.

THE massacre of Bishop Hannington on the borders of Uganda, Central Africa, has been followed by the death of the Rev. John Houghton and his wife, missionaries in the Galla country, at the hands of members of the Massai tribe. The particulars of the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Houghton have not yet been received, but from statements in a letter of Mrs. Houghton to her brother in England, it is believed that the motive of the murderers was money. Mrs. Houghton wrote as follows:

"We have been much unsettled ever since our arrival, partly owing to the difficulties inherent in missionary life, and partly owing to the excessive demands upon us by the chief and people here. This is an expensive mission, and we need to be careful. They have had a lot of money from the mission, and seem to regard us only as a means of supply. My husband has shown to them our true position, and tried to stop their constant begging, with results not very pleasing at first, but now they are much quieter and more respectful. To be on good terms with these people you must needs give much. We have given the chief a present, but it was not enough."

Mrs. Houghton was the first white woman ever seen in that part of Africa. With no European missionaries nearer than Mombasa she and her husband were quite isolated.

A PECULIAR TRIBE IN INDIA.

THE Rev. S. Knowles writes in the Indian Witness of May 22d an exhaustive description of the tribe of Tharus, among whom the Gospel has recently been preached with glorious success. He says: "The Tharus are the children of the forest; and live in the cleared opened spaces to be found in the Oudh and Nepaul jungles, stretching from Bhagwanpur to the foot of the mountains on one side, and from Pachperwa to the Bahraich borders on the other. They are the best agriculturists in the land. They cultivate rice for food and wheat for the market. They also own large herds of cattle, which graze on the outskirts of the forest, where they are often successfully attacked by tigers and panthers. Though the men and boys go about almost in a nude state, with only a piece of cloth hanging loose in front, held by a string fastened round the waist, yet the wives and daughters are so well clothed, that only the arms and feet are left exposed. They say the husband and wife never quarrel! A respectable Banya from Pachperwa, whom we baptized, and who has traded among them for years, assured me of this as a fact. This is not because the women are kept under; for they seem as free and independent as the men. A Tharu woman will look as straight at you when you speak to her as a European woman would do. I notice another good trait in the social character of these people. The parents seem as fond of the girls as the boys, and make no degrading distinction between them, as the natives of the plains make.

"Their religion is as simple as themselves. A very primitive piece of wood, in the shape of a Mahadeo-stone, near which is erected a long stick with a bit of red cloth fastened to the top, is all they have as an object of worship; and I found very few in a village paid any attention to even this. They have some idea of a Supreme Being they call Narain, who gives them sunshine, and rain, and harvests; but they have no proper idea how this great, far-off Being is to be approached or worshipped.

"The Tharus burn their dead; but have no particular ceremony over it. Their marriage custom is a very primitive thing. The bride and bridegroom simply join hands together before their elders, and they are husband and wife. There are feasting and drinking, of course, wherever the ceremony takes place. The Tharus make their principal intoxicating drink from rice. This rice-liquor is drunk more or less every day; and every member of the family, from the oldest to the youngest, drinks it.

"Every now and then they have a big nach, or dance, of a very debasing kind. In it they act a regular play, in which there is a plot and grand finale. A Nepaul prince, who carries off a beautiful Tharu girl, figure in this play. The women take part in it; and I am told that the curtain might better fall over the last act. The Tharus proper have no caste among them; but they are divided into tribes or clans. The three principal are the Dangwariya, the Jogi, and the Umra. Our work has been altogether confined to the first tribe, nearly the whole of whom have been won over to our faith and baptized."

ARMAGEDDON.

THE PREPARATION AND FIRST STAGE OF THE BATTLE.

By Rev. Capel Molyneux, B.A.

Baseless Hopes of Peace—The Greatest Battle in History Yet to be Fought—The Situation—Descriptive Predictions—The Two Stages—Antichrist's Purpose—His Preparations—The Intensity of the Siege—The Results of the Battle—The Saved Multitude.

"WHEN ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars," saith our Lord, speaking in reference to the latter times—"when ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars, be ye not troubled; for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet!" War in perfection is yet to come. "Overturn, overturn, overturn," till He comes, whose it shall be "to make wars to cease unto the end of the earth;" then there shall be peace indeed; men "shall learn war no more," and peace, even universal peace, shall prevail; for "the knowledge of the glory of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." But this, not yet—oh, no; not yet! As yet, "wars and rumors of wars," and, worst of all wars, "the battle of the great day of God Almighty!" This has yet to be fought, and to this, with what it immediately involves, I purpose now, the Lord helping me, to direct your attention.

THE SITUATION.

The Man of sin and the witnesses have appeared on the stage. The history of the witnesses closes in their death, resurrection, and ascension. Their end is supposed to occur toward the termination of the last three years and a half of Antichrist's power and reign, and, therefore, closely in connection with the battle of Armageddon; but whether previous to its actual commencement, or during the strife itself, I presume not to say. Now, however, is the time for the battle; during these three and a half years, or the latter portion of them, the preparation has been going on for "gathering the nations against Jerusalem," and there we are now to suppose their presence, Antichrist himself at their head.

The battle is plainly predicted in several passages of Scripture, notably in Rev. 16: 14. Ezekiel 38: 14, 15 also evidently refers to it. The following passages also foretell it, in significant and appalling terms: Jeremiah 4: 6, 7; Joel 3: 1; Zech. 14: 1, 2.

In regard to this battle it must be noticed, that it is, when fully viewed, divisible into

TWO PARTS, OR ACTS.

The first relates to the assault of Antichrist and the nations on Israel at Jerusalem; the second to the assault of Christ, and the host of heaven, conquering Antichrist and the nations. These parts or acts, essentially distinct as they are, when viewed in a cursory way, or, as it were, at a distance, seem but one; though upon a closer inspection the distinction between them is decided in the extreme, and as palpable as possible. The nations come up against the camp of the saints, mark! the camp of the saints! But will Jerusalem, as encompassed by nations under Antichrist, be the camp of saints? Verily, it will be the camp of unconverted, unbelieving Israelites; gathered in anger, and gathered for chastisement. The beast is at the head of the army of nations, commissioned there by God as the scourge of Israel; nor is he disposed of till the siege is closed, and the Lord Himself has made His appearance.

ANTICHRIST'S PURPOSE

is the gratification of savage revenge and terrible destruction. "It is in his heart to destroy!" Probably desperate enmity against Israel now burns in his heart. Israel has by this time rejected his yoke, and refused any longer allegiance to him. They have discovered, probably, in the setting up of "the abomination of desolation," if in nothing else, his true character, and the monstrous lie he has acted—that he is not the Messiah, the first-born of God, but the "son of perdition," the first-born of the father of lies! And all the hatred, and malignity, and revenge, which now, alas! actuate them against the true Christ, will then, with one accord, be transferred to the antichrist! "His heart is therefore to destroy!"

ANTICHRIST'S PREPARATIONS

for the battle are clearly revealed in Revelation 16: 13, 14: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." This is antichrist's, and his great energizer's, the devil's, preparation for the battle. Judge what will be the character of the assembled host; what the disposition and tendencies, actings and object, of the besiegers, schooled by such teachers, led on by such captains! Alas! for Israel when delivered up, as she shall be for a season, into their hands; no marvel that her trouble will be "great," even unequalled before or since.

NOTE THE INTENSITY OF THE SIEGE.

This we believe admits of no description. It stands alone in history—history past and future. It is once to occur, and but once—The Battle, The Great Day of God Almighty!—and will concentrate in itself all that can be comprehended in that truly solemn and significant expression. The terrible desolation and distress predicted in Deuteronomy 28, and realized already in no light measure in the siege under Titus, will, we believe, at Armageddon receive their perfect fulfillment.

THE RESULTS OF THE BATTLE will be first: A terrible destruction of many of Israel in the city and in the land, even two-thirds of the whole (Zech. 13: 8).

Secondly: The deep humiliation, repentance, and purification of the remnant of the "one third" who are spared and brought through the fire; and who receive the Lord at His coming with joy and gladness, and are subsequently commissioned to go forth and proclaim His name and glory to the isles and nations afar off (Isaiah 66).

Thirdly: Supreme self-exaltation, and pride to the uttermost, on the part of antichrist! Flushed with victory—for victory for the moment is his (Zech. 14: 2)—he will arrogate to himself more than ever what the nations will readily concede, the power and supremacy and glory of God. The shout of the world's assembly will, we verily believe, be nothing less than, "There is no God but antichrist, and antichrist is God!"

Fourthly: The salvation of the great multitude which I believe will be saved by means of the tribulation connected therewith. For the tribulation, though centring in Judea, will probably extend itself far beyond, and bring within its range multitudes in Christendom generally. The beast "has power over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations;" and all who refuse to worship his image, and bow down to him, he causes to be put to death (Rev. 13: 7, 15). And doubtless the number who suffer will be great, and doubtless also that number, great as it may be, who do so suffer, and suffer as they then do for Christ's sake, shall be included among the number of the saved, and glorified together with the Lord.

Such we believe will be found to be, substantially at least, the immediate results of the battle of Armageddon and the great tribulation; and these prepare the way for the coming of the Son of Man in the glory of His Father—the Deliverer of Israel and Destroyer of antichrist. This glorious subject awaits our consideration in another lecture. In the mean time bear in mind the point in prophetic history at which we stand—the battle of Armageddon in its first act is closed; antichrist and the nations have taken the city; two parts of Israel in the land are destroyed; the third part spared, but in terrible distress, in the enemy's power, exposed to terrible atrocities (Zech. 14: 2), and anxiously looking for help and deliverance. Also multitudes of all nations, slain for Christ's sake during the tribulation, ready with the rest of the saints, whether living or dead, to meet the Lord when He comes, and together with Him to execute judgment on apostate Christendom—this is the point at which we stand, and here we close for the present.

SAM JONES ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

From a Sermon at Indianapolis.

(Specially Reported for the Christian Herald.)

THE trouble with America to-day is that America's conscience is dead. Our national conscience is dead. Our State conscience is dead. Our municipal conscience is dead. I will tell you if the Lord God will come down on Indianapolis to-night and burst the tombstone off of her conscience, and take her out of her grave, and bring her forth a living conscience, if a justice of the peace fined a man one dollar for keeping his bar-room open on Sunday, he would be impeached and run out of the settlement in twenty-four hours. And yet, since we have been in this town, it is a published fact in your newspapers that a liquor dealer was fined one dollar for keeping his bar-room open on Sunday. I believe if a fellow was to violate a law of hell and some justice of the peace down there was to fine him a dollar out of his kingdom. Do you reckon, if the devil was a justice of the peace, he would trot a fellow through for a dollar? Now, understand me, I don't blame the justice of the peace or the court at all. A judge and a justice of the peace always act, in their judicial conduct, upon a level with the conscience of the community. Understand me, now, right square up, and I will tell you the reason why I think that dollar business pleases you all. You have not said a word about it since. That is pretty good evidence, is it not?

What does your city council charge for selling liquor? A hundred dollars a year. Let us put it in this shape. Suppose I walk up to the mayor to-morrow and say, "I want to open a bar-room here, and if you and the council will grant me the privilege to make drunkards out of every one of your boys for a hundred dollars, I will give you the hundred dollars." What would your council and what would your mayor say to me? The mayor would say to me, "If you come to me talking about making drunkards out of my boys, old fellow, I will put my fist aside of your head," or "I will put a bullet through you." But you know that every fellow he licenses he licenses to make drunkards out of everybody else's boy in town. Don't you know that?

the boys are marching, sixty thousand a year, into a drunkard's grave, and Indianapolis is furnishing her pro rata. And for every old drunkard that tumbles into his grave these recruiting officers of hell, these bar-rooms, are around drumming up your boys to fill up the ranks; and the mayor and your aldermen give them the privilege of debauching, dooming, and damning your husbands and your children for a hundred dollars apiece. That is a big business. Over in some States they run a higher license. I would just as soon put a high license on highway robbery, or murder, or small-pox, or cholera, I had. I would as lief let one fellow pay a big license, and do all the killing for the State. Just let him go around and shoot just whom or anybody down that he wants to, and if anybody went to bother him, let him say, "I am the only man in the State that can pay the license, and for this license that I pay I can kill anybody that I please." A fellow going around with a basket of old small-pox scabs and peddling them around, offering them to your children, you say to him, "Here, don't you do that. Don't bring those things into my home, sir." He says, "Oh, but I have a right to; I have paid a license; I have a license to sell these things." Let me tell you I would rather a man would sell small-pox to my boy than to sell whiskey. Small-pox kills the body only, but whiskey kills both body and soul and puts the soul in hell forever.

Now, I believe, if I was going to sell liquor, I would come to Indianapolis. You have quite a nice city here. You have got nice councilmen and nice aldermen. I don't know how many of them belong to the church. I don't know whether your mayor belongs to the church. I don't know his name nor who he is, but I will tell you if ever I sold whiskey I would want to go to a town where the mayor was a Presbyterian elder, and the councilmen were Methodist stewards, and the board of aldermen were Baptist deacons. I would get my license signed up and take it home and say to my wife, "Preserve that, put that in the trunk, and lock it up well, and when I die, I want them to with me," and when the trump should wake me from the dead, the first thing I would think about would be my license; and when God summoned me before the great white throne and showed me the devastation I had made among the children of men, I would pull out my license and say, "Lord, I didn't know it was any harm; here is my license, signed by Presbyterian elders, Methodist stewards, and Baptist deacons;" and God Almighty will put the whole shebang in hell together. Now you mark that.

You have got this liquor question in a great muddle here in Indiana. Let me tell you, we fired our gun down in old Georgia, and you will hear it reverberating all over this country pretty soon, if you have not already heard it here. We have stripped it of politics down there. Now, in our counties where we have elections, the tickets read this way, "For whiskey"—"Against whiskey." And as I have told them on the stump down in Georgia, when a fellow can walk up and vote one of those tickets "for whiskey" he is

ELEVEN TENTHS DOG.

All the human in him is dog, and the animal is turned to dog, too, and he is just dog all over. You strip politics out of this question up here in Indiana, and vote on it as simply a moral question. If you want it here, vote it in, and if you don't want it, vote it out. That is the way to do it. We have got it out of twenty counties in Georgia. We have got seven counties left and we are manufacturing in those counties, and we are just going to walk them out.

You Indiana people come to the front and put it out forever. I know there are some fellows here that will not stay with you, if you put whiskey out. Well, God bless them, let them emigrate. We don't want them, nohow. That is what I told them down in Georgia. "If you fellows don't want to stay in a sober State, we will furnish you emigrant tickets anywhere you want to go; we don't want you nohow; you need never have come to start with." That is the way we feel about it. And we want to wake up the conscience of this country on the liquor question. Hear me, my brother, it is your conscience that must be stirred on that. It is not a question of how many men are engaged in it. It is not a question of how many bushels of grain are distilled up. We can put up with all that. But these precious wives are tired seeing their husbands stagger home, and these poor mothers are tired seeing their boys stagger into the drunkard's grave. It is

and death, and hell. It is not a question of money, and grain, and dollars and cents. Now they say wherever I go, "Jones is a fanatic on whiskey, on prohibition." I will tell why. I used to drink it somewhat, but I have tried a sober life, and if you ever looked into the face of a sober man you see one now. A hundred gallons of what I drink now wouldn't make a man drunk in a year, and I intend to die sober, no matter where or how I die. I said when I was preaching in Chattanooga, nobody but an infernal fool will drink liquor, and nobody but an infernal scoundrel will sell it. Some folks got angry at that, and talked about riding the boy on a rail next day. They said it was a hard saying for a preacher to make. Why, Jesus Christ said some things sometimes Himself that He would not have said if He had had a better crowd listening to Him. If He had been preaching to angels He wouldn't have said anything about adultery. You see, you have to come down to your crowd. You have to put the fodder on the ground, where everything can reach it, from a giraffe to a goat. I said to those Chattanooga people, "Some of you liquor men are mad at what I said. If you will meet me in a body I will take you to a certain place where our knock will be answered, and when we get we will see a poor, pale, desolate woman, and get her to give us the history of her married life. We will look around at the ragged, hungry children and get her to tell us that her husband is in the penitentiary for life, for murder committed while drunk, and if you put your ear to her side, you will hear the drip, drip of the blood from her breaking heart. If you go with me and then want me to take it back as untrue, on my knees next morning before ten thousand people, I will." But they wouldn't come and make that visit with me.

Every element of anarchy and riot is fed by the fuel that liquor puts in it. If I wanted to muster an army that the devil would not lead, or could not let into hell, until it was disbanded, I would open my recruiting offices in every bar-room in the country. Oh, Lord, stir our consciences on this liquor question until we will stand up for these women and children of our land who suffer by the traffic; and if the men do not do away with it, I trust that God and the good women will put it out of this country forever. Thirteen years ago I walked up to the bedside of my dying father, who wished to bid his boy good-by. "My poor, wayward boy," he said, "you have given me more trouble than all my other children. Will you promise your dying father to meet him in heaven?" "Yes," I said, "I will," and, glory to God that every wilful step I have taken since has been toward that better world.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement for the Fiscal Year, which closed June 30th, is a much more gratifying record than was expected in the depressed state of business. The debt proper has been decreased during the year by $44,612,286. The cash in the Treasury has been increased in the same period $51,485,479. The gold and gold bullion in the Treasury have been increased during the year $36,494,853. And the silver dollars and silver bullion on hand have increased during the year $28,308,488, while 13,000,000 more of the silver dollars are in circulation now than at this time last year. The statement also shows an increase of revenue over that of last year of about $12,500,000, and a decrease in the expenditures of about $14,500,000. The increase of revenue is chiefly from customs receipts, which are about $11,000,000 more; the increase in internal revenue is $4,500,000, while under the head of miscellaneous there is an actual decrease of $3,000,000. The ordinary expenses are $22,400,000 less than last year, interest is nearly $1,000,000 less, but the account is brought up by the increase of pensions, which are $8,600,000 more than last year.

The Pan-Electric Telephone Investigation by the committee appointed by the House has ended in the presentation of three reports. Mr. Garland and his colleagues in the Pan-Electric business are acquitted in one report, which is signed by four Democratic members of the committee; they are condemned, in a second report signed by the four Republican members; while Mr. Hale, a Democratic member, disagrees with all his fellow-members and presents a report embodying his own individual views. Practically, therefore, there is no report from the committee, as no report is signed by a majority. It is not a gratifying fact for the Attorney-General nor for the nation that the investigation ends in a hung jury. A man occupying so exalted a position ought to have been above suspicion of using a public office for his private advantage, and if suspicion did arise, so thorough an investigation as that now completed should have established his innocence, even with his enemies.

Mr. Randall's Scheme for the Reform of the tariff has, as is usual with every proposal on that subject, caused much dispute as to its probable effects if it should become law. Mr. Morrison, who must be recognized as an authority in matters of fact, even by persons who do not share his opinions, maintains that Mr. Randall's reductions of the tariff would really increase it, and if they had been in force last year the increase would have been five millions. On the other hand, Mr. Morrison thinks that Mr. Randall underestimates the effect of the changes he proposes to make in the Internal Revenue. Mr. Morrison places the reduction at thirty-six millions, while Mr. Randall figures it at twenty mil-ions. The tax on tobacco which Mr. Randall proposes to abolish in all its forms, and to remove all restrictions on its sale, would alone, in his rival's opinion, involve a loss of twenty-six millions. The additions to the present free list are squared timber, boards and lumber in the rough, hubs for wheels, staves, and wood of all kinds in the rough, jute butts, and bristles. The bill taken as a whole has the appearance of having been prepared for campaign purposes rather than for legislation. It will, however, serve a useful purpose in showing what is the extent of reform deemed necessary by the protective wing of the Democratic Party. The majority of the Republicans in Congress are opposed to any change.

The Pennsylvania Republican Convention, which assembled at Harrisburg on Thursday last, was chiefly remarkable for the prominence of the Prohibition question. Several leaders, notably Colonel Quay, whose grasp on Pennsylvanian politics has been tightening for some time, strongly advocated the insertion of a Prohibition plank in the platform, and warned the delegates privately and in convention that by neglecting to do so they would render a large split in the party inevitable. The plank was opposed chiefly by the delegates from Allegheny County, which gives from fifteen to twenty thousand Republican majority on a full vote. They alleged that any plank favoring prohibition would demoralize the party in their district. The fight was a very spirited and persistent one, but eventually Colonel Quay succeeded, and the platform contains this plank: Whereas there is an evident desire on the part of a large number of intelligent and respectable citizens of Pennsylvania to amend the Constitution by inserting a clause prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage within the limits of this Commonwealth, therefore resolved, that it is the opinion and judgment of this Convention that the Legislature of the State should at once adopt measures providing for the submission of this great question to a vote of the people in accordance with the true spirit of our free institutions. The other planks are of the regulation pattern, denouncing the President and all Democratic men and things, and pledging the party to protection. The candidates are the machine men, with General Beaver at the head of the ticket as the candidate for the governorship.

A Handsome Gift to Employees Comes from Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt. At a meeting of directors of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, held on June 30th, a letter was read from Mr. Vanderbilt asking them to appropriate a lot of unoccupied land in their possession for the benefit of the employees. He said: "I have had plans prepared for a building eighty feet front by forty feet in depth, to be used for the benefit of railroad men in the service of the companies centring at the Grand Central Depot. It will be a substantial structure, with bath-rooms and gymnasium in the basement; reading-room, library, room for games and offices on the first floor; a large hall for general meetings and rooms for classes on the second floor, and rooms for janitor's family and sleeping-rooms for men coming in late or detained in the city over night in the upper story. I wish you to lay before the Board of Directors this proposition: If the company will set apart the land at the corner of Madison Avenue and Forty-fifth Street for the uses and purposes for which such a building would be erected, I will bear all the expenses of construction and of fitting and furnishing it ready for use."

A Refuge for Women in New York City, is deserving of notice both by liberal Christian people and by Christians of other cities who are anxious to do good to the bodies as well as the souls of their needy sisters. It was established three years ago by a few benevolent persons at 207 East Forty-second Street, and since that time it has sheltered many thousand homeless women and found employment and help for large numbers. Its efficient matron gives daily care and counsel to many a burdened spirit. The house is open until ten P.M., and accommodates forty-four women at the nominal price of twenty cents per night each. It has a free bath, library, sitting-rooms, piano, sewing-machines, etc. A plain, but clean and nicely prepared meal is served. Many grateful letters are received from former inmates, and from the friends of others in their distant homes throughout the country.

The Elections in Great Britain last Week demonstrated only one fact, and that is that the contest will be a very close one. Several members were re-elected without opposition. Among them were Mr. Gladstone, Mr. A. W. Peel, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Healy, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Chamberlain. One hundred and fifty members in all were elected, of whom thirty-nine are supporters of Mr. Gladstone. The most interesting contest was one in Scotland. It was the effort to re-elect a man of the name of Jacks by the people of Leith. Jacks is a Liberal who voted against Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule question. His personal influence was so strong in the borough that it was supposed he would be elected in spite of the ill-feeling produced by his vote. The electors, however, failing to get any candidate to oppose him, deliberately nominated Mr. Gladstone himself, though he was already secure of his old seat for Midlothian, and elected him. That will, of course, necessitate another election either at Leith or Midlothian, but the Premier's triumph may be regarded as an indication that the seat will be won by an adherent pledged to his support.

The Most Conspicuous Feature of the Stump speeches of Parliamentary candidates is the personal assaults on Mr. Gladstone. We are accustomed to personalities in this country, but hitherto in England it has been the policy of a statesman that has been assailed rather than the man himself. In this case, however, the attack has been fierce and unrelenting. Even Mr. John Bright has joined in the fray with his most caustic utterances, and Mr. Gladstone has on two occasions felt it necessary to call his attention in private letters to errors of fact into which his political animosity has led him. Mr. Bright, with a little personal vanity pardonable in so old a man, was careful in one of his speeches to point out that he was never "a follower" of Mr. Gladstone, though he had more than once been his colleague. Mr. Chamberlain, who is the most active of the Liberals who are opposing Mr. Gladstone, has surprised his friends throughout the country by his speeches. It was supposed that he was a gentleman even by those who would not admit that he was a statesman. His speeches now prove that he lacks the qualities of a gentleman. They are full of coarse vulgarity.

The Government of Bavaria has Passed peacefully into the hands of the Regent in spite of the discontent of some sections of the people. On June 28th he was formally inaugurated, and took the oath of office administered by the Minister of Justice. Afterward Herr von Franstein, the President of the Reichsrath, made a short speech, alluding to the mournful circumstances inaugurating the regency, but expressing confidence in the Regent's devotion to the national interests, and that he would faithfully uphold the treaties, which for sixteen years had held together the different branches of the Germanic race, and would, as a worthy scion of the House of Wittelsbach, maintain intact and unimpaired the rights of Bavaria.

Uneasiness on the Eastern Question is Still felt in the Cabinets of Europe. It is mainly due to the plots of Russia, who is trying to foment a quarrel between Turkey and Prince Alexander, of Bulgaria. Chakir Pasha has lately reported that he received several hints from Russia respecting Turkish apathy with regard to the Prince's proceedings, also the failure to meet the indemnity payments now due. Meanwhile Germany makes a favorable demonstration by directing Radowitz in the name of the Emperor to compliment the Turkish wounded. Turkey reciprocates by promoting all German officers in the service of the Porte.

A McAll Mission for Chicago is a Project conceived by Mr. Moody. It is stated by the Witness that in October Mr. Moody expects to return to Chicago and devote three months to establishing permanent missions throughout the city, on the plan of the McAll Mission in Paris. In these missions services will be held every evening, and will be made self-supporting, if possible. At Mr. Moody's school in Northfield, there are between three and four hundred young men now preparing for missionary work, many of whom will be stationed in Chicago to carry forward the enterprise of evangelization.

The Old Orchard Convention for Christian Life and Work and Divine Healing will be held on the Old Orchard Camp-grounds, Old Orchard, near Portland, Me., for ten days—from Sabbath, August 1st, to Tuesday, August 10th, 1886. The meetings will, it is expected, combine the educational and evangelistic idea with the spiritual and devotional. A certain portion of every day will be devoted to systematic addresses and instructions upon Christian Truth, Life, and Work, especially the doctrines of Spiritual Holiness, Divine Healing, and the Lord's Coming, and the great themes of Christian missions and evangelistic work. An earnest effort will also be made to reach by evangelistic services the great masses who throng this popular resort. Return tickets at reduced rates can be obtained by writing to Rev. I. Luce, Old Orchard, Me., or at the railroad depots in Boston.

Two Large Donations to the Cause of Christ are announced, both of which are for objects urgently needed. The first is a gift of $45,000 by Miss Catherine Wolfe, of New York, for the purpose of buying a vacant church in the city for the use of the Italian Mission. The large number of Italians now here renders mission work among them a matter of necessity, and the efforts of the evangelists in that field have been cramped by the need of a church home, which through this generous lady's munificence is now provided. The second gift is also from a lady, but her name is not disclosed. She has placed in the hands of Rev. H. S. Hoffman and Mr. C. M. Morton the sum of $200,000 for the purpose of establishing in West Philadelphia a divinity school for the Reformed Episcopal Church. With the seminary a church is to be established, and the parish and seminary are to be so connected that the pastors shall be Professors, and the young students are to assist in parochial work.

The United States Christian Commission desire to call attention to their forthcoming reunion (the seventh) at Allegheny Valley Camp-ground, near Pittsburgh, Pa. The convention is to open at 2 P.M. on Thursday, July 29th, and to continue in session four days. An effort is being made for a central organization, to become a centre for information and concert of action, with different departments, ready with accredited committees to meet any emergency; also the location of known and experienced persons ready to take charge of and superintend the distribution of supplies and moneys when and wherever needed. The secretary is John O. Foster, 1509 Wolfram Street, North Chicago, Ill.

The Gospel Wagon to be Used by Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea was dedicated last week in Brooklyn. It is a substantial road wagon, covered over, with the exception of about two feet of the front, which is protected by a hood. On the top are two lamps. The dashboard is so arranged that it can be turned down so as, with the turned-over seat, to make a good-sized platform. The back part of the wagon will be filled with Bibles and tracts. The evangelist proposes to drive about the city until he reaches a likely spot, when he will stop, arrange his platform, distribute tracts, and, under the form of recommending his Bibles, which he will sell for a nominal sum, preach to the crowds which he expects will collect. The wagon cost $310.35. The horse has not been bought as yet. The one hitched to the wagon can be had for $200 and a set of harness for $35. As peddlers are allowed by the city laws to declaim as much as they choose in selling their wares, it may be hoped that Mr. Schiverea will in future be able to preach as a peddler, without the molestation under which he has been suffering of late.

A Costly Curse was Uttered in New York last week. A truckman who uses many horses has an agreement with the horse market to take back any horses that he finds unsuitable for his business after purchasing. He bought a horse for $250 two weeks ago; which, though worth the money for lighter work, was of no use to him. He lost patience after trying him for a few days, and calling one of his men, who happened to be a new hand, and who did not know of his arrangement, told him to take the horse back to the market, adding a curse, from which the man inferred that his employer did not care what became of the animal. Arriving at the market, the only man there was also in ignorance of the arrangement and refused to admit the horse, whereupon the horse's keeper, not knowing what to do with him, and supposing him to be worthless, took him to the offal dock and left him there. The offal dock-keeper, thinking the horse must be hopelessly diseased, killed him, and sent him with the offal to Barren Island. Now the truckman learns that his imprecation cost him just $250. It would be a good thing if this loss led him to reflect on the wickedness of profanity and the far heavier punishment that awaits those who wantonly break God's commandments (Ps. 109 : 17, 18).

A Heroic Mother Saved Her Child from death at Fankford, Mo., a few days ago. The child, a little girl only three years old, eluded her mother's vigilance, and trotted out into the forbidden ground at the back of the house, where there was a well containing nine feet of water. With the perversity common in children, the girl made straight for the well, and, impelled by curiosity, peered down into its depths. One piercing cry was heard, and the child disappeared. The mother heard, and divining what had occurred, rushed to the well, and saw the child rise to the surface of the water, which was ten feet from the edge. Instantly the mother jumped, and steadying herself by the rope, grasped her child, and raised it above the water. She fixed the child's feet firmly on a projecting ledge of the wall, and keeping herself above water by clinging to the rope, she began calling for help. After long waiting her cries were heard, and both mother and child were saved. The mother must have known when she leaped into the well that there was small chance of her coming out alive; but maternal love was stronger than the instinct of self-preservation. Many mothers would do the same thing in the same circumstances, but who would do it for a stranger? Who for an enemy? What, then, must be the love which God commends toward us! (Rom. 5 : 8.)

An Extraordinary Prayer in a Hurricane was offered by a gentleman in Kansas City, Mo., recently. The Journal of that city says that when the terrible storm was raging there the other day, a gentleman took refuge in a house where several ladies were clinging to each other in abject terror. The storm increased and the house swayed before the wind as if it would fall. A window was blown in, and the ladies screamed and wrung their hands. Suddenly one of them came to the gentleman and besought him to offer up prayer. In a moment he was surrounded by the others, all begging him to pray. He was much agitated himself, and besides it was many years since he had prayed or heard any one else pray. But the ladies would not be denied, so he knelt with them. He wanted to pray, but words would not come. He could think of no suitable petition, and was dumb. At last, growing desperate, and without a thought of appropriateness, he uttered the words he remembered hearing his father use as a grace before meals, "Oh, Lord, make us thankful for that which we are about to receive." Almost instantly several bricks from a falling chimney fell into the room, and the party all started to their feet in confusion. Happily no one was hurt, so there was cause for thankfulness. The gentleman's predicament was unusual. Generally when in danger, if at no other time, prayers come from the heart. It too often happens, however, that at ordinary times, as in this case, the words uttered are an incantation rather than a prayer (Isa. 29 : 13, 14).

A Prodigal Father is in Trouble in Pennsylvania. On June 24th an aged man, whose long white hair hung on his shoulders, and who walked with feeble and uncertain steps, entered the city of Scranton, Pa., and inquired where a certain man lived. Some children directed him to the house of an industrious young blacksmith. On arriving there he knocked, and the blacksmith appeared. "I am your father," said the old man. "Do you not know me?" The blacksmith did not recognize him, but admitted that his father had disappeared twenty-four years ago, and that the old man was probably he. The old man told his story of wandering, weariness, and poverty, but the son answered that having left his wife and children to starve, he had forfeited all claim on them for support, and he must go to the poorhouse. It was a hard fate, but the father could not deny that it was just. Happily no fear of such a reception can be felt by wanderers from God, who also have forfeited every claim upon Him. A welcome is offered to all who come through Christ (Jer. 3 : 12).

A Train was Derailed by a Rat on the Consolidated Railroad recently. The Bridgeport Standard says that a singular accident has occurred there. The regular freight train, while passing East Bridgeport, came near the place where there is what is known to railroad men as a split switch. The all right signal was given by the switchman, who operates the switch from a little round-house built for the purpose. As the lever worked freely he was astonished to hear by the engine whistle that an accident had happened. Running to the spot, he found the train off the rails. He at once examined the switch, and discovered the cause of the catastrophe. A huge rat was caught in the jaws of the switch, and its body had prevented the two rails from completely closing. Providentially, the train was going very slowly when it left the rails, or there would have been a loss of life as well as of property. Rats have a bad record for destructiveness, but this is the first time one of them has been known to wreck a train. Insignificant causes often lead to great disasters in morals as well as on railroads. The sins men call small and venial are to be dreaded and watched against with vigilance lest they lead to spiritual disaster (Eccles. 10 : 1).

A Car Conductor's Patience and Forbearance were unexpectedly rewarded in New York last week. As a Fourth Avenue car was on its way down-town on July 1st, the conductor, an elderly man, while passing through the car to collect fares, accidentally trod on the foot of a foppishly-dressed young man, who had extended his legs across the car, and was gazing through the window. The conductor apologized, and returned to his place on the rear platform. The young man would not accept the apology, but poured forth a torrent of foul abuse on the old man, and kept it up until he left the car, some twenty minutes afterward. The conductor bore the attack good-naturedly, and refrained from recriminating. When he went to the car depot on his return trip he received a letter from an old lady who was a passenger in the car and witnessed the dispute. In it the lady expressed her admiration of his conduct under provocation, and enclosed ten dollars as a substantial mark of her esteem. The conductor was further told that should he ever be in need he might communicate with the writer, who would aid him. The lady, had she obeyed the maxims of the world, would have despised the conductor as a coward. In admiring and rewarding him she showed that her standard of excellence was that of the Bible (Prov. 16 : 32).

THE GLORIOUS HOPE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."—ROMANS 5: 5.

PENTECOST is repeated in the heart of every believer. Let me give you a little bit of historical analogy to illustrate the text. The Lord's disciples were made to sorrow at His cross. Sore was the tribulation which came upon them as they thought upon His death, and His burial in Joseph's sepulchre. But after a little patience and experience, their hope revived; for their Lord rose from the dead, and they beheld Him ascending into heaven. Their hopes were bright concerning their Lord, who had gone into glory, and had left them a promise to come again, and to make them partakers of His victory. After that hope had been begotten in them, they were in due time made partakers of the Holy Spirit, whose divine influence was shed abroad upon them, so that they were filled with His power. Then were they made bold. They were not ashamed of their hope, but proclaimed it by the preaching of Peter and the rest of them. The Holy Spirit had visited them, and therefore they fearlessly proclaimed to the world the Lord Jesus, their hope of glory.

Truly, history repeats itself. The history of our Lord is of the experience of all His people; that which happeneth to the First-born befalleth in measure all the brethren. We have before us in our text an admirable example. First comes our tribulation, our agony, our cross-bearing. Out of our patience and experience there arises in due season a blessed hope: we are quickened by our Lord's resurrection life, and come forth from our sorrow: He raiseth us up from the grave of our woe. Then comes the divine visitation of the Holy Ghost, and we enjoy our Pentecost: "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." I trust we know what this means, and are now enjoying it. Consequent upon that visitation, our hope becomes clear and assured, and we are led to make a full outspoken testimony concerning our hope, and that blessed One who is the substance of it. I hope that many of us have already proved that we are not ashamed, and that others of you will yet do so.

Now let me give you a little passage of experimental mystery. You have it here spread before you in a little

MAP OF THE INNER LIFE.

"Tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." This passage can only be fully understood by those people of God who have had it written in capital letters on their own hearts. "Tribulation worketh patience," says the apostle. Naturally it is not so. Tribulation worketh impatience, and impatience misses the fruit of experience, and sours into hopelessness. Ask many who have buried a dear child, or have lost their wealth, or have suffered pain of body, and they will tell you that the natural result of affliction is to produce irritation against Providence, rebellion against God, questioning, unbelief, petulance, and all sorts of evils. But what a wonderful alteration takes place when the heart is renewed by the Holy Spirit! Then, but not till then, tribulation worketh patience.

It comes to pass that this patience worketh in us experience; that is to say, the more we endure, the more we test the faithfulness of God, the more we prove His love, and the more we perceive His wisdom. He that hath never endured may believe in the sustaining power of grace, but he has never had experience of it. You must put to sea to know the skill of the divine Pilot, and you must be buffeted with tempest before you can know His power over winds and waves. How can we see Jesus in His full power unless there be a storm for Him to turn into a calm? Our patience works in us an experimental acquaintance with the truth, the faithfulness, the love, and the power of our God. We bow in patience, and then we rise in happy experience of Heavenly support. What better wealth can a man have than to be rich in experience? Experience teaches. This is the real High School for God's children.

The text runneth thus: "Hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." The apostle had worked up the subject till he came to the hope of glory. When he had reached that height he could not help saying somewhat concerning it. Turning away from his main subject, as is often his custom, he makes a diversion, and gives us a few glowing sentences upon the believer's hope.

I. First, then, consider

THE CONFIDENCE OF OUR HOPE.

We are not ashamed of our hope. Some persons have no hope, or only one of which they might justly be ashamed. Ask many who deny the Scriptures what is their hope for the future. "I shall die like a dog," says one. "When I'm dead there's an end of me." If I had such a wretched hope as that, I certainly would not go about the world proclaiming it. I should not think of gathering a large congregation like this, and saying to you, "Brethren, rejoice with me, for we are all to die like cats and dogs." It would never strike me as being a matter to be gloried in.

The Agnostic knows nothing, and therefore I suppose he hopes nothing. Here, also, I do not see much to stir enthusiasm. If I had no more hope than that, I should be ashamed. The Romanist's best hope when he dies is that he may come right in the end, but that meanwhile he will have to undergo the purging fires of purgatory. I do not know much about that place, for I cannot find mention of it in Holy Scripture; but those who know it well, because they invented it, and keep its keys, describe it as a dreary region, to which even great bishops and cardinals must go. I have seen, personally seen, invitations to the faithful to pray for the repose of the soul of a late eminent cardinal; and if such be the lot of the princes of the Church, where must ordinary people go?

There is no great excellence in this hope. I do not think I should call you all together in order to say to you, "Rejoice with me, for when we die we shall all go to purgatory." You would fail to see the special ground of rejoicing. I do not think I should say much about it; and when anybody questioned me thereon, I should endeavor to evade the point, and declare that it was a deep mystery, which had better be left to the clergy. But we are not ashamed of our hope, we Christian people, who believe that those believers who are absent from the body are present with the Lord. We look for a city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God. We are not ashamed to hope for glory, and immortality, and eternal life.

We are not ashamed of

THE OBJECT OF OUR HOPE.

We do not believe in gross carnal delights as making up our heaven. We do not believe in a Mahometan paradise of sensual delights, or we might very well be ashamed of our hope. Whatever imagery we may use, we intend thereby pure, holy, spiritual, and refined happiness, such as the False Prophet would not have regarded as a sufficient bait for his followers. Our hope is this: that our Lord will come a second time, and all His holy angels with Him; then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. We believe that if we fall asleep before that time we shall sleep in Jesus, and shall be blessed with Him. "To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise," is not for the thief only, but for all of us who have trusted our souls with the crucified Saviour.

COMPLETED MANHOOD.

At His coming we expect a glorious resurrection. When He shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the trump of the archangel, and the voice of God, then shall our souls be restored to our bodies, and our complete manhood shall live with Christ. We believe, and are sure, that from that day we shall be forever with Him. He will give us to be partakers of His throne, and of His crown, and of His heaven; and that forever and ever. The more we talk about the promised bliss, the more we feel that we could not be ashamed of the hope of glory.

Furthermore, we are not ashamed of the ground of our hope. Our hope rests upon the solemn promises of God, which He hath made to us by His prophets and apostles, and confirmed in the person and work of His dear Son. Inasmuch as Jesus Christ died and rose from the dead, we that are one with Him by faith are sure that we shall rise again from the dead, and live with Him. The fact of Christ's resurrection is the assurance of our resurrection, and His entrance into glory is the pledge of our glorification, because we are made one with Him by the purpose and grace of God. Our hope is founded, not upon reasoning, which, possibly, may dimly prove the immortality of the soul and the future reward of the righteous; but upon Revelation, which states it clearly and plainly, and leaves no room for question.

Brethren, we are not ashamed as to the absolute certainty that our HOPE WILL BE REALIZED.

We believe that if in deed we are justified by faith, and have peace with God, we have a hope of glory which will not fail us in the end, nor on the way to the end. We do not expect to be deserted, and to be left to fall from grace, for "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." We do not expect to be left to ourselves, which would mean our sure and certain ruin; but we do expect that He that hath begun a good work in us will perfect it unto the day of Christ; we are certain that He that hath wrought this hope in us will justify that hope by fulfilling it in due time. He will preserve us through long life if we are to live long; will maintain a living hope in us when we come to die; and will remember even our dust and ashes when these are hidden in the tomb. We shall not be ashamed of our hope.

II. As I have introduced to you that confidence which makes believers—especially tried and experienced believers—full of hope which maketh not ashamed, my second object is to dwell upon

THE REASON OF THIS CONFIDENCE.

Why is it that men who possess the good hope are so far from being ashamed of it that they rejoice in it?

My answer is, first, because that hope has for one of its main supports the love of God. I expect one day to sit among the angels, and to behold the face of my Best-beloved; but I do not expect this because of anything in me, or anything which may ever be done by me, but simply because of the infinite love of God. I trust not to my love of God, but to God's love to me. We trust Him because He loves us. We are sure that He will fulfil our hope because He is too loving to fail us. It is from the love of God that all our hopes begin, and it is upon the love of God that all our hopes depend. Do not your hearts confess this? If that love could be suspended for a moment, if its outgoings were for an instant to cease, where would you be? We fall back upon the love of God as the final reason of our hope in Him.

Observe, dear brethren, the actual cause of our confidence is that the love of God has been shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. Let me try and explain what this means. The Holy Spirit is in the heart of every believer, and He is occupied in many gracious acts. Among other things, He sheds abroad the love of God in the heart wherein He resides. The figure is taken from a box of precious perfume being poured out in a chamber. There lies the slumbering scent within the alabaster box; it is a very choice thing, but no one has yet perceived its odor. The love of God brought within the soul is that rare fragrance; but till it is shed abroad it is not enjoyed. Now the Holy Spirit takes that box and opens it, and the sweet savor of divine love streams forth, and fills all the capacity of the believer.

Then follows, as a matter of course, that which the human heart must feel: we love Him because He first loved us. We did doubt His love once; we cannot doubt it now. If we were asked three times, "Lovest thou me?" we should answer humbly, but most emphatically, "Lord, Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love Thee. I could not live without loving Thee. I would rather a thousand times that I had never been born than be without love to Thee; and though I do not love Thee as I ought, and my heart craves after a far greater love, yet I do love Thee in deed and in truth. Thou knowest that I do; and I should be false to my own consciousness if I denied it." This is to have the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost which is given to us; to know it, enjoy it, appropriate it, rejoice in it, and come under its divine influence. May this bundle of myrrh never be removed from the chamber of my soul!

But I want you to notice the special sweetness which struck our apostle as being so amazingly noteworthy. He goes on to tell us what most affected him. He says, "When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." That is the first point to be dwelt upon; that God should give His Son to die for the ungodly. That God should love those who love Him, that God should love His renewed people who are striving after holiness, is indeed delightful; but the most overpowering thought of all is that He loved us when there was nothing good in us whatever.

The apostle is not content with bringing that point before us; he would not have us forget that Christ died for us. Brethren, that Christ should love us in heaven was a great thing; that He should then come down to earth and be born in Bethlehem was a greater thing. That He should live a life of obedience for our sakes was a wonderful thing; but that He should die, this is the climax of love's sacrifice: the summit of the Alp of love. Some sights in the world astonish us once or twice, and then grow commonplace; but the cross of Christ grows upon us: the more we know of it the more it surpasses knowledge. Nothing can ever rival in interest the cross of Christ. Let us study what books we may, the knowledge of a crucified Saviour will still remain the sublimest of all the sciences.

Furthermore, the apostle then goes on to say that the Lord

now that we are reconciled. He puts it thus—If God loved us when we were enemies, He will surely continue to love us now that we are friends. If Jesus died for us when we were rebels, He will refuse us nothing now that He has reconciled us. If He reconciled us by His death, surely He can and will save us by His life. If He died to reconcile enemies, surely He will preserve the reconciled. Do you see the whole argument? It is very full of reasons for the upholding of our hope of glory, and causing us not to be ashamed of it.

Once more: the apostle reminds us in the eleventh verse that "we have now received the atonement." We already feel that we are at one with God. Through the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus we are at peace with God. We love Him; our quarrel with Him is ended; we delight in Him, we long to glorify Him. If we are under the dominion of holiness; if there is no wish in our soul but what we would unwind if we knew it to be contrary to the mind of our holy Lord, then are we assured that He has accepted us, and that we have His life in us, and shall finally come to His glory. Therefore we are not ashamed of our hope.

One word more on this point: note well that the apostle not only mentions the love of God and its being shed abroad in our hearts, but he mentions the divine Person by whom this has been done. The shedding abroad of God's love in the heart has been wrought by the Holy Ghost who has been given to us. "Thank God," saith one, "I sat under an earnest ministry!" So you might, and yet have never felt the love of God within your heart. We can shed that love abroad by preaching, but we cannot shed it abroad in the heart. A higher influence than that of human oratory must deal with the inner nature. Perhaps you were alone in your chamber, or walking by the roadside, when the sweet savor of love stole into your soul. Oh, the love of God! The amazing, immeasurable, incomprehensible love of the Father! Oh, to feel this till our very souls are inflamed with it, and our unloving nature is all on fire with love to the great Lover of the souls of men! Who can do this but the Holy Ghost?

III. Lastly, let us hint at

of this confident hope. Let the context instruct us. First, this confident hope breeds inward joy. The man that knows that his hope of glory will never fail him because of the great love of God, of which he has tasted, that man will hear music at midnight; the mountains and the hills will break forth before Him into singing wherever He goes. Especially in times of tribulation He will be found "rejoicing in hope of the glory of God." His profoundest comfort will often be enjoyed in his deepest affliction, because then the love of God will specially be revealed in His heart by the Holy Ghost, whose name is "the Comforter." Then he will perceive that the rod is dipped in mercy, that his losses are sent in fatherly love, and that his aches and pains are all measured out with gracious design. In our affliction God is doing nothing to us which we should not wish for ourselves if we were as wise and loving as God is.

This brings with it the grace of holy boldness in the avowal of our hope. Christian people do not often enough show worldlings the joy of their hope. We do not nor say enough of the joy of being in the Lord's service, nor speak enough of the wages which our Lord will pay at the end of the day. We are as silent as if we were ashamed of our hope. We even grow mourning, although we have reason to be the happiest men on God's earth. I fear we have not enough experience of divine love shed abroad in our hearts. If the perfume were within, it would be perceived by those who are around us. You pass a factory of perfume, and at once perceive that sweetness steals abroad.

Let us make worldlings know the fragrance of our joyous hope; especially let us tell those who seem most likely to laugh at us; for we have learned by experience that some of these are most likely to be impressed. Often has a new convert written to a worldly friend to tell him of his great change and of his new joy, and that worldly friend has put the letter aside with a sneer or a jest; but after awhile he has thought it over, and he has said to himself, "There may be something in it. I am a stranger to this joy of which my friend speaks, and I certainly need all the joy I can get, for I am dull enough." Let me tell you, that all worldlings are not such fools as some would take them for; they are aware of an unrest within their bosoms, and they hunger after something better than this vain world can give them; so that it frequently happens that as soon as they learn where the good is they accept it.

Come, then, you that have a hope of glory; let all men see that you are not ashamed of it. Act as decoy birds to others: let the sweet notes of your happy life charm them to Jesus! May the Lord cause you to spread abroad what He has shed abroad, and may that which perfumes your heart also perfume your house, your business, your conversation, and your whole life! May we so enjoy true godliness that we may never bring shame upon it, nor feel shame concerning it! Amen and Amen.

A LIGHTNING FATALITY ON A MOUNTAIN.*

A SWISS engineer, M. Buchwalder, was engaged in geodesic operations on the summit of Mont Sentis, at a height of seventy-five hundred feet above the level of the sea, when he was caught in a violent storm. "Heavy clouds," he says, "coming from the west, enveloped the mountain. Very soon a violent wind announced a tempest; thunder was heard in the distance, and the hail fell in such abundance that in a few minutes it covered Mont Sentis with a sheet of ice. We took refuge in our tent, and I carefully closed all the openings, so as to leave no hold to the wind. For a few moments the storm seemed to abate, but it was only an interval of silence, a respite, during which a terrible crisis was in preparation. In fine, at eight o'clock in the morning the thunder was heard again, but much nearer and more violent, and it continued thus, for hours together, without cessation.

"Tired of my long imprisonment under the tent, I went outside to note the condition of the sky and measure the depth of the hail that had fallen. Scarcely had I taken a few steps in the open air ere the thunder burst over my head with such fury that I deemed it prudent to regain the shelter of my tent, and my aide followed my example. In order to diminish the danger of being struck by the lightning, we lay down side by side upon some planks. At this moment a cloud as dense and black as night enveloped Sentis. The rain and hail fell in torrents; the wind blew with fury, and the flashes of lightning succeeded each other incessantly, crossing and recrossing in every direction, and surrounded us with a lurid light like the reflection of a fire. The crashes of thunder, rebounding from the precipitous sides of the mountain, leaped from echo to echo with such vehemence that we could scarcely hear ourselves speak. The sound was a sharp, rending noise—a quivering crash, as though the heavens had fallen in, and a dull, prolonged roar all in one.

"At length the fierceness of the storm became so terrible that my companion could not restrain an emotion of alarm, and asked me if we were not in imminent danger of losing our lives. I endeavored to reassure him by mentioning the fact that Arago and Biot, during their observations in Spain, were surprised by a similar tempest. The lightning had struck their tent, but had glanced off from the cloth without hurting them. Hardly had I told him this, ere I heard a cry of distress: 'O my God!' and at the same instant I saw a ball of fire flash from the feet to the head of my companion; the unfortunate man had been struck by the thunderbolt! In the light yielded by the tearing open of the tent I saw the left side of his face dotted with red and brown spots, caused by the electric fluid. His hair, his eyelashes and his eyebrows were singed and burnt; his lips and nostrils were a livid blue; his breast heaved for a moment, and then the sound of his breathing ceased.

"I was suffering horribly myself; but, forgetting my own mishap in my anxiety to aid my companion, who I saw was dying, I called him aloud, I shook him, but he made no response. His right eye, which was wide open, brilliant and full of intelligent meaning, seemed turned upon me to implore my assistance; but the left eye remained closed, and on parting the lids, I saw that it was dull and leaden. I still thought that there was a remnant of life in him—but only for a moment; three times I tried to close that right eye, which was still gazing fixedly at me, and three times it opened again, with all the look of life. I then placed my hand over his heart; it no longer beat.

"At last my grief put an end to this distressing examination. My own left leg was paralyzed, and I felt an actually painful shivering in it, accompanied by an extraordinary agitation or boiling of the blood. A convulsive tremor ran through my whole body; a general stifling sensation half choked me, and my heart beat in the most tumultuously irregular manner. Was I to perish like my hapless companion? Thank God, however, I managed to reach the nearest village, after extreme exertion. Subsequently I discovered that my instruments had been struck by the lightning, for every metallic article that the tent contained when the thunderbolt fell bore traces of the passage of the fluid. The points, edges, and most delicate parts were softened and melted."

A MAN OVERBOARD.

(See Illustration.)

THE scene depicted in the illustration is one that has often been described by transatlantic travellers. The cry of "A man overboard!" arouses an excitement on a steamer that infects every one. Passengers rush to the side and fling over chairs or anything that may serve to support the struggling man until a boat can be lowered for his rescue. Some hunt for life-preservers and fling them out toward him, and on every face there is distress and anxiety. The captain's voice is heard directing the sailors, who are hurriedly climbing to the boat, and the engines are stopped and the vessel "brought to."

The man in the water, be he only a steerage passenger or a common sailor, becomes at once an object of absorbing interest for every one on the ship. Ladies and gentlemen who would have passed by him in indifference an hour before are deeply concerned about him, and would do anything to help in rescuing him.

It is not strange that a life in danger should so move those who witness the spectacle. It is an awful thing for the majority of men to go suddenly without preparation into the presence of God. Life is so precious, death so appalling, that men shrink from it, and as they hope for sympathy and help in like case, they instinctively render them to others. The really strange thing is that the feeling does not manifest itself more thoughtfully and more wisely. All around us men are dying daily, and few do anything to render death less awful. If we realized what the Bible teaches about the doom of the impenitent, it would be the first and all-absorbing duty we should enter upon to implore every unsaved man to accept the salvation offered him. As it is, Christian men and women are brought into daily and hourly contact in business and in the home with those who will perish eternally, and who, going down to their doom from a Christian land, can yet say truthfully, "No man cared for my soul."

"I RECEIVED a letter from Gertrude this morning," said Mrs. Wilson, as she and her husband were sitting in the twilight waiting for their only daughter, Amy, to return from visiting a sick child belonging to her Sunday-school class. "She is very eloquent about Mr. Golding, that young millionaire friend of hers, who paid attention to Amy last year when she was staying with Gertrude. She seems certain that he wants to marry Amy, and is very delighted about it."

"Would you like to have her marry this young Cræsus?"

"It would be a splendid match for Amy. In our position we could not hope for anything so good in a money point of view. I am not certain that in other respects it would be so satisfactory. The young man seemed to me, when I saw him, to be a frivolous person, with no aim in life but to enjoy himself and get all the pleasure he could."

"Then you do not share your sister's enthusiasm?"

"I am anxious that Amy should be happy. I am not convinced that money alone would secure that. Even last year she would have wanted the man she consented to marry to be something more than a man of pleasure, and since she has been converted, I think she would not accept any one who was not a Christian man."

The subject of their conversation, a bright, intelligent young lady, entered the room at that moment. She was deeply affected, and described with much emotion the scene in the chamber of the dying child she had been visiting. "She was a dear little child of God," Amy said. "I hope her death will be blessed to her father. With all his prosperity, he is a poor creature, without hope for eternity."

"That remark," said Mr. Wilson, when Amy left the husband and wife alone again, "is not an augury of success for her aunt's scheme. Evidently a suitor with nothing but his money to recommend him would fail."

"Gertrude would be terribly disappointed," said Mrs. Wilson. "I think I will write her."

"Why not write to Mr. Golding himself?" suggested the father.

"I cannot think how you can bring yourself to joke about such a matter," said the wife. "You ought to be serious when your daughter's whole future is concerned."

"I will be, then ; but really, my dear, I think you may let your sister take her own course. If she is intriguing for this match, she will be all the better for a little chagrin," and Mr. Wilson, with the air of a man who had no great affection for his wife's sister or regard for her officious meddling with his family, rose and left the room.

The mother sat thinking. Would this chance be really a good thing for Amy? Many mothers would have been delighted with it. Some would have planned and plotted for it. Amy would be almost portionless, and it would be a great relief to know that, whatever befell, she would be safe from poverty and hardship. Still Amy should decide for herself, and perhaps, after all, the offer might never come.

But it did come, or what was equivalent to it. A few days later Mrs. Gertrude Flynne appeared in person to carry her niece away on a visit. To her surprise, she found Amy disinclined to go. Amy did not wish to leave the Christian work in which she was engaged, and when her aunt grew eloquent about the balls and parties that were arranged, Amy frankly said she did not care for them. Driven to her last position, Mrs. Flynne disclosed that Mr. Golding had intimated to her that he was looking forward to the pleasure of Amy's presence in the city for the season. Amy quietly observed that Mr. Golding would doubtless enjoy himself without her; and then Mrs. Flynne turned her attention to her sister, who surely would realize, if Amy could not, the advantages promised by the visit. Mrs. Wilson fully understood them, but said Amy must have her own way.

"We will let her sleep upon it," said Mrs. Flynne. "I cannot believe that a sensible girl will throw so splendid a chance away."

"I am not sure, Gertrude, that Amy considers the chance splendid, or that she would accept Mr. Golding if he made her an offer."

"Then you must have neglected her training. You have let those religious notions become fanatical. You should insist on her going back with me. You ought to think for her, if she is too stupid to think for herself."

"No, Gertrude," said Mrs. Wilson ; "in this case Amy shall decide. I will not force her."

"Well, I will speak to her again in the morning, and if she persists, I will never do any more for her."

At the breakfast-table Mrs. Flynne was affectionately cordial, but said nothing about the proposed trip, hoping that Mr. Wilson would leave when the meal was over. But he did not. Instead, he took his newspaper, and settled himself as if for a prolonged sitting. Seeing that there was no prospect of a private conference, Mrs. Flynne spoke, and with less reticence than before. She plainly said that Mr. Golding desired to propose for Amy's hand, and that she ought to give him the opportunity.

Amy turned and looked at her aunt in astonishment. "Why should I do so?" she asked. "I would spare him pain if possible."

"What pain would you spare him?" said her aunt, pushing her chair from the table and folding her arms.

"The pain of a rejection," said Amy, calmly. "Of course you know, Aunt Gertrude, I could not accept him?"

"I know nothing of the kind, and I do not believe you would be so foolish."

"I should indeed," Amy said. "I would not consider it for a moment. Mr. Golding and I are utterly unlike, and should both be miserable if I married him."

Mrs. Flynne Astonished by her Niece.

"You are the most—"

"Excuse me, Gertrude," said Mr. Wilson, rising and leaning against the mantelpiece, while he regarded his daughter admiringly ; "Amy must not be abused. She has conscientious motives for her conduct, and I heartily approve them."

"Thank you, papa," said Amy, rising to kiss him. "I am sure I am right."

Mrs. Flynne rose in disgust and quitted her brother-in-law's home with a very sore spirit and an utter contempt for people who allowed religious scruples to hinder worldly advancement. "I will never try to bring another wedding about," she said, firmly, and it may be hoped she kept her word. Certain it is that Amy was much happier in the parsonage which she occupied some years later, as the faithful wife of a hard-working clergyman, poor in this world's goods, than she would have been as the bride of the wealthy but Christless Mr. Golding.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

"One Man Should Die for the People."

THE Esquimaux were as anxious as the party in the little Mission House about the tidings the Harmony would bring on its next visit. It would have been impossible to make them understand the situation as it was understood by Juliet and the Moravians, but they understood that Juliet was to remain another year, and might remain permanently. That was what they desired, and to them it appeared only fitting that she should be the wife of the young missionary. But the foreigners had their own customs, and this year of waiting was apparently one of them. Perhaps the consent of the Government of the distant country from which they came must be obtained, or papers must be procured to render the marriage legal with them. They did not know. One thing they knew, and that was that it would be a happy day for Eshcol that would give the young lady a permanent residence among them.

So far had the public sentiment among the Esquimaux manifested itself. The day was forgotten when Juliet ran in disgust from the igloo, and could not bear to touch an Esquimau. Every household could tell of deeds of kindness and tenderness the young lady had done. Gentle, kind, sympathetic, helpful, her name was dear to them all. Could they have known it, they were witnessing in her altered manner one of the best proofs they could have of the power of the religion the Moravians were preaching to them—the proof of a changed life. In what she was when they first looked curiously at her and in what she had now become they saw, without recognizing the cause, the change that the Spirit works on the human soul. "The fruits of the Spirit" they saw and rejoiced in, for their little world was made brighter and happier thereby.

That winter, too, there was another matter for conversation in the igloos. Samson, the friend of every one, the recognized leader in all business and pleasure, was to be married. He and the dusky maiden of his choice had been making preparations for a year past to set up their little home, and now they were complete, and the festivities were close at hand.

The wedding gave pleasant occupation to Juliet and Fritz. They set on foot, and successfully carried out a plan, to give by subscription to the bridegroom a most coveted gift—a little sledge drawn by a swift reindeer. The honest Esquimau was far more delighted with his equipage than Gertie had been with her carriage and pair.

"Many a long trudge this will save me, when I lay my traps or visit them again," said Samson. "I shall outstrip the wolves when my Springer bears me swiftly along over the snow." Springer was the name which the Esquimau gave to his reindeer ; and he was so fond of the creature, so proud of his swift limbs and branching horns, that it was matter of doubt which he valued most—his stag or his little brown bride.

Thus even cold November days were passing pleasantly away, when suddenly in the horizon a dark cloud appeared, which was to overspread the sky with blackness.

"Samson must have returned from his hunting sooner than we expected," said Fritz Edelstein one day, as he entered the parlor where Anna and Juliet were seated at work.

"I do not think that he can have returned," observed Juliet, glancing up ; "I saw no track of reindeer's feet when I walked home from the igloes five minutes ago."

"There are fresh tracks now," said Fritz ; "he must have just arrived. I will go to his hut, and see why our brave hunter has returned three days sooner than he intended to do."

"I will go with you !" cried Juliet. "Just wait a moment till I swathe myself up in fur in the most approved Esquimau fashion."

Cheerfully the maiden tripped on her way at the side of her betrothed, but before they reached the huts they were struck by a loud sound of wailing, such as was seldom heard save when a death had occurred.

"Something has happened !" exclaimed Fritz, quicken his steps. At the outside of Samson's hut was the reindeer, unyoked from the sledge, feeding on some moss which had been thrown before it. The hut itself was so crowded with people that some, unable to get in, were pressing around the door. There was evidently a good deal of excitement, a great contrast to the quietness which had prevailed when Juliet, shortly before, had passed that way. Extreme alarm was painted on the faces of the women, and even on those of the men. On seeing Fritz and Juliet, all began speaking at once, so that it was difficult to make out any distinct meaning from the words of any.

"What is it that they are saying about 'Red-hand! Red-hand,'" asked Juliet, rather anxiously, of Fritz.

"It is the name of a tribe of Indians. Here, make way! make way!" Fritz cried to the people, and at the wave of his hand the crowd sufficiently parted to let him and the lady enter through the low door, and pass through the narrow passage into the smoky Esquimau hut.

The sight within was anything but reassuring. Close to the central fire, on a heap of blankets, lay Samson, feebly attempting to pull out a barbed arrow from his right arm. His skin and clothes were stained with blood; his sobbing wife and relatives clustered around him.

Fritz had some surgical skill. He knelt down by Samson, and soon succeeded in extracting the arrow. Juliet dipped her handkerchief in warm water which was at hand and offered it for binding up of the wound. All the while the babel of voices went on; but Fritz, ere he proceeded to swathe the arm, ordered all but Samson's family to quit the igloo at once.

"Let's carry the news to Pastor Wilhelm!" cried one of the neighbors, and off rushed the larger part of the crowd, leaving, however, several men and women in the hut.

Fritz would not suffer Samson to speak until the poor fellow, who was pale with excitement and faint with pain, had relieved his thirst by a copious draught. In the mean time his mother, the most loquacious of the party, poured forth an incoherent jargon of words, which gave the Europeans some clue as to what had happened.

"The monsters, the wolves, to shoot my son, and he just married—and the arrows in the sledge—and they'll be down on us like bears among the seals. Oh, ho! Oh, ho! they scalped my grandfather long afore I was born; that I should ever have lived to see such a day!"

"Hush, hush, my good woman," said Edelstein, kindly. "If we only could have a little quiet, your son might be able to tell us what has occurred."

Samson rolled his eyes wildly, clenched his left hand, and gnashed his teeth. He seemed for a few moments to be too much excited to speak. But there was something soothing and calming in the voice of Fritz and the pressure of his kind hand, and Samson, with a few interruptions from mother and wife, was able to give the following account of his adventure:

"I drove a good way; I set my traps. I found on returning to my sledge that some sly beast had made off with my store of pemmican, or maybe it had fallen out; anyways, it was gone. I was hungry, for I can't, like Springer, dig a moss dinner out of the snow. Just then I saw a red light some way off; it was a fire, so I knew that I could not be far from some sort of encampment.

"Says I to myself, 'Whom have we here? There are no Indians about in these parts; maybe some Esquimaux are setting traps like myself. Anyhow, I'll go and have a warm at their fire, and a bite at their food.' I was too cautious to drive up in my sledge; I tied Springer to a bit of a pine-tree that was sticking out of the snow. I went on foot up to the fire, hoping to meet with brothers; but what should I light on but a set of Red-hands. I'd as lief have met with a pack of wolves."

Juliet glanced anxiously into Fritz's face, and its grave expression alarmed her as much as the groans and exclamations of the women.

"Go on—go on!" said Fritz to Samson, silencing the others by a gesture of his hand.

"They pounced upon me, and dragged me into their midst," said Samson, assisting his description by expressive movements of his unwounded arm. "They asked me all about our station here; if we'd had a good season, and plenty of fish and oil; and how many guns we could muster among us. I'd a mind to have told them that we've a lot of fighting fellows at Nannock Igloo, each with a hatchet and a gun, and that Brother Fritz here could shoot down Indians as easy as puffins. But you've taught us that the Great Father forbids His children to lie. So I told the truth, and the Red-hands looked ready to dance round their big fire with joy; I reckon they think they've Nannock Igloo and all of us safe as fish in a net."

Samson's pause was filled up by a chorus of wailing.

"How many Red-hands were there?" asked Fritz, in a voice perfectly calm.

"More than I could count; I guess enough to eat us up," was the reply.

"Did you see the chief? I think that his name is Northwind."

"Northwind his name, and Northwind his nature!" cried Samson. "He looks like a deadly blast, with his war-paint and feathers sticking up above his tattooed face!"

"He spared you, however," observed Fritz, "or how came you to be here?"

"No thanks to Northwind or his wolves," replied Samson, "but to my strong arms and quick wit, or, maybe I should say, to the goodness of God. These fellows knew nothing of Springer, and with their longer legs had no fear of my getting away. But I watched my time—I watched my time. With one good blow to my right, and one to my left, I sent two tall fellows sprawling, and then off I ran for my life."

"I knew where I had left my sledge, for I saw the top of the pine—an ice-mound hid all the rest. I got to the sledge, jumped in—was off; I shook my reins and shouted; Springer flew like the wind! The Red-hands could not overtake my reindeer, and they sent a flight of arrows after us; one stuck in my arm and three in my sledge, but I reached the igloes in safety!"

"How far off are these Indians?" inquired Fritz, with the calm manner of a judge questioning a witness.

"Near enough to be down upon us to-night."

Then from Juliet's white lips burst an exclamation of terror. "Oh, Fritz! Fritz! what are you going to do?" she cried in English.

"The only practicable thing which, with God's blessing, may avert a possible danger to the station," replied the Moravian in the same tongue. "I met Northwind a few years ago in one of my missionary expeditions. The chief was not unfriendly. I will seek him out now, and if the Lord prosper my efforts, there may be no attack—no trouble with those Red Indians."

"You will not venture alone!" gasped Juliet.

"Far better, dearest, that I should. The reindeer, already tired, would scarcely draw two men. I know the Indian language; and a single unarmed missionary is more likely to prevail as an ambassador of peace than if he had half a dozen guns and a party of warriors to back him."

"Oh, Fritz! I can never, never let you go!" exclaimed Juliet, her terror increased by the old mother's repeated croning, "The Red-hands scalped my grandfather; they don't spare man, woman, or child! Oh, ho! Oh, ho! they'll be down on us to-night—they'll murder us all!"

"Let us return to the mission-house," said Fritz. Then, in Esquimaux, he continued, turning to Samson, "Let some one see that Springer is well fed and ready at our door in an hour."

Fritz and Juliet quitted the hut; the latter could scarcely have walked but for the support of a firm, strong arm.

"I will never let you go!" cried Juliet.

"Not if the Lord calls me?" said Fritz, very gently. "Oh, Juliet, my heart's beloved, are you not a missionary's promised bride, and can you not trust him to the care of his Lord? He who preserved me from the bear, can He not give me favor with the Indians? To throw myself on the generosity of these children of the wilds is my best chance of winning them to listen to my word. Is the power of the Gospel to melt the hardest heart weakened? Is there still not a mighty force in the Word of God?"

They reached the mission-house, and found the Pastor and his wife surrounded by Esquimaux on their knees, engaged in prayer. Silently Fritz and Juliet knelt down beside them. There was a calming influence in the holy exercise. The poor maiden in her anguish felt that the Master was present, and that in her terror she could cling to His feet, and look up to Him for deliverance. It was a terrible sacrifice required of her, something worse than martyrdom; but the Lord whom she loved and trusted could give strength even for this.

The party arose from their knees. Then Fritz, in brief words, explained his intentions to the Pastor and Anna. Juliet saw that they were startled, alarmed, but that they could propose no better plan. Brother Wilhelm indeed offered to accompany Fritz, but to this proposal no one would listen.

Fritz's preparations were quickly made. Juliet, with her trembling fingers, wrapt closely over his bear-skin garment the plaid of Maria.

"If you are long in hearing from me, beloved, do not conclude that I am lost," said Edelstein, cheerfully, as the sledge appeared at the door. "Nothing will induce me to send an Indian here, and however safe and well and prosperous I may be, much may occur to prevent my being able to come myself. Do not slacken your Christmas preparations," he added; "I hope to look on the white flag yet, and, God permitting, place the ring upon this dear little hand."

Fritz's parting word was of cheer, his parting look was a smile, but his parting thought was a prayer. Fritz was gone, and Juliet sought her own chamber to pray and to weep.

During the terrible period of suspense which succeeded this day of terror, Juliet had full experience of what a missionary's wife may be called upon to endure. Often she recalled her conversation with Ernest Smidt. In vain the maiden waited, with agonizing suspense, for the return of the sledge. Day after day passed, and it came not; but neither did the Indians make their appearance. Whatever fate Edelstein might have met, his self-devotion seemed to have been crowned with success.

During the first week there were constant alarms. Esquimaux took it in turns to watch. No night passed without a cry being raised of "The Red-hands! the Red-hands!" The inhabitants of the hamlet seemed to be unable to sleep. Juliet could hardly close her eyes. She went mechanically about her usual avocations, neglecting no duty, forgetting no work, never complaining, but with a dull aching pain at her heart.

Grief is often selfish. Had Juliet encountered this terrible sorrow ere she had given herself to the Lord, she would have shut herself up in her misery. Sympathy would have been painful to her, and she would have refused all comfort either from earth or Heaven. But her spirit had been softened, elevated, purified by the influence of religion. Juliet could whisper to her almost breaking heart,

"The very hand that dealt the blow
Was wounded once for me."

Juliet knew that not even death could separate her beloved from the Lord, and that for herself, even if widowed ere yet a wife, there would be a blissful reunion in that land of light which sorrow never can enter.

After the first week excitement in the igloes fast subsided. Nothing was heard of the Indians, though some Esquimaux youth ventured forth to explore. There was a mournful idea prevailing that Brother Fritz had been murdered, and that the Red-hands, struck with fear that his death would be avenged, had fled into the interior. Samson's wound healed well under the care of Juliet, but he grieved sorely over the loss both of his friend and his reindeer. The double loss was the constant subject of the poor fellow's thoughts and conversation, except in the presence of Juliet. With intuitive delicacy, the rough Esquimaux respected her grief, and was silent before her.

THE DEATH OF LAZARUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 18, John 11:1-16. Golden Text, ver. 26.

The Plea of the Sisters—Where its Strength Lay—Mary's Faith to be Tried—Trusting even in Extremity—The Timorous Disciples—No Risk in Obedience—The Disciples Bewildered—The Word Apparently Falsified—The Intent of the Test—The Unlimited Power Offered to the Believer.

"Now, a certain man was sick, Lazarus of Bethany, of the village of Mary and her sister Martha" (R. V.). Is it a matter of any interest to one so great as our God whether His children are sick or well? Let Him answer, "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of His eye" (Zec. 2:8). "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows" (Matt. 10:29-31). Thank God, there is neither chance nor accident: His hand is arranging or over-ruling everything which happens. It was of more import to Him than to Mary or Martha, or even to Lazarus himself, that His disciple was sick. Lazarus belonged to Him, Lazarus was one of the vents for the love of Jesus' heart; every breath he drew was of consequence to Jesus, and thus his sisters were in the right when they sent to Him the message, "Lord, behold is sick." On, how often some of us, even some of us who know Jesus as our Healer, come to Him with somewhat of suspicion in our hearts, and say inwardly, "Lord, behold he whom Thou art vexed with is sick," or, "Lord, he who cannot understand Thee is sick," "He who wants to find out Thy mind regarding him and fails to do so is sick." The plea of the sisters was not the relation of Lazarus to Jesus, but the relation of Jesus to him—"He whom Thou lovest."

The sisters began well. They took the true position of loving confidence in Jesus. But it is just when we are most in the Spirit that God permits us to be most tried, so that our faith may be kept in exercise, and that we may gain deeper acquaintance with God. The only answer of Jesus to the messenger (and, perhaps, it was spoken as much for the disciples who were present as for the sisters of Lazarus who were absent) was this, "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby." This was the Word of God, part of that Word which shall stand when heaven and earth shall pass away; part of that Word of which Jesus said, "The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (John 6:63). How, then, should this Word have been received? One of the sisters to whom the message was sent knew more of Jesus than any one of His disciples—Mary "sat at Jesus' feet and heard His Word" (Luke 10:39). We are expressly told, "It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped His feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick." Jesus said of this anointing, "She hath done what she could; she hath anointed My body aforehand for the burying" (Mark 14:8, R. V.). Mary had learned what no other disciple knew as yet, that Jesus must die. Therefore must be put to a stronger test than that of others. "Now, Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus;" His only interest in Bethany was that it was their home. "When He had heard therefore that he was sick, He abode two days still in the same place where He was." To human ideas this sounds strange. Mary would have expected it would be written, "Because Jesus loved this family, He waited not one moment, but hasted with all speed to Bethany." Human love brings us down to the level of the sufferer or the tried one, to sympathize with him in his trial. But Jesus is God, and Almighty, and His love comes down to take us right out of the trial or suffering up into Himself, and He takes the way whereby the end which He has in view from the beginning shall be secured. Because Jesus loved Lazarus, He did not heal him at once; because He loved Mary and Martha, He did not immediately appear upon the scene. Because He loves thee, tried child of God, He lets things go on to the very extreme, to see if thou wilt trust Him still.

"Then after that saith He to His disciples, Let us go into Judæa again." The disciples, who were slow learners in the path of faith, said, "Master, the Jews of late sought to stone Thee; and goest Thou thither again?" Oh, how little they understood their Lord! He had been teaching them that He laid down His life for the sheep; that no man took it from Him, but He laid it down of Himself; that He had power to lay it down and to take it again; and yet they suggest to Him fear for the safety of His life as a reason why He should not go into Judæa. Oh, how far was He above the Jews—"In Him was life"! He answered them, "Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him." Jesus walked in the day, in the continual light of His Father's countenance, "I do always those things which please Him," He said (John 8:29), consequently there was no stumbling, no false step. It is our precious privilege "to walk even as He walked" (1 John 2:6); but this can only be "if we walk in the light, as He is in the light" (1 John 1:7). It had been His Father's will that He should not immediately heal Lazarus, and that He should not, during those two days, venture into Judæa. We cannot run any risk in doing the will of God; danger is not danger when God sends us into it; risk is not risk when the Shepherd is on before, and we are simply, obediently following after Him.

"These things said He: and after that He saith unto them, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep." Jesus knew that Lazarus was dead, but the word had gone forth, "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby." This sickness not unto death, and yet Lazarus dead! Yes; because He who is "the Resurrection and the Life" had the whole thing in hand, and death is but sleep to Him. The disciples did not understand; they had not understood that Jesus was to die and to rise again; they were full of their own thoughts, and so were not free to take in the thoughts of Jesus. Were we not preoccupied with our own views and thoughts of things, we should learn more of God than we do.

The disciples had their own view of Jesus' message to the sisters. They thought it meant simply healing. They said, "Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well." "Jesus spake of his death," but they did not understand His language. Peter, James, and John had been with Him when He said of Jairus' daughter, "The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth" (Mark 5:39); yet so dull were they, that they did not connect His words then with His words now! "Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe; nevertheless, let us go unto him." Had the disciples believed in the word which Jesus had spoken, they would not have been staggered at the death of Lazarus. They had had proof that death was subject to Jesus, but never had they had proof that one word He spoke had failed; and if He said, "This sickness is not unto death," then death was not to be death in this case, for it should be reversed. The test of their faith was a severe one—it seemed as though the fact of Lazarus' death gave the lie to the word of Jesus; it remained yet to be seen whether Christ or death should conquer. Thomas took it for granted that death would get the upper hand; he gave way to one of his habitual fits of depression, the infection of which has come down to our own day; and he said, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him."

But why did Jesus say, "I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to ye may believe"? The disciples heard these words as though they heard them not. All seemed to have failed; for once it seemed to them as though the Word of Jesus were falsified. Is not this often the case with us? Are there not many who seem to have staked all upon the word of the Lord—"Sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. 6:14), "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness" (Col. 1:13), "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up" (James 5:16), and yet the deliverance seems to be delayed? Can God fail to keep His word? Never. Then what means the dead Lazarus? What means the re-appearance of that sin which God said should have no dominion? What means the presence of that sickness which has been placed in the Lord's hands for healing? It all means, "Believe God through thick and thin; take His word against all." "The Resurrection and the Life" is stronger than the death which binds Lazarus; Christ our Sanctification is stronger than the sin which asserts dominion; Christ our Physician is stronger than the sickness which asserts itself. Which shall we believe, with which shall we be occupied—Christ and His Word, or that which seems to contradict Him?

Had Mary and Martha been occupied with Jesus, had they believed their brother's sickness was "not unto death," nothing would have daunted them, their hearts would have been full of praise; and while Lazarus grew weaker and weaker, and even when he died, they would have said, "Jesus cannot fail us; we do not understand this happening, but death is not going to hold our brother, for He has said, 'This sickness is not unto death.'" Later on Jesus said unto Martha, "Said I not unto thee, that, thou shouldest see the glory of God?" and He said to His disciples, regarding Lazarus, "I go that I may awake him out of sleep;" yet neither the sisters nor the disciples took Jesus' word against appearances; neither the one nor the other believed Jesus. What could not the Lord do, what would He not do if we but believed Him? "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth in Me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto My Father." There may be a trial of our faith, "if need be" (1 Pet. 1:6); things may seem to be as unlike the fulfilment of God's promise as did the death of Lazarus seem unlike the fulfilment of the words, "This sickness is not unto death"; but if we remain loyal to God, the sequel will proclaim Him faithful, and we shall find that "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor death, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38, 39).

"HE CARETH FOR YOU."

BY REV. E. B. MINER.

Yes, leave it to Him;
The lilies all do,
And they grow—
They grow in the rain
And they grow in the dew—
Yes, they grow:
They grow in the darkness, all hid in the night—
They grow in the sunshine, revealed by the light—
Still they grow.

They ask not your planting,
They need not your care,
As they grow—
Dropped down in the valley,
Sweet'ning the air—
There they grow:
They grow in their beauty, arrayed in pure white—
They grow clothed in glory by Heaven's own light—Sweetly grow.

The grasses are clothed
And the ravens are fed
From His store;
But you who are loved,
And guarded, and led,
How much more
Will He clothe you, feed you, and give you His care!
Then leave it with Him, He is everywhere,
Ample store.

Yes, leave it with Him,
'Tis more dear to His heart
You will know,
Than the lilies in bloom,
Or the flowers that start
'Neath the snow:
Whatever the need, if you seek it in prayer,
You can leave it with Him—for you are His care,
You, you know.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."

This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win.

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.

This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan address the Company, giving your nearest age, and a statement will be sent to you. Mention this paper.

CARLYLE observes in the most delightful of all his works, "Past and Present," that Abbot Samson, who was called to the Herculean task of reforming and governing a community of monks, after a long period of lax discipline, and who performed that and other duties with extraordinary success, had when he entered upon his work no experience in governing; had served no apprenticeship to the trade of governing—alas! only the hardest apprenticeship to that of obeying. Carlyle adds: "But, indeed, what say we, apprenticeship?"

TO LEARN OBEYING

is the fundamental art of governing. Had a duke now rolling sumptuously to his place in the Collective Wisdom, but himself happened to plough daily, at one time on seven shillings a week, what a light would it have thrown on several things for him!" Some such thought was probably in the mind of the Prince of Wales when he took his two sons, nine years ago, out of the idleness and luxury of court life and put them on board ship, with instructions to the officers to treat them as ordinary boys and allow them no privileges on account of their rank.

The power of the throne in Great Britain has been steadily diminishing of late years, and the process shows no signs of terminating. It is therefore probable that if one or both of these young men inherit the crown, there will not, by that time, be much governing left among its functions. It would, however, be all the more necessary that the young king should be wise and prudent. If he proved obstinate and stupid like his ancestor, George III., or priggish and self-opinionated like his grandfather, Prince Albert, the very fact of his prerogatives being limited might lead to a conflict between himself and Parliament. A spoiled child, accustomed to have his own way, who has never been thwarted, has had every wish and whim gratified would be very likely to make trouble as a man invested with the titles and prerogatives of a king, but precluded by new customs from governing as a king and using the prerogative, which the constitution undoubtedly confers upon him. It is important, both for himself and the country, that he learn how to bear annoyances and vexations cheerfully, how to bear having his will crossed, and how to restrain and govern his own passions. It was therefore very wise of the Prince of Wales to put his sons where they might, as Carlyle said, serve an apprenticeship to the trade of obeying.

THE APPRENTICESHIP

commenced in 1877, when the elder of the two, Prince Albert Victor, was thirteen years of age, and the younger, Prince George Frederick, was twelve, and continued until 1882, when they were respectively eighteen and seventeen years old. Two years of the period were passed on board the training ship, Britannia, in port, and the latter three on the Bacchante, voyaging around the world. The lads were encouraged to keep a diary of their wanderings, and this diary carefully posted up every night was published last month. It is edited and annotated by their tutor, Canon Dalton, and is a very bright and readable book. There is abundant evidence in it that the princes are possessed of sound common-sense and well cultivated powers of observation. Though the sayings and doings of kings and princes are not much esteemed among us, being distinguished as a rule from those of ordinary mortals only by a larger proportion of silliness and inanity, this diary is so far an exception to the rule, as to render a few extracts from it acceptable to American readers.

SETTING OUT.

The Bacchante (a picture of which is on the lower right of the picture on first page) received the two youths as midshipmen one day in September, 1879, when she was lying off Cowes, in the Isle of Wight. The first few days Neptune claimed as his own, and the princes spent them in paying the tributes he exacts from all who brave his terrors, whether princes or paupers. Sea-sickness over, the boys were instructed in their duties. They were required to take their turn with the other midshipmen in all weathers, by day or night, at watch-keeping and going aloft, at sail-drill or boat-duty. Not the slightest difference was made between them and their messmates of the gun-room. They were under the authority of the captain like the other midships. The day's routine was: At 6.15 A.M. drill; at 6.45 A.M. breakfast; 9 A.M. prayers; 12 noon dinner; 1.30 P.M. rifle, cutlass and sail-drill; at 3 P.M. dismiss drills; 4.15 P.M. supper; 8.30 P.M. out lights in messes and fires in galley.

THE CRUISE

was divided into two well-marked sections. The first, extending to May, 1880, included visits to Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, Madeira, the Canaries, West Indies, and Bermudas. After a brief visit to Vigo, the second and much longer part of the cruise was begun in August, 1880, and included the circumnavigation of the globe. By Ferrol, Madeira, and the Cape Verd Islands, the River Plate was made, and here some time was spent on shore. A run was made to the Falklands; but, just as preparations were made for a day or two on the islands, peremptory orders came out to proceed at once to the Cape to "demonstrate," as then they were in the thick of their Boer troubles. Here the Bacchante was kept idling for some weeks to no purpose, though it gave the princes and their shipmates an excellent opportunity of becoming acquainted with Cape Colony and its complicated conditions.

Then came, in the spring of 1881, a long and tempestuous run right across the Southern Ocean on about the 40th parallel south, from Cape Town to Albany, in Western Australia. Here the princes had an exceedingly pleasant and profitable time, followed by long visits to South Australia, Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland. Then on to the Fiji Islands, where the princes greatly enjoyed themselves, followed by a long and straight run to Japan, where a considerable time was spent visiting the many places and objects of curious interest which that strange country still has to show. Then down to Shanghai, Canton, the Straits Settlements, and Ceylon, up the Red Sea without touching at Aden, and on to Cairo.

In Egypt and the Holy Land about three months were spent—three months of really hard work, in visiting many of the places of interest, and getting up, through the specialists who accompanied the party, much useful information about them. Then home through the Mediterranean, touching at Athens, Crete, Corfu, Sicily and Gibraltar, until, on August 5th, the two far-travelled middies were received on board the Osborne in Swanage Bay by their royal father, mother, and sisters. The distance travelled by the Bacchante during its commission was 54,679 miles. India, Canada, and New Zealand were not touched at. To have done justice to them might have added another year or two to the length of the voyage. Doubtless they will be visited at a future time when extended tours, impossible in the course of a voyage undertaken for a definite object, will be made.

The young men received an enthusiastic

RECEPTION AT BARBADOES,

the most eastern of the West Indian Islands. They arrived there on Christmas Day. This is their record of the event: Swarms of shore boats, with grinning, laughing negro washerwomen, at once surrounded us, eager to welcome "the queen's pickanninies!" Jane Anne Smith was the only one (she stands over six feet who sat in solemn dignity in the stern sheets of her boat, the prima donna of the occasion, having already washed for Prince Alfred [now Duke of Edinburgh, uncle of the two travellers], on more than one occasion, and fully intending to do so for other princes yet. The other negresses gesticulated, each from her own boat, and saluted the officers on the poop with many endearing terms; claiming also former acquaintance with the elder and sedate, and, of all things in the world, flourishing cotton, Manchester-made, pocket-handkerchiefs, flag-fashion, with likenesses of us both woven in colors on them; and one or two triumphantly produced framed photographs of us, taken at Dartmouth, which they waved about, bobbing and kissing their hands, all one huge grin of delight.

AT TRINIDAD,

next to Jamaica, the largest of the islands, the youths visited the woods and explored the wonders of tropic vegetation. A visit to Martinique gave occasion for some remarks full of good sense on the superiority of the French to British islands, and the reason of it. "The chief thing that has made the French negro so much better than the British is that the French proprietors have never ceased to be resident on and to take a pride in their own estates, and therefore the island presents the appearance it does, with its fields well cultivated, its roads in good repair, alongside which are the Hawthorn hedges well-trimmed and kept, and the planters' houses, many like small villas outside Paris, bright with their jalousies and green shutters." Jamaica, of course, required a lengthened visit, and is duly described. The long disquisitions on coolie and negro labor and on the future of the West Indies are significant as showing that the boys were interested in what they saw, and were intelligently curious to ascertain the causes of the social condition of the people.

THE VOYAGE TO AUSTRALIA

introduced the middies to some rough weather. The Bacchante labored heavily (see illustration on first page), damaged her rudder severely, and put in at Albany in a condition requiring repairs. This gave the young men the chance of a run ashore. They made several excursions of which the one to Mardup, thirty miles from Albany, is described in detail. On their way they were entertained much to their delight as their diary proves by some expert performances with the lasso (see illustration on first page). This visit, the enjoyment of which was enhanced by an American companion, is thus described by the princes:

"ROUGHING IT.

"May 20, 1881.—Left the ship at 9 A.M. with the ward-room and the gun-room messmates. Walked to the police barracks, and there mounted on horseback, and started with Mr. Loftie for Marblup and Wilson's Creek. Dr. Rogers overtook us, having started later from Albany; he was in an American cavalry regiment all through the war. He gave us also many amusing stories of his adventures in other parts of the world. We arrived about 4 P.M. at Mr. Young's farmhouse and clearing.

"A small two-wheeled cart that has brought our mattresses and rugs, and what few things we want for the night, has arrived before us, and we proceed at once to make our toilet in the open air, for there is plenty of fresh water in the tank outside, and the small wooden trough does duty by turns for each of the party. Bevis, a large kangaroo dog, a sort of huge brown Scotch grayhound, looks on as we make ourselves ready for Mrs. Young's tea-supper, for which we went back to the farmhouse, and there every one was very hearty and jolly, and did ample justice to the fowls, minced kangaroo, the jam, cream, scones, and no end of beautiful fresh milk and butter, such as we had not tasted since we had left England.

"After tea found our way up across the paddock, to our night-quarters, and there we slept as soundly as possible (nine in the two rooms), with the windows open and the fires burning.

There are two pails of fresh milk set out for us, which some drink neat and others prefer to take mixed with a little whiskey before turning in. Some fall asleep at once, others not so soon; the American doctor's cheery ringing laugh sounding long on the quiet night air, as he and the commander tell alternately the most astounding yarns, each with a dénouement more startling than the last. In the silent pauses between the tales, while they are collecting their wits, we can hear the croaking of the frogs away in the distance on the borders of the marsh, and with these two sounds alternately ringing in our ears we fall asleep."

At Adelaide an enthusiastically LOYAL RECEPTION was tendered to the Royal visitors, and afterward they set out for Melbourne. On the way they stopped at the southern end of Lake Albert, and had a kangaroo and cattle hunt. At Ballarat the gold mines were visited, and the young princes were photographed in mining attire. At Sydney the festivities to greet the arrivals were on a grand scale, and the distinguished guests seemed to have enjoyed themselves immensely. Brisbane was next visited, and then the travellers left for FIJI.

There they received a hearty welcome from King Thakombau, which is the subject of many most interesting pages. The royal kitchen (as shown in our front page picture, No. 4) was kept in a state of continual activity, in the desire of the King to provide what he considered to be befitting hospitality to the sons of the Queen.

was the next point, and after experiencing some truly tropical weather, they arrived at Yokohama, and were presented to the Mikado, in due form and with considerable pomp and ceremony (see first page picture, No. 7). Evidently the young men had learned a lesson that many older persons never learn—that of tolerance for the tastes of others. It comes out in the following shrewd remarks on the music which the Mikado provided for their entertainment: "During dinner the Mikado sent his own private band, the Reijin, to play on old Japanese, Chinese, and Korean instruments, most of them over 1500 years old; it is a very rare performance, and the only place you can hear it is in the Emperor's palace."

"The sounds that proceeded from the inner room where these musicians were placed were so faint and plaintive that some of the party ignorantly mistook them for preparations of a band tuning up, and as it went on for some time inquired when they were going to begin to play. This music in fact, like all Oriental music to a western ear, appears altogether out of tune and full of discords, being set in a wholly different key, and seeming to speak a wholly different language to our own. But after listening to it attentively for some time, although we cannot say we like it, yet we can quite understand how some people do, just as others admire Whistler's pictures or a piece of faded old silk work, or the faint flavor or smell of some, to our taste, sickly flower or fruit."

HOMEWARD.

We regret that space does not permit of our following the interesting travellers throughout their visits to China, the Straits, Ceylon, and above all Egypt and the Holy Land. These last were done in the most thorough manner, under the guidance of Captain Conder, and Sir Charles Wilson. Enough, however, has been said to show the character of the voyage which came to an end when the Bacchante let go her anchor on August 5th, 1882, in Cowes Roads from which place she sailed three years before. The record of the voyage contained in the diary so conscientiously kept by the young men proves that it was a valuable education to them mentally and morally, and their father evidently adopted the best means at his command to fit them for the throne, if, when he and his mother have passed away, the British people should still think a monarch necessary to their well-being.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Disloyal Deserter.—At a Recent Meeting a Christian worker remarked: "I recollect the sad case of a young man who professed conversion to Christ, and for a number of years stood firm to his colors; but oh, it makes me shudder when I recall it; he turned back like the swine to its wallowing in the mire, and set his face against all that was good, and then there was nothing too bad for him to do; he became one of the worst of men. But the God of love holds out a promise to even such as he. 'Return to Me, ye backsliding children; I will heal your backsliding. I will forgive you freely.'"

'Twon't be for Long!'—A Little Girl between seven and eight years of age lay dying recently. Her mother, sitting by her side, said, "Maria, do you want to die?" "Yes, I do!" she answered, with great emphasis. "What! want to go and leave your father and mother and brother?" "Yes," replied the child; "'twon't be for long! You and father and brother will soon follow; I want to go and be with Jesus." In a few hours after the child looked up and smiled with inexpressible sweetness, and then said, as though she looked upon the face of an angel, "Wait a minute; I am coming!" She then sank back quietly on her pillow. "God's finger touched her, and she slept." "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The Landlady's Troublesome Card.—Sergeant Mathers said: "I knew a young man who went to lodge with a Christian lady. She had a card placed upon her wall with these words printed on it: 'The eye of God is everywhere, beholding the evil and the good.' Every time this young man entered the house this card was the first thing on which his eyes rested. He got wearied with the sight of it, for his life was such that he shrank from God's all-seeing eye. Whatever he did or wherever he went, he felt that the eye of God was upon him. He turned the front of the card to the wall several times, that these awful words might not be seen by him, for unconsciously his eyes were always being directed to the card. His landlady noticed this, and every time he turned it she put it right again. At length he resolved to leave his comfortable lodgings, for this little card kept his life in constant misery, and he did leave them rather than feel he was under the penetrating eye of God, from whom he could not flee."

End of a Gambler and Cockfighter.—A Visitor said: "I was just concluding our subject at the working lads' Bible-class one Saturday evening, when there was a loud and hasty knock at the door. 'Will the doctor come at once and see father, mother thinks he is dying?' were the words of a girl about sixteen. Such a summons as this was hastily obeyed; but though no time was lost, it was already too late. The day of grace was gone. Again and again had God knocked at the door of a stony heart, and now the door of heaven stood no longer open. There in the bed lay the corpse of a fine strong man, so recently in the prime of life. Five years ago he took to drink, and since then he has never helped to keep his wife or family, his time being spent in drinking, gambling, cock-fighting, etc. The children had to go on the stage, and the wife had to work hard to provide food and shelter for him and themselves. He died suddenly during an attack of inflammation of the lungs, after a week of heavy drinking. To see her husband thus suddenly called before the great Judge was a solemn warning to the widow. But her lesson was not yet learned. A few weeks after her daughter had rheumatic fever, and again I had a hasty summons, as she also was thought to be dying. She was, however, only faint from the accompanying heart disease, and is now somewhat improved, though I fear only temporarily. We believe that at last the poor mother, nearly worn out with trouble and anxiety, has been led to cast her burden on the Lord, and, 'weary and heavy laden,' found rest in Him. The eldest girl in this family is a bright, happy Christian, and was brought to know the Lord in our Sunday-school some years ago. We were able to give much help in this case, in the way of food and clothing."

A Revenge on the Rum-seller.—A Minister of the Gospel remarked: "On New Year's morning a man, under the influence of liquor, entered a saloon without any money, and demanded some whiskey. The bar-tender refused to give it, when the man said that he would be revenged upon him by going to a temperance meeting and signing the pledge. The bar-tender advised him to do so, saying that it was just his kind they wanted. The man did go to the meeting and sign the pledge. The next day he had a vague recollection of taking the pledge, but he thought it must have been a dream; but, no, he had positive proof, for he had his pledge card. He attended the meeting after that in a state of deep anxiety for some time, and at length gave himself to Christ. When applying for membership into my church, last week, he told me that my saying a few words of sympathy and encouragement to him in the early days of his struggle was the beginning of his awakening to his lost condition. Since that time he had by prayer and faith sought and found forgiveness for his sins. He is now giving every proof that he is a child of God through faith in Jesus Christ."

Tragic History of Four Sergeants.—Sergeant Mathers said: "I remember a very sad case of four sergeants in the army. These four men had often been pleaded with to flee from the wrath to come, but they hardened their hearts to all entreaties and all four became out and out infidels. Once in a drunken bout they resolved to gather all the Bibles in the barracks together, and make a bonfire of them; and one night they collected all the Bibles, and gathering them together into a large heap, they set fire to them, and danced round about the blaze with fiendish glee. All four within that year were still in death. The first one was carried to a hospital and there died in fearful agony from delirium tremens. One of the number went to see him while he was writhing in fever. He looked at the victim of drink for a moment, and said with a sneer upon his lips, 'So that is how it is with a fellow that has delirium tremens? I am glad I know it.' With these words he returned home, and shutting himself into his own room he took a pistol and blew out his brains. The third, when on sentry duty one night at Gibraltar, shot himself with his rifle. The fourth came home with his company, and one day when riding through a lonely part of the country, he was thrown from his horse and killed without a moment's warning."

Saved by a Child's Hymn.—There was a very wretched home where a drunken father dwelt with one little girl, his only child. He took no care of either her body or soul, but left her to grow up as she could. Someone, however, had led her to the Sabbath-school, and there she had learned to love Jesus, and to sing His praises. So she often cheered herself in her miserable home by singing her Sabbath-school hymns as she went about her tasks, which her father's misconduct made so heavy. One day he was within the house sleeping off his drunkenness, when waking up he heard her as she went to and fro singing softly,

"There is a happy land Far, far away."

"Yes," he said to himself, "it must be far away for her, poor thing; it cannot be here with me." And the thought, like a heavenly seed fallen into his heart, wrought and sprang up, till he asked to be taught by the little singer, and became himself a little child, saved by a child's hymn. By-and-by the song from her lips ceased on earth, but she went not away home to Christ till she knew that she had left one behind who would sing that strain all the more fondly, that he would think of her as gone away to the "far" country, and of himself as following her thither.

A SUPERNAL GARDEN.

The Second of Dr. Talmage's Vacation Sermons on the Voices of Gardens and Fields.

"I am come into my garden."—SOLOMON'S SONG 5:1.

Bible Lyrics—Their Endless Variety—The Poem of the Garden—Famous Historical Gardens—Shenstone's Triumph—The Garden of the Church—Blood-Bought—I. A Place of Choice Flowers—The Violets of the Church—The Cactus—A Minister's Temper—A Milkman Knocked Down—The Roses and Snowdrops—The Century Plant—II. THE Bible is a great poem. We have in it faultless rhythm and bold imagery and startling antithesis and rapturous lyric and sweet pastoral and instructive narrative and devotional psalm; thoughts expressed in style more solemn than that of Montgomery, more bold than that of Milton, more terrible than that of Dante, more natural than that of Wordsworth, more impassioned than that of Pollok, more tender than that of Cowper, more weird than that of Spenser.

THIS GREAT POEM

brings all the gems of the earth into its coronet, and it weaves the flames of judgment into its garlands, and pours eternal harmonies in its rhythm. Everything this book touches it makes beautiful, from the plain stones of the summer threshing floor to the daughters of Nahor filling the trough for the camels; from the fish pools of Heshbon up to the Psalmist praising God with diapason of storm and whirlwind, and Job's imagery of Orion, Arcturus, and the Pleiades.

My text leads us into a scene of summer redolence. The world has had a great many BEAUTIFUL GARDENS.

Charlemagne added to the glory of his reign by decreeing that they be established all through the realm—deciding even the names of the flowers to be planted there. Henry IV., at Montpelier, established gardens of bewitching beauty and luxuriance, gathering into them Alpine, Pyrenean, and French plants. One of the sweetest spots on earth was the garden of Shenstone, the poet. His writings have made but little impression on the world; but his garden, "The Leasowes," will be immortal. To the natural advantage of that place was brought the perfection of art. Arbor and terrace and slope and rustic temple and reservoir and urn and fountain here had their crowning. Oak and yew and hazel put forth their richest foliage. There was no life more diligent, no soul more ingenious than that of Shenstone, and all that diligence and genius he brought to the adornment of that one treasured spot. He gave three hundred pounds for it; he sold it for seventeen thousand. And yet I am to tell you to-day of than any I have mentioned. It is the garden spoken of in my text, the garden of the Church, which belongs to Christ, for my text says so. He bought it, He planted it, He owns it, and He shall have it. Walter Scott in his outlay at Abbotsford, ruined his fortune; and now, in the crimson flowers of those gardens, you can almost think or imagine that you see the blood of that old man's broken heart. The payment of the last one hundred thousand pounds sacrificed him. But I have to tell you that Christ's life and Christ's death were the outlay of this beautiful garden of the Church, of which my text speaks. Oh, how many sighs and tears and pangs and agonies! Tell me, ye women who saw Him hang! Tell me, ye executioners who lifted Him and let Him down! Tell me, thou sun that didst hide; ye rocks that fell! "Christ loved the Church and gave Himself for it." If the garden of the Church belongs to Christ, certainly He has a right to walk in it.

Come, then, O blessed Jesus, to-day; walk up and down these aisles, and pluck what Thou wilt of sweetness for Thyself!

The Church, in my text, is appropriately compared to a garden, because it is a place of choice flowers, of select fruits, and of thorough irrigation.

ITS WEALTH OF FLOWERS.

I. That would be a strange garden in which there were no flowers. If nowhere else they would be along the borders or at the gateway. The homeliest taste will dictate something, if it be only the old-fashioned hollyhock, or dahlia, or daffodil; but if there be larger means, then you will find the Mexican cactus, and blazing azalea, and clustering oleander. Well, now, Christ comes to His garden and He plants there some of the brightest spirits that ever flowered upon the world. Some of them are violets, unobtrusive, but sweet as heaven. You have to search and find them. You do not see them very often, perhaps, but you find where they have been by the brightened face of the invalid, and the sprig of geranium on the stand, and the new window-curtains keeping out the glow of the sunlight. They are, perhaps, more like the ranunculus, creeping sweetly along amid the thorns and briars of life, giving kiss for sting; and many a man who has had in his way some great black rock of trouble, has found that they have covered it all over with flowery jasmine running in and out amid the crevices. These flowers in Christ's garden are not, like the sunflower, gaudy in the light, but wherever darkness hovers over a soul that needs to be comforted, there they stand, night blooming cereuses.

But in Christ's garden there are plants that may be better compared to —thorns without, loveliness within; men with sharp points of character. They wound almost every one that touches them. They are hard to handle. Men pronounce them nothing but thorns, but Christ loves them notwithstanding all their sharpnesses. Many a man has had a very hard ground to cultivate, and it has only been through severe trial he has raised even the smallest scrap of grace. A very harsh minister was talking to a very placid elder, and the placid elder said to the harsh minister, "Doctor, I do wish you would control your temper." "Ah," said the minister to the elder, "I control more temper in five minutes than you do in five years."

THE MEXICAN CACTUS

It is harder for some men to do right than for other men to do right. The grace that would elevate you to the seventh heaven might not keep your brother from knocking a man down. I had a friend who came to me and said, "I dare not join the Church." I said, "Why?" "Oh," he said, "I have such a violent temper. Yesterday morning I was crossing very early at the Jersey City Ferry, and I saw a milkman pour a large quantity of water into the milk-can, and I said to him, 'I think that will do,' and he insulted me, and I knocked him down. Do you think I ought to join the Church?" Nevertheless, that very same man, who was so harsh in his behavior, loved Christ, and could not speak of sacred things without tears of emotion and affection. Thorns without, sweetness within—the best specimen of Mexican cactus I ever saw.

There are others planted in Christ's garden who are always radiant, always impressive—more like of deep hue that we occasionally find called "giants of battle;" the Martin Luthers, St. Pauls, Chrysostoms, Wickliffs, Latimers, and Samuel Rutherfords. What in other men is a spark, in them is a conflagration. When they sweat, they sweat great drops of blood. When they pray, their prayer takes fire. When they preach, it is a Pentecost. When they fight, it is a Thermopylae. When they die, it is a martyrdom. You find a great many roses in the gardens, but only a few "giants of battle." Men say, "Why don't you have more of them in the Church?" I say, "Why don't you have in the world more Humboldts and Wellingtons." God gives to some ten talents, to another, one.

In this garden of the Church which Christ has planted I also find the snowdrops, beautiful, but cold-looking, seemingly another phase of winter. I mean those Christians who are precise in their tastes, unimpassioned, pure as snowdrops and as cold. They never shed any tears, they never get excited, they never say anything rashly, they never do anything precipitately. Their pulses never flutter, their nerves never twitch, their indignation never boils over. They live longer than most people, but their life is in a minor key. They never run up to "C" above the staff. In their music of life they have no staccato passages. Christ planted them in the Church, and they must be of some service or they would not be there; snowdrops—always snowdrops.

But I have not told you of the most beautiful flower in all this garden spoken of in the text. If you see your emotions are started. You say, "Why, this flower has been a hundred years gathering up for one bloom, and it will be a hundred years more before other petals will come out." But I have to tell you of a plant that was gathering up from all eternity, and that nineteen hundred years ago put forth its bloom never to wither. It is the passion-plant of the cross! Prophets foretold it; Bethlehem shepherds looked upon it in the bud; the rocks shook at its bursting; and the dead got up in their winding sheets to see its full bloom. It is a crimson flower—blood at the roots, blood on the branches, blood on all the leaves. Its perfume is to fill all the nations. Its breath is heaven. Come, oh winds from the north and winds from the south and winds from the east and winds from the west and bear to all the earth the sweet-smelling savor of Christ, my Lord!

"His worth if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love Him too."

II. Again, the Church may be appropriately compared to a garden, because it is

A PLACE OF FRUITS.

That would be a strange garden which had in it no berries, no plums, or peaches, or apricots. The coarser fruits are planted in the orchard or they are set out on the sunny hillside; but the choicest fruits are kept in the garden. So in the world outside the Church, Christ has planted a great many beautiful things—patience, charity, generosity, integrity; but He intends the choicest fruits to be in the garden, and if they are not there, then shame on the Church.

Religion is not a mere flowering sentimentality. It is a practical, life-giving, healthful fruit—not posies, but apples. "Oh," says somebody, "I don't see what your garden of the Church has yielded." Where did your asylums come from? and your hospitals? and your institutions of mercy? Christ planted every one of them; He planted them in His garden. When Christ gave sight to Bartimeus He laid the corner-stone of every blind asylum that has ever been built. When Christ soothed the demoniac of Galilee He laid the corner-stone of every lunatic asylum that has ever been established. When Christ said to the sick man, "Take up thy bed and walk," He laid the corner-stone of every hospital the world has ever seen. When Christ said, "I was in prison and ye visited Me," he laid the corner-stone of every prison reform association that has ever been organized. The Church of Christ is a glorious garden, and it is full of fruit.

I know there is

in it. I know there are some weeds that ought to be thrown over the fence. I know there are some crab-apple trees that ought to be cut down. I know there are some wild grapes that ought to be uprooted; but are you going to destroy the whole garden because of a little gnarled fruit? You will find worm-eaten leaves in Fontainable, and insects that sting in the fairy groves of the Champs-Élysées. You do not tear down and destroy the whole garden because there are a few specimens of gnarled fruit. I admit there are men and women in the Church who ought not to be there; but let us be just as frank and admit the fact that there are hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of glorious Christian men and women—holy, blessed, useful, consecrated, and triumphant. There is no grander collection in all the earth than

THE COLLECTION OF CHRISTIANS.

There are Christian men in this house whose religion is not a matter of psalm-singing and church-going. To-morrow morning that religion will keep them just as consistent and consecrated in their worldly occupation, as it ever kept them at the communion-table. There are women here to-day of a higher type of character than Mary of Bethany. They not only sit at the feet of Christ, but they go out into the kitchen to help Martha in her work, that she may sit there too. There is a woman who has a drunken husband, who has exhibited more faith and patience and courage than Ridley in the fire. He was consumed in twenty minutes. Hers has been a twenty years' martyrdom. Yonder is a man who has been fifteen years on his back, unable even to feed himself, yet calm and peaceful as though he lay on one of the green banks of heaven, watching the oarsmen dip their paddles in the crystal river! Why, it seems to me this moment as if St. Paul threw to us a pomologist's catalogue of the fruits growing in this great garden of Christ—love, joy, peace, patience, charity, brotherly kindness, gentleness, mercy; glorious fruit, enough to fill all the baskets of earth and heaven.

III. Again, the Church in my text is appropriately called a garden, because it is THOROUGHLY IRRIGATED.

No garden could prosper long without plenty of water. I have seen a garden in the midst of a desert, yet blooming and luxuriant. All around was dearth and barrenness; but there were pipes, aqueducts, reaching from this garden up to the mountains, and through those aqueducts the water came streaming down and tossing up into beautiful fountains, until every root and leaf and flower were saturated. That is like the Church. The Church is a garden in the midst of a great desert of sin and suffering; but it is well irrigated, for "our eyes are unto the hills from whence cometh our help." From the mountains of God's strength there flow down rivers of gladness. "There is a river the stream whereof shall make glad the city of our God." Preaching the Gospel is one of

THE AQUEDUCTS.

The Bible is another. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are aqueducts. Water to slake the thirst, water to wash the unclean, water tossed high up in the light of the sun of righteousness, showing us the rainbow around the throne. Oh, was there ever a garden so thoroughly irrigated? You know that the beauty of Versailles and Chatsworth depends very much upon the great supply of water. I came to the latter place, Chatsworth, one day when strangers are not to be admitted; but by an inducement which always seemed as potent with an Englishman as an American, I got in, and then the gardener went far up above the stairs of stone and turned on the water. I saw it gleaming on the dry pavement, coming down from step to step until it came so near I could hear the musical rush, and all over the high, broad stairs it came foaming, flashing, roaring down, until sunlight and wave in gleesome wrestle tumbled at my feet. So it is with the Church of God. Everything comes from above; pardon from above, joy from above, adoption from above, sanctification from above.

THE OWNER.

Hark! I hear the latch of the garden-gate, and I look to see who is coming. I hear the voice of Christ. "I am come into My garden." I say, "Come in, O Jesus! we have been waiting for Thee; walk all through the paths. Look at the flowers; look at the fruit; pluck that which Thou wilt for Thyself." Jesus comes into the garden and up to that old man, and touches him, and says, "Almost home, father; not many more aches for thee; I will never leave thee; take courage a little longer and I will steady thy tottering steps, and I will soothe thy troubles and give thee rest. Courage, old man." Then Christ goes up another garden path, and He comes to a soul in trouble and says, "Peace! all is well. I have seen thy tears. I have heard thy prayer. The sun shall not smite thee by day nor the moon by night. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; He will preserve thy soul. Courage, O troubled spirit!"

Then I see Jesus going up another garden path, and I see great excitement among the leaves, and I hasten up that garden path to see what Jesus is doing there, and lo! He is breaking off flowers, sharp and clean from the stem, and I say, "Stop, Jesus, don't kill those beautiful flowers." He turns to me and says, "I have come into My garden to gather lilies, and I mean to take these up to a higher terrace, for the garden around My palace, and there I will plant them; and in better soil and in better air they shall put forth brighter leaves and sweeter redolence, and no frost shall touch them forever." And I looked up into His face and said, "Well, it is His garden, and He has a right to do what He will with it. Thy will be done!"—the hardest prayer a man ever made.

It has seemed as if Jesus

CHRIST TOOK THE BEST;

from many of your households the best one is gone. You know that she was too good for this world; she was the gentlest in her ways, the deepest in her affections; and when at last the sickness came you had no faith in medicines. You knew that the hour of parting had come, and when, through the rich grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, you surrendered that treasure, you said, "Lord Jesus, take it—it is the best we have; take it. Thou art worthy!" The others in the household may have been of grosser mould. She was of the finest.

The heaven of your little ones will not be fairly begun until you get there. All the kindnesses shown them by immortals will not make them forget you. There they are, the radiant throngs that went out from your homes. I throw a kiss to the sweet darlings. They are all well now in the palace. The crippled child has a sound foot now. A little lame child says, "Ma, will I be lame in heaven?" "No, my darling, you won't be lame in heaven." A little sick child says, "Ma, will I be sick in heaven?" "No, my dear, you won't be sick in heaven." A little blind child says, "Ma, will I be blind in heaven?" "No, my dear, you won't be blind in heaven. They are all well there."

NO FENCES.

I notice that the fine gardens sometimes have high fences around them, and I cannot get in. It is so with a king's garden. The only glimpse you ever get of such a garden is when the king rides out in his splendid carriage. It is not so with this garden, this king's garden. I throw wide open the gate and tell you all to come in. No monopoly in religion. Whosoever will, may. Choose now between a desert and a garden. Many of you have tried the garden of this world's delight. You have found it has been a chagrin. So it was with Theodore Hook. He made all the world laugh. He makes us laugh now when we read his poems; but he could not make his own heart laugh. While in the midst of his festivities he confronted a looking-glass, and he saw himself and said, "There, that is true. I look just as I am, done up in body, mind, and purse." So it was of Shenstone, of whose garden I told you at the beginning of my sermon. He sat down amid those bowers and said, "I have lost my road to happiness. I am angry and envious and frantic and despise everything around me just as it becomes a madman to do."

O ye weary souls! come into Christ's garden to-day and pluck a little heartsease. Christ is the only rest and the only pardon for a perturbed spirit. Do you not think your chance has almost come? You men and women who have been waiting year after year for some good opportunity in which to accept Christ, but have postponed it, five, ten, twenty, thirty years—do you not feel as if now your hour of deliverance and pardon and salvation had come? O man, what grudge hast thou against thy poor soul that thou wilt not let it be saved? I feel as if salvation must come to-day in some of your hearts.

Some years ago a vessel struck on the rocks. They had

ONLY ONE LIFEBOAT.

In that lifeboat the passengers and crew were getting ashore. The vessel had foundered, and was sinking deeper and deeper, and that one boat could not take the passengers very swiftly. A little girl stood on the deck waiting for her turn to get into the boat. The boat came and went, came and went, but her turn did not seem to come. After awhile she could wait no longer, and she leaped on the taffrail and then sprang into the sea, crying to the boatman, "Save me next! Save me next!" Oh, how many have gone ashore into God's mercy, and yet you are clinging to the wreck of sin! Others have accepted the pardon of Christ, but you are in peril. Why not, this moment, make a rush for your immortal rescue, crying until Jesus shall hear you, and heaven and earth ring with the cry, "Save me next! Save me next!" Now is the day of salvation! Now! Now!

This Sabbath is the last for some of you. It is about to sail away forever. Her bell tolls. The planks thunder back in the gangway. She shoves off. She floats out toward the great ocean of eternity. Wave farewell to your last chance for heaven. "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thee as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, and ye would not? Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Invited to revel in a garden, you die in a desert. May God Almighty, before it is too late, break that infatuation.

WHIPPINGHAM CHURCH.

THE two princes whose portraits appear on the first page were on August 8th, 1882, the chief figures in a ceremony conducted in the little church of St. Mildred at Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight. There at the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury they received the rite of confirmation. The church is, in its way, an architectural gem. It is square in form, with wings built to suggest a Latin cross. It has in its centre front a little Norman tower and small Norman windows of stained glass. The edifice is dwarfed by towering elms that shade the sloping churchyard, filled with moss-covered marbles, the inscriptions of which run into the times of many of Victoria's predecessors. The churchyard bank at one point is kissed by the silver ripples of the Medina River, a broad waterway between Newport and Cowes. The church was built from designs by the late Prince Albert, who laid its corner-stone. Against the church wall which separates the chancel from the nave there is a piece of sculpture in marble comprising a medallion of the Prince; under a canopy two angels are holding a crown over his head, and below it is this inscription:

IN THIS CHURCH, ERECTED UNDER HIS DIRECTION, IS PLACED THIS MONUMENT,
BY HIS BROKEN HEARTED AND DEVOTED WIDOW, VICTORIA.

Though it will not hold more than two hundred persons, the edifice was selected for the ceremony by the Queen on account of its association with her husband. That was the reason, also, why her youngest daughter was married there, on July 23d, last year.

A PERSIAN STUDENT IN NEW YORK.

A SHORT time ago a Christian gentleman traveling in Connecticut noticed with surprise two strangely attired men working on a farm. In conversation with the farmer he learned that they were two young Persians who, having been converted to Christianity, in their own country had come to the United States for an education that they might preach Christ to their Mohammedan fellow-countrymen. An interview was arranged with the young men, and it was found that one of them was able to make himself understood in English, while the other was laboriously studying the language, beginning at the alphabet. They had decided to support themselves by farm work while they were mastering the rudiments of the language, and by diligent study were qualifying themselves for admission into some theological college. The self-reliance and earnest devotion of the young men pleased their new friend, who, having some influence, secured their admission into the General Theological Seminary in New York.

One of the young men has completed his education and has returned to Persia, the other, Yaroo M. Neesan, is still studying in the college and expects to remain one or two years longer. He is a native of Oroomiah in Persia, and bears a strong testimonial from the Rev. P. Z. Easton, the American missionary at Tabreez, who speaks in the highest terms of his personal piety, and the devotion with which he entered into evangelistic work in Persia before coming to America. His intelligence and his command of the English language impress all who talk with him, and learn how short a time has elapsed since he did not know a single letter of the English alphabet. Dr. E. A. Hoffman, Dean of the Theological Seminary, and Dr. R. B. Fairbairn, of St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y., testify in the highest terms to the diligence and ability he has manifested in his studies. He is eagerly looking forward to the time when he will be qualified for labor in his native country, where the subtlety and argumentative skill of the Mohammedan leaders require the advocates of Christianity to be men such as the Apostle Paul described, "furnished completely to every good work" (II Tim. 3: 17).

BISHOP HANNINGTON AMONG LIONS.

A THRILLING incident in the life of the devoted bishop who recently fell a victim to African heathen savagery is narrated among some personal reminiscences furnished to a daily journal by a friend of the martyred missionary. He relates that during one of his first missionary expeditions into the interior of Africa, the missionary left the camp one day for a stroll hoping to collect some new botanical specimens. When about a mile from the camp he saw some animal moving through the dense mimosa scrub, and, firing, killed it. His prey proved to be a large lion's cub. His attendant ran off in terror, and his warning shout of "Run, bwana, run!" were accentuated by a double roar. Looking round, Hannington saw the bereaved parents, a fine lion and lioness, coming toward him with long, bounding leaps over the scrub. An ordinary man, encountering lions for the first time, would probably have lost all presence of mind, and, turning to run, have been inevitably destroyed. He deliberately faced round upon his enemy. The enraged lions were distant but a few paces, but they suddenly checked, and both stood as though transfixed, glaring upon him. So they remained for some time, till Hannington, placing one foot behind the other, and still keeping his eyes fixed upon the yellow orbs before him, gradually increased his distance, and having placed about a hundred yards between himself and the monsters, quietly walked away. Hannington determined to return and secure the skin of the cub he had killed. So he retraced his steps. When near enough to observe their motions, he could see that the lion and lioness were walking round about their cub, licking its body, and filling the air with low growlings. With coolness perfectly amazing he ran forward a few paces, threw up his arms, and shouted! Was it that the lions had never encountered so strange an antagonist before? At all events, they looked up, then turned tail, and bounded away. He dragged the cub for some distance, from the spot and then shouldered and brought it into camp.

A FEARLESS MEXICAN JUDGE.

THE Rev. E. M. Haymaker, of Zacatecas, mentions in a private letter to a friend his meeting during a recent journey with a judge who is now a member of the Church. Mr. Haymaker was impressed with his dignity, intelligence, and strong faith. He relates the following incident in his past life, which shows that the judge is also possessed of high moral courage: "Five years ago, when worship was first opened in that place, he freely professed himself in our favor, and his house was consequently attacked by a mob at night. He coolly opened the doors and walked out into the mob as fearless as if it were but a picnic, and began to take down the names of the principal insurgents, all of whom he knew, and commanded them to appear at his office the next day for judgment. This made them afraid of him, and so he chased the whole mob away, unarmed and alone. He afterward joined our Church, and has never allowed our worship to be interfered with in any way."

THE SIOUX COMMISSIONER.

AT the recent General Assembly one of the commissioners attracted much attention. He was Anawangmane, the commissioner from the Sioux Indians. He is now eighty years of age, and it is forty-five years since he was received into the Church by Dr. S. R. Riggs, one of the pioneer missionaries sent to the Sioux by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The following details are extracted from this month's Foreign Missionary, which gives a full sketch of his life:

"Simon Anawangmane was at the time of his conversion the foremost brave of the Sioux nation. He was 'above law.' That is, he had so distinguished himself by savage bravery that, according to a singular custom, he could not be punished for anything he did, and was entitled to hold that position until some other man excelled him in during. He was the first full-blooded Sioux to accept Christ. Dr. Riggs says of him: 'He immediately put on white man's clothes, and made and planted a field of corn and potatoes adjoining the mission field. No Dakota brave dared to cut up his tent, or kill his dog, or break his gun; but this did not prevent the boys nor the women from pointing the finger at him, and saying, "There goes the man who has made himself a woman!"' But Simon could not be turned aside from his Christian purpose. Thirty years have passed, and still he stands fast. Nearly all that time he has been a ruling elder, and for twenty years a licensed preacher.

"At the time of the Minnesota massacre, in 1862, Simon, with other Dakotas, nobly illustrated the power of Christian principle. In the soldiers' lodge and at the council-fire he opposed the war, he pleaded for the whites, and when the tempest broke, he befriended them at the peril of his life. Mrs. Newman and her children, taken captive by the Sioux of the Lower Agency, heard the voice of prayer from Simon's tent. She committed herself to his hands, and he, waiting until the Indians' camp was moved further north, stayed behind, and then placing her and her children in a one-horse wagon, he drove them in safety from Yellow Medicine to Fort Ridgely.

"These facts in Simon's history were alluded to by Rev. John P. Williamson in his speech at the Foreign Missionary meeting of the Assembly. The request instantly came from all parts of the house, 'Call him to the platform!' After repeated calls, the aged Dakota left his seat and ascended the platform stairs, greeted warmly by the presiding officer of the meeting, and welcomed with a round of applause.

"It would seem as if God had spared this old warrior of the Sioux, the very leader in other days of their ferocious bands, and had brought him face to face with the General Assembly of our Church as a living and unanswerable witness of the power of the Gospel over the Indian heart."

THE SUMMONS TO THE CLOUDS.

By Rev. W. Haslam, M.A.

The Event Now Impending—None to Surely Intervene—The Disappearance of Believers—Invisible, Sudden, Secret—Who Will Meet Them—The Dead in the Intermediate State—The People Left Behind—The Parabolic Key.

LET us consider the first actual event for which as Christians we are instructed to look. This is none other than the taking-up or translation of the Church to be with Christ when He comes to the "air" or the heavenlies. We are not told to watch for any sign or to look for any token, but simply to "wait and be ready."

The Jews may or may not be restored to their own land before this event; there may or may not be signs in the heavens and upon the earth; but we are commanded to fix our expectation upon the Advent of the Lord only. We are not even told that we shall die first. The Lord is gone to receive for Himself a kingdom and to return. He may come at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning (Mark 13: 35); but we are bidden to be as servants waiting for their Master.

In the plainest words our blessed Lord taught His disciples that He was going away to prepare a place for them. He said, "I go to prepare a place for you," and "I will come again, and receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also" (John 14: 2, 3). Again, upon the Mount of Ascension, when the Lord was departing, the two men in white apparel said to the disciples, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts 1: 10, 11). Afterward it was more fully and distinctly revealed to the Apostle Paul by the Lord Himself that He would come and take His believing people to Himself.

This is the definite hope and expectation of the Christian Church as given in the Word of God—the hope which is now being revived and established upon the authority of the Lord Himself. When the Church of Christ is fully formed by the preaching of the Gospel of grace and the operation of the Holy Spirit, she will be presented to Christ, and welcomed by Him. Even now the union of believers with the risen Christ is so complete that the apostle says, "We are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones" (Eph. 5: 30). How much greater and more complete will be this union hereafter!

This Church is saved, cleansed, and united with Christ, not for any merit or suffering of hers, but for His sake alone.

NO SUFFERING

on her part is needful for her acceptance; nor is it conditionally required to fit her for the glory which is to be. Therefore it cannot be necessary for this part of the Church to go through the tribulation in order to be partaker of the Lord's glory. The world

WILL NOT SEE THEM GO;

nor does it appear anywhere in Scripture that the graves even of those who sleep in Jesus will be disturbed. This translation will be sudden as it is certain, and secret as it is sure. It will, no doubt, be a startling fact to the world, a surprising event to those who are not ready. Enoch was taken up to be with God, and no one saw him go. Elijah ascended up in a chariot of fire, with horses of fire; and yet he was seen of none but Elisha and some of the sons of the prophets. (See II Kings 2.) Christ was taken up into heaven in the presence of His disciples, but the world did not see Him depart. Such was the manner of the Lord's ascension; and the same will be the manner of the translation of the saints when the Lord comes to the heavenlies. This is the Parousia, or secret Coming of the Lord, for which believers should be waiting. We must not omit to mention here of the Church of Christ who are to be partakers of the glory. I mean those saints who are already departed to be with Christ. No doubt many of them before their removal from earth rejoiced in the hope of the Lord's Coming; but we may be sure that a far greater number left this world with no definite knowledge concerning it. As soon as they were gone from the body, they understood at once that they had passed only to an intermediate or waiting state. There they remain, looking and hoping for the day when they shall be clothed upon with glorified bodies, and their salvation be completed. It may be that some of them had great prejudices against the Christian hope, and preferred, as many do still, to stand before the "judgment" bar. They, it may be, clung to their catechism and the hymns of their youth—the traditional lore in which they had been brought up. But when they died, they left all that was human behind and entered upon the divine state, with divine, and not human, surroundings. There, with more distinct apprehension than we can have here, they are able to say, "Our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3:20).

If the question be asked, Is not a great part of that which is commonly called the "Christian Church" at the translation of the saints? unhappily the answer must be in the affirmative. It is sadly true that a large portion of that body which professes and calls itself Christian is so only in name, and not in spiritual power and vitality. From the beginning of the Christian dispensation there have always been those who have departed from the simplicity of the faith as it is in Jesus. The Lord predicted this, in the

TO BE LEFT BEHIND

which He spoke concerning the Christian Church, or the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. 13.) It will be seen there that three parables were spoken outside the house to the multitude, and three inside to the disciples. These last three, namely, the parables of the treasure hid in the field, the pearl of great price, and the net that was cast into the sea, refer to the inward or Spiritual Church. Those parables outside the house, namely, the tares and the wheat, the mustard-tree, and the leaven, refer to the outward Church.

In the first of these parables the Lord represents the enemy sowing tares among the wheat, and tells how both are allowed to grow together until the harvest. In the second, He shows how the outward Church from a very small beginning will become an important organization, and how it will shelter in its arms that which destroys the good seed. In the third, He shows that as the woman took and hid leaven in the pure meal so that all the lump was leavened, so the Church will hide in or mix with the simple truth of God a leaven of evil or error which will vitiate the whole outward Church.

Notice that God never leaves Himself without witness. However evil an organization may be, there are always some members of it who are better than their system. We may be sure that in every generation there are who have not bowed the knee to Baal. The prophet Elijah did not know them; but God did. Through all ecclesiastical ages and systems there have been persons who were not really Roman, or Greek, or Anglican; though they were numbered among one or the other of these sections. They did not believe in receiving grace through sacraments, but by direct and personal faith in Christ. They made use of the sacraments or ordinances not in order to obtain grace, but to show that they were already partakers of it. They were persons who had been raised from the death of sin, as Lazarus was raised from his grave; though they continued to be wrapped in many ecclesiastical grave-clothes. These, no doubt, will be found among the living believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, though, it may be, they knew nothing whatever about the Lord's Coming.

PRINCELY CHRISTIANS.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

Responsibility of a Young Man of Family—The Prince of Wales in America—What is Expected of a Child of God—Horses that Kick under the Curry-comb—The Ribbon Badge on a Prince's Shoulder.

The text reads: "He that is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."—I JOHN 3:9.

We must go to this text through the context, and I drop back a few lines, and read first, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."

Now the first thought suggested in the context is this: The princely character of a Christian man. Brother, it is worth a great deal to a man to know that he belongs to a good family. It is worth a good deal to a boy to know that he belongs to a good family; and that boy is bound by every sacred tie of honor to maintain the character of the family to which he belongs. And many a boy has drifted right to the very verge of destruction, and in some thoughtful moment a kind spirit walked up and put his hand on his shoulder and said: "Young man, why will you live as you do? Your father was a princely, noble man; your mother was a sweet-spirited, saintly woman; why will you live as you do?" And the boy goes off to one side and buries his face in his hands, and he says: "My father was a noble, princely man; my mother was the sweetest-spirited Christian woman that I ever saw, and, by the grace of God, I will reform my life at this hour, and I will no longer bring reproach and shame upon the name of such a father and mother as God gave me." And many a boy has been redeemed by that precious thought.

When the Prince of Wales came to this country, a few years ago, he was met at the harbor in New York by an American delegation. They took his hand and welcomed him as the son of Queen Victoria, and they said to him in substance: "We greet you as the son of the royal household of Europe, and we bid you welcome to America; but you are the son of a queen; you are a prince; you must and talk like a prince, and act like a prince, and go where a prince should go, and stay away from where a prince ought not to go," and everywhere he went he heard it; almost every word that he said was copied into the papers, and when he shook hands with us and bid us good-by and left for his English home, the verdict of America was, "He has behaved himself like a prince of England, like the son of a royal household." Brother, I am not the son of a queen, but I am the son of the Lord God Almighty, and I am heir apparent to all things. And when I step out before the world and make a profession like that, you expect something of me. And so it is with you. We expect you to live like a prince, to act like a prince, to go where a prince ought to go, and to stay away from where a prince ought not to go.

If you make a profession like that this world expects something of you, and, thank God, it has got a right to expect something of you. Everywhere you go and in everything you do you are to uphold the dignity of a child of God, and if you do not, this world criticises you, and I am glad it does. I am glad it does. I know how it is. I lived out of the church twenty-four years. I recollect how I used to criticise professional Christians when I saw them in the barrooms, and ball-rooms, and card-rooms. I never saw one of them in my life in one of those places that I had the least particle of confidence in. As God is my judge, that is true. And I never saw one of them there that I did not criticise him to his face and say to him, "Are you not a nice Christian? Are you not a nice professor of religion? This is our concern here. This belongs to the world, the flesh and the devil. What part have you got in this matter?"

And I declare to you I never had respect for any man who would belie his profession enough to go to these places and make himself at home there. A princely man! A princely woman!

THE SADDEST PLIGHT.

Of all the sad plights that the immortal soul ever found itself in, the greatest was at last, when it leaped from the heights of profession and fell into the depths of damnation. A man from the church of God doomed and damned! After your professions, and after your oath of allegiance to God, then to turn around and serve sin, and serve the world, and serve the devil! We not only bring reproach upon the cause of Jesus Christ, but we stultify ourselves, and advertise ourselves as false to God and false to ourselves. The highest ambition of my life is to live to see the day when every man who pines the name of Christ will be careful to depart from iniquity, and say that my life in Christ shall be hid and I shall live His life over again among the children of men.

Everybody despises a liar in the church. Everybody despises a man who professes one thing and lives another. And these people that you see living that way are the very ones that don't want to be criticised. You take a horse when he has got unsound spots on him, walk up to him, and he sees you with the curry-comb in your hand, and he will commence kicking before you get up to him. Have you not seen that? What is the matter? He has got unsound spots on him. But if the horse is sound all over from head to foot he will lean up to the curry-comb; he likes it—he likes it. I never did like these sensitive Christians. Always getting their feelings hurt. They go about with their feelings stuck out like porcupine quills. And if you go within ten feet of them you will hurt their feelings. Now let me tell you if your feelings are not hurt, and you don't improve your life, there is a clime toward which you are tending where your feelings will be eternally hurt.

When you bring a man face to face with the fact that he is a child of God, and that the noblest blood of all worlds courseth through his veins, and bring him face to face with the fact that to bring reproach and shame upon the family of God is the worst sin he can commit, you will bring that man face to face with a fact that will straighten him up and let him see his life in all its outlines and in all of its phases and see that it is trimmed right in the presence of God; the princely character of a Christian!

Once one of the Eastern emperors turned his son over to a tutor to train and educate; he was a ten or twelve year-old boy, and was a rude and unmanageable boy; and the question was with the tutor, "How will I manage him?" He could not whip the king's son. And the plan he fell upon was this: He made a bow of ribbon and pinned it on the lapel of the boy's coat, and the boy said: "What does this mean?" The tutor said: "This is the emblem of your royalty; that is the signet of your princely character; that is the sign that you are the son of the king." And ever after that when the boy misbehaved the tutor just pointed his finger at the badge and the boy subsided in a moment. St. Paul said: "I carry about with me the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ," and the very minute the good spirit drops his finger on the mark I subside in a minute, and I say "Lord help me to wipe my life away for having grieved that love." That is the true Christian spirit.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nomination of Fitz-John Porter Sent to the Senate on July 6th, is the outcome of the most persistent and protracted struggle of the kind on record. For more than twenty years Mr. Porter has been seeking vindication. At every session the bill for his relief has been presented and argued with energy and no little acrimony. Senator Logan has been its most inveterate, and for many years, its successful opponent, but this year, in spite of his efforts, it has been passed and signed by the President. The nomination follows as a matter of course. The President nominates him as colonel, that being the rank he held at the date of his dismissal from the army. The appointment takes date from May 14th, 1861.

The Senate, in Rejecting the Nomination of Mr. John Goode as solicitor-general, has caused general astonishment. The solicitor-general is only one remove from the Cabinet and is actually ex-officio a member of the Cabinet in the absence of the attorney-general. The unusual procedure has given rise to speculation as to its motive. Four reasons for the rejection were furnished to the Senate by Mr. Hoar who led the opposition to Mr. Goode. They were incompetency, alleged bribery and ballot-box-stuffing, the sale of official influence and the part he has taken in the Pan-Electric business. The Senate considered the case for six hours, and finally by a strict party vote of 28 to 25 rejected the nomination. Press-correspondents at Washington, who claim to speak on good authority, aver that the first three reasons advanced by Mr. Hoar did not weigh with the Senate as they were not clearly proved, and that it was really Mr. Goode's action in the Pan-Electric case which caused his rejection. It is evident that Mr. Garland's presence in the Cabinet will be a source of embarrassment to the President. Influential Democratic, Republican, and Independent journals unite in urging Mr. Cleveland to set himself right on the Pan-Electric question by asking for Mr. Garland's resignation. He appears, however, to be satisfied that his attorney-general is free from blame in the matter.

An Adverse Report on the Randall Tariff bill was presented to the House last week. In bringing in the report from the Ways and Means Committee Mr. Morrison said that the effect of the bill would be to produce a deficiency of forty-eight million dollars, and added that the committee while "unwilling to credit a purpose so lacking in patriotism, so forgetful of the public faith, must believe the bill the result of fiscal distemper, hindering a just comprehension and intelligent treatment of the subject." He went on to show that Mr. Randall must have miscalculated the effect of his reductions of internal revenue, when he stated it at twenty-six mil-ions, as the taxes he proposed to abolish produced last year between thirty-nine and forty millions. The tariff clauses would not entail a serious reduction—indeed Mr. Morrison contends that they would increase the present list. They were probably inserted to give a name and title to the bill. Its main purpose is to abolish the tax on tobacco and other articles, so as to prevent any tariff reductions being effected. Evidently no agreement on this question is possible between the two sections of the Democratic Party.

Three More Fishing Schooners have Been seized by the Canadian authorities. Their owners have been notified that a fine of four hundred dollars and costs has been imposed in each case. Intense indignation has been aroused in Portland, Me., by the seizures, and an urgent appeal has been sent to Secretary Bayard for his intervention. It would appear that the negotiations are complicated by having to deal with two governments, but Mr. Bayard has notified the English Government that he will look to it for compensation. It is admitted, however, that Canada regulates her own customs and has acted in this matter on her own responsibility. In a letter to the owners of the David J. Adams, Mr. Bayard says: "More than one year ago I sought to protect our citizens engaged in fishing from the results which might attend any possible misunderstanding between the governments of Great Britain and the United States as to the measure of their mutual rights and privileges in the territorial waters of British North America. But other counsels prevailed, and my efforts further to protect the fishermen from such trouble as you now suffer were unavailing." Mr. Bayard adds that he still hopes to secure a clear and comprehensive agreement on the subject, and to obtain reparation for all losses unlawfully caused.

Six Men Convicted of Boycotting were Sentenced last week in New York by Judge Barrett. This is the first case in this State in which boycotting has been declared a crime and punished. There was a case some time ago in which boycotting was an element, but in that it was coupled with extorting money, which was the crime really punished. In the case decided last week the men were charged with boycotting a bakery. No violence was alleged and a conviction was asked for by the counsel for the people on the ground that it was a conspiracy. The jury recommended the prisoners to mercy, and the judge said that as the prisoners probably were unaware that what they did was illegal, he would administer a light punishment, but in future any one convicted of the crime before him would get all the law allowed. Three of the men were sentenced to ten days' imprisonment and the other three to thirty days. The full penalty is a year in the Penitentiary.

The Enormous Number of Liquor Licenses granted in Brooklyn since the accession of the new mayor has alarmed the citizens, and as several other places not yet licensed are being prepared for the sale of liquor, an effort has been made to check the lavish issue of licenses. Indignation meetings have been held in several churches, and last Thursday one was summoned in the Sands Street Methodist Church, of which Mayor Whitney is a trustee and a prominent member. The immediate cause of the meeting was the building and decoration of an aristocratic bar-room within half a block of the church. No license has yet been granted for it, and the members of the church are in earnest in trying to prevent a license being obtained for it. Mayor Whitney was present and heard the indignant protests. One speaker, Dr. George L. Taylor, quoted from the Methodist book of discipline to show that as a member and a trustee of a Methodist church, Mayor Whitney was bound in the most solemn manner to oppose the liquor traffic, and he called upon the mayor to observe his vows or withdraw from the church. "If the mayor does not do his duty," continued the speaker, "the noblest service this historic church can do will be to expel the mayor of Brooklyn."

This is the first time, we believe, that the mayor of a city has been threatened with expulsion from a church for neglecting his official duties.

The Russian Government Formally Notified the respective European courts that she had decided to close the port of Batoum, which under the treaty of Berlin she was pledged to keep open. Batoum was formerly a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, but at the Berlin Congress it was ceded to Russia on condition that free entry should be maintained. Since then it has become a place of considerable importance to commerce, and the centre of a large import and export trade. The impudence with which Russia disregards treaty obligations when they become irksome to her was never more glaringly manifested than in this case.

Mr. Gladstone's Defeat at the Polls was Assured last week. The number of members elected to the new House of Commons was 573, leaving 97 still to be chosen. The Conservatives numbered 289, and the Liberals opposed to Home Rule 63, making a total of 352, or a majority of the House antagonistic to Mr. Gladstone on the Irish question. Mr. Gladstone's supporters, already elected, numbered 149, and the Parnellites 72. It is a curious fact that the disparity in the numbers of Gladstonians and anti-Gladstonians in the House is not found in the poll lists. The total number of votes cast up to the close of last week was 2,328,847. Of these 1,118,973 or nearly one half were cast for supporters of Mr. Gladstone. Tories and Liberal deserters combined exceeded Mr. Gladstone's followers by only 90,901 votes—a very slender majority. No less than forty of the Liberal deserters have lost their seats. Until the remaining seats are filled the exact complexion of the House cannot be predicted, but if the voters choose men of the same character as they did at the election last year, no party will have an absolute majority. It would, however, be possible by a few mutual concessions to form a coalition between the Conservatives and the Liberal deserters, but not all of the latter—John Bright, for example—could be carried into the Tory camp. Lord Hartington, Sir Henry James, and Mr. Goschen would not be out of place among the Tories, and on Monday last it was cabled that overtures for an alliance had been made to them by the Tory leader, the Marquis of Salisbury. If the alliance can be arranged it would seem possible to form an administration that would command a working majority. Mr. Gladstone's immediate resignation is expected.

The Government of Ireland Under the changed circumstances will be a work of serious responsibility. The hopes of the Irish people having been raised by their securing such a champion as Mr. Gladstone, their disappointment will be proportionately great. Whether they have sufficient self-control to wait patiently for a better day, or whether Parnell and his colleagues can restrain them has yet to be seen, but it is evident already that, whatever their action may be, their hatred of England has been intensified by the result of the election. It will not be an easy task to go on with coercion and the eviction of tenants in the present temper of the people. The policy of coercion and emigration which Lord Salisbury formulated a few weeks ago as the remedy for Irish discontent may produce sullen submission in Ireland, but it is little likely to promote loyalty or good-will. The Irish will continue to regard English rule as foreign domination, and will hate it accordingly. Nor will England herself be at ease. Having sympathized with Poland and other oppressed nations, she must eventually feel that she is inconsistent in refusing to Ireland the right to legislate for herself. She has lost the opportunity of securing Irish loyalty and gratitude by the means which were conspicuously successful in Canada and Australia; she has suffered in the respect of the world, and when she fully realizes those two facts she will probably retrace the ill-advised step she has taken. It will be a bad time then for the nobles, the gentry, and the clergy, whose counsel she has taken at this crisis.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received, since our last acknowledgment, to the amount of $14.50. They are as follows: From Boston, Mass., $2; Rockland, Wis., $5; Boreta, La., 50 cents; E. Des Moines, Ia., $5; Auburn, Ala., $1; New Brunswick, N. J., $1. Colored ministers who are concerned about the terms being near expiration for which they are getting the paper through this fund may be assured that their names will be replaced on the list in regular order as fast as possible. For every dollar sent us one name is added for a year. This is the utmost we can do. Reading the expressions of gratitude sent to us, and realizing how much benefit both ministers and congregations derive from the sermons and other matter published in this journal every week, we would gladly renew every name and add others to the list, but the low price at which the paper is sold, and the heavy cost of production renders the accumulation of a fund for gratuitous circulation impossible. We are grateful for the kind assistance which has enabled us to do so much as has been done for the benefit of our colored friends.

Some Interesting Lectures are Being Delivered by the brilliant young Persian student, Yaroo M. Neesan, an account of whom appears on page 438 of this issue. Mr. Neesan has a number of Persian costumes in which he appears to illustrate his lectures. He has also a collection of Persian books, coins, seals, etc., ancient and modern, which he exhibits. Much light on Bible history is gained from his descriptions of Oriental customs. Mr. Neesan has been enabled to continue his studies here by the help he has received from the proceeds of these lectures. From the pastors of several churches in which he has lectured testimonials have been received, speaking in the highest terms of their interesting and instructive character. Among them are Revs. J. G. Van Slyke, D.D., of Kingston, N. Y., Henry Bedinger, of Matteawan, N. Y., A. A. Zabriskie, of Flatbush, N. Y., and William N. Searles, of Kingston, N. Y. Mr. Neesan's address is 403 West Twentieth Street, New York City.

Successful Evangelistic Services are Being conducted by Rev. E. W. Oakes in Philadelphia. They were commenced in a quiet way, but the numbers of those attending grew until it was found necessary to obtain more commodious quarters. A tent has now been erected on the corner of Broad and Spring Garden streets and the work is going on with renewed energy. The work is wholly unsectarian. The services are simple evangelistic meetings adapted to non-churchgoers, and special attention is given to Gospel temperance. Mr. Oakes asks the prayers of our readers for a continuance of God's blessing on the effort.

The Services Conducted by Sam Jones and Sam Small at Indianapolis, which closed on June 29th, have been much blessed. The Rev. N. A. Hyde, D.D., of that city, writing to the Independent, says: "Great crowds of every class in the community thronged the services of the evangelists; they were deeply moved at the time, by the stirring words they heard; hundreds expressed a determination to live better lives; several hundred professed conversion. The interest was spreading and deepening up to the very last service. There has not yet been time to ascertain what the effect will be on the membership of the various churches. But there is no doubt that a great number of persons have been benefited by the meetings. At one evening service at least two thousand persons rose, to testify by that act that they personally had been profited. A large part of that number were Christian people, and they undoubtedly were sincere and honest in their expressions. They had received from these preachers of righteousness and a consecrated life a new spiritual impulse; they have a better understanding of what it means to be a Christian; many have been made ashamed of their frivolous, pleasure-seeking lives. Many of our leading lawyers were attracted to the meetings." Many sceptics attended the meetings and were impressed, and, it may be hoped, permanently changed.

An Organ-Grinder's Troubles have Come into court for settlement, and the judge is asked to decide whether the man who owns the organ or the man who hired it, ought to put it in repair. The organ-grinder in broken English said that the organ was good at first, but, after a time, whenever a certain note should have been produced the instrument was silent. Soon a second and a third note passed beyond the capacity of the organ. There were now embarrassing breaks and pauses in what the man called "the music," and he took the instrument back to the padrone for repairs. The barrel was taken out and examined, but was found in good order. Another trial was made, but the gaps in the performance increased until not more than one half the score was audible. Another application was made to the padrone, and the organ was opened and thoroughly examined. Inside were two little mice, who had become fat on the catgut strings, each of which had cost the organ one note. Perhaps the mystery of the organ may furnish a clue to the mystery of some gloomy lives. Instead of being full of praise they are silent and inharmonious, because little secret sins are eating away spiritual power (Ps. 51:9, 14).

The Disquietude that Riches Entail on their possessor was forcibly demonstrated in the case of a man who died at a farm-house near Troy, N. Y., on July 4th. He was very nervous, and the dread of being robbed made his life wretched, and unquestionably shortened it. He had accumulated considerable wealth, which he was afraid to deposit in any bank. He kept most of it in gold at his home. The balance was in Government bonds, which he was also afraid might be stolen. The bedroom he occupied, and in which he died, was a burglar-proof apartment. A door leading from it into the kitchen was made of heavy oak timber, three inches thick, with bars and bolts. The only window was a network of iron bars, with a two-inch oak shutter and a porihole through which he might defend himself from an attack by burglars. These bars were so arranged that no one but himself could remove them except by tearing down the casings. In his room were constantly kept a brace of pistols and a rifle, and he never ventured out of his house without being armed with a couple of seven-shooters. It was not uncommon to see a loaded revolver drop out of his pocket as he climbed a fence. He never had a quiet night's rest, and was so timid even in the daytime that any sudden noise caused him to start and tremble like a leaf. He grew prematurely old with anxiety, and died before his time. It is a pity that he did not make a practical study of the Bible. There he might have found for his case both an accurate diagnosis (Eccles. 5:12) and a remedy (Matt. 6:20).

A Polish Immigrant Received his First Lesson in American civilization from a New York policeman last week. The immigrant and his wife arrived on Wednesday, and were walking up Broadway on their way to some cheap boarding-house. The thermometer was registering ninety-five in the shade, and all pedestrians were suffering from the heat. The Pole, a strong, sturdy man, was sauntering along with his hands behind him, smoking his pipe and enjoying his first glimpse of the land of the free. Behind him his wife was painfully toiling under the burden of an immense bundle, apparently containing clothing, swung on her back, a tin can that could hold a gallon in her right hand, while a healthy child was carried on her left arm. A policeman caught sight of the couple, and immediately proceeded to rectify the injustice. Striding up to the man he wheeled him around by the shoulder, and taking the bundle and the big can from the woman, put them into his hands and motioned to him to proceed. The fellow grinned, and intimated by a gesture that the duty belonged to the wife. The ominous scowl on the officer's face and the minatory flourish of his club ended the argument. The immigrant walked on sulkily with his load, the woman smiled her thanks, and the crowd applauded the policeman. The Pole had learned his first lesson by being made bear his own burden. It may be hoped his education will not stop there. Christians can tell him of a still higher law existing, but very much neglected even in this land of Bibles, which he will do well to obey (Gal. 6:2).

A Narrow Escape from Shipwreck is Reported by the captain of the brigantine Evangeline, which arrived at Halifax, N. S., on July 2d from Montego Bay. He states that while beating to windward between Jamaica and Cuba she encountered a violent easterly gale, which lasted for three days, accompanied by fog and rain. The vessel lay to most of the time, and while in this position struck a reef on the south side of Cuba. The sea was running high, and commenced to break over the ship. The first sea which boarded her filled the cabin, and the captain's wife was nearly drowned. The second sea drove the vessel further up on the reef, but this was quickly followed by another and heavier sea, which carried her off the rocks into deep water, where she made her escape. That is very like the experience often met with in the voyage of life. Many a man, stranded in his way through the world, owes his deliverance to some dreaded trial that has lifted him into faith and peace instead of overwhelming him (Job 36:16).

A Man Pursued by a Bear in Michigan saved his life by a curious expedient a few days ago. The man, while out fishing, encountered the cub of a bear, which he imprudently made captive. He was making his way with it through the woods when he was pursued by the cub's mother. The fisherman dropped the cub very soon, but this act failed to placate or divert the attention of the parent bear, which pressed him hotly. At one moment she was so close that she was enabled to secure a mouthful of the fugitive's apparel. His strength was fast giving way, and the bear betrayed no sign of fatigue or of relenting, when the fisherman bethought him of an expedient. He had heard that the most ferocious of wild animals were subdued and terrified by fire, and drawing a newspaper from his pocket, he touched a match to it, and dashed it blazing into the bear's face. The effect was magical. The bear rolled over and over, screaming with terror, and on regaining her feet forsook the field with astonishing rapidity. The fisherman's knowledge of his enemy's weakness proved his best weapon. The same knowledge is supplied to every man who is assailed by the great enemy of souls (Eph. 6:11-17).

A Brave Little Girl Imperilled her Life to save her brothers and sisters at Belmont, Mass., on July 7th. Nellie is only ten years old, but since the death of her mother a few months ago she has been her father's housekeeper, and has taken care of her smaller brothers and sisters, of whom there are four. On Wednesday of last week the father was late in returning from his work, and the children were all asleep in the frame house where they lived, when a fire broke out. They slept on unconscious of their danger until the rear part of the house was nearly consumed, when Nellie was awakened by a falling timber. Without waiting to dress she caught up the baby, two years old, and ran through the thick smoke with it out upon the green sward. She then hastened back to carry forth another, and so continued until she had the whole four securely nestled together in front of the burning building. Just as the fire department arrived the room in which the children had been sleeping fell through with a crash, sending a shower of sparks far into the heavens. To their sister's love and self-forgetfulness the children undoubtedly owe their lives. As we picture the little heroine venturing into the burning building to rescue her brothers and sisters unmindful of her own danger, we are reminded of our Elder Brother, who came to this lost world to save our race (Mark 15:31).

HEALING AND PARDON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity."—ISAIAH 33: 24.

A Message to People in Trouble—Deliverance in Extremity—I. Present Forgiveness—Essential to Joy—To Love—Plainly Promised—Granted in Answer to Prayer—To the Humble—When God's Rule is Acknowledged—II. Removal of the Consequences of Sin—Special Chastisement for Special Sin—Traces Often Left—III. The Tone of Speech Changed—No Need to Complain—Past Ills Forgotten—The Perfect Health at Hand.

THIS whole chapter was a gracious message from God to a people who were in extremis. They were made to drink the foulest dregs of sorrow through the invasion of the Assyrians. The highways were waste, the wayfarer ceased; the earth mourned and languished; Lebanon was ashamed and hewn down; Sharon was like a wilderness; and Bashan and Carmel shook off their fruits. Then did God arise. When the worst had come to the worst, He laid bare His arm and brought deliverance for His people. Is not this

A GENERAL RULE WITH GOD?

Is it not a truth fraught with comfort to any of you whose day has darkened down into a sevenfold midnight? When nothing else is left you God remains and God appears. When all your own strength fails you your strength shall be to sit still while God arises and becomes your arm every morning, your salvation in the time of trouble. I would encourage all who are in spiritual distress to gather hope from this chapter, since it is addressed to Zion in her sore affliction. If it be really so, that the joys and blessings which are described in the passage before us come to a people who are driven to the last extremity, why should not such blessings come to you?

As we saw in the reading of this chapter, the prophet seems to take wing as he proceeds; he rises from note to note, as if like David he said "Selah;" lift up the strain. He makes each note more high, more sweet, more loud than those which preceded it; for he sings unto Him that doeth great things for His people.

THE CLIMAX

is in this sweet verse: "The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." One of the highest notes of praise which we can ever raise unto God is that which tells of pardoning love. Note the opening of the one hundred and third Psalm—"Bless the Lord, O my soul; who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." Our text is another form of that verse: "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." Healing and forgiveness are placed in happy conjunction, and both bestowed on the Lord's people when they looked not for them.

I. First, then, beloved, I introduce to you a topic upon which I am sure you have no question; but still it may do you good to be confirmed in the acknowledged truth. There is such a thing as the

of sin. "The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." There must be a present conscious enjoyable pardon of sin, else there would be no joy in the world for thoughtful minds. To the thoughtless and careless there might be a flash in the pan, a noisy mirth as the crackling of thorns under a pot; but to the penitent, to the serious, to the careful, where could there be a spark of joy if sin were unforgiven? When we once begin to feel what sin is, to discern its true nature, and to understand the just punishment which must follow upon it, we cannot rest under its condemnation. Sin is the blast which withers all the flowers of life. Sin is the gall of bitterness; a drop of it would turn an ocean of pleasure into wormwood. Sin would again blight Paradise, could it be restored; yea, it would turn heaven into hell could it enter there. Sin is a burden which an awakened conscience cannot bear; it crushes the spirit into the dust, and threatens further to bear it down, even to the lowest hell. Believers are spoken of as a blessed people who joy in God; they are bidden to rejoice evermore; the apostle saith, "Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, Rejoice." Such rejoicing would be impossible if sin were not pardoned; and therefore we conclude that that it may be pardoned now, and that we may know it.

Further, dear brethren, there must be forgiveness of sin, else the main motive and fountain of love would be dried up. Forgiveness begets gratitude, gratitude creates love, and love brings forth holiness. She that washed the Saviour's feet with tears and wiped them with the hairs of her head, would she have done it if she had not loved much because she felt that much had been forgiven her? The motive power of action to a believing man lies hard by the realization that God for Christ's sake hath forgiven his iniquities. When I see my Lord, His own self, bearing my sins in His own body on the tree, and blotting out my faults forever by His death, then my spirit glows with love, my eyes stream with tears, my heart dedicates itself wholly to Jesus, and my life begins to show the effect of my inward emotion. Sin forgiven

LEADS TO SIN FORSAKEN.

Is it not so? Doubt whether you are forgiven, and what can you do? There must be a consciousness of forgiveness, or our lives will be limp, weak, purposeless.

It must be so, that sin can be pardoned and that we can know it, else we should be always in bondage through fear of death. In what jeopardy should we stand every hour, since we might at once sink into hell! The prospect of death, how terrible would it be to us if sin still accused us unto God! Many of us now contemplate the approach of death with a calm, quiet patience of hope. As our years advance, we are not distressed with the thought that the time of our departure draws daily nearer. This world is not our rest, and we do not desire to live always. To be willing to be offered up, and joyfully to say, "The time of my departure is at hand," would be utterly impossible if believers did not know, and know of a certainty, that their sins are all forgiven.

Once more: there must be forgiveness, for else the whole system of grace would be a dead letter, and its glorious privileges would be mere shells without a kernel. Where would be salvation itself without pardon? How could we be saved from our sins if not forgiven? There is certainly no possibility of acceptance or justification while sin is unforgiven. I have shown you already that there is no motive to seek sanctification if we are hopelessly condemned for sin. What is even the gift of Christ Himself if He does not put away our sin? The whole of the blessings of the Gospel seem to me to have lost their charm unless, first of all, there is cleansing from all iniquity.

Let us now bend our thoughts to a consideration of this great blessing as it is treated of in this chapter. It is in the text: "The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." Nor is this a lone word; the like is often declared. I will not occupy your time by quoting the many passages of Scripture in which the pardon of sin is expressly promised. If we wish to obtain this free pardon it will be granted in answer to prayer. If you want pardon of Him who is waiting to be gracious, seek it. It is to be had without money and without price by the man who will stretch out his empty hand to take it. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." Go to your knees, and see if the Lord will not be gracious unto you.

God grants pardon when men are humbled. See the seventh verse: "Their valiant ones shall cry without; the ambassadors of peace shall weep bitterly." Crying and weeping are good

PREPARATIONS FOR PARDON.

In the dust of self-abasement is the place for hope. Jeremiah saith of the afflicted, "He putteth his mouth in the dust; if so be there may be hope." God never pardons the proud; He knows them "afar off," and has enough of them at a distance. With the humble and contrite He dwells, delighting to hear them honor His law by bemoaning their breaches of it. When thou sayest, "God be merciful to me a sinner," though thou darest not lift up thine eyes to Heaven, the eyes of Heaven look down on thee. Thou shalt go to thine house justified, if in God's house thou hast confessed thyself to be condemned.

God will also pardon us when He is acknowledged to be our Ruler and Lord. Look at the twenty-second verse: "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king." Wilt thou have God to reign over thee? If so, He will forgive thee; but if thou wilt continue to rebel, His wrath shall abide upon thee. How canst thou receive the kiss of love if thou dost not give the kiss of allegiance? "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry." Accept His rule, and He will accept thy prayer. We must love His law, or we cannot be discharged from its curse. Be willing to obey, and He is ready to forgive.

He will also forgive us when we put our trust in Him. Read the last clause of the twenty-second verse: "He will save us." Faith must look for salvation from the Lord alone, and then salvation will come to it. Oh, how I wish that some poor heart here present would cry this morning, "He will save me; I will take Him to be my King and my Lawgiver, and I will believe for myself that He will save me!" It is that touch of personal faith which brings peace to the soul. If thou wilt not trust God, neither shalt thou have peace; but if thou wilt come now just as thou art, and believe that He is able to forgive thee, and trust Him so to do, then thou shalt have this promise verified in thine experience—"The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity."

Is not this a large promise? One might desecrate upon it by the week together; and, indeed, one might rejoice in it to all eternity. I leave it to your quiet musings. If the prophet says, "Your heart shall meditate terror," viewing it as past and gone, how much more may you muse on mercy world without end, viewing it as forever your own?

II. Now, with extreme brevity, I want, in the second place, to say that, when sin is pardoned, are also removed. Sin had made these people sick, as Isaiah saith in his first chapter—"The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint." But when iniquity is forgiven, then "the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick." Special chastisement is usually removed when any peculiar sin is forgiven. God, under a former age, very manifestly visited sin with chastisement in this life; and when He forgave it, He removed the weight of His hand from the offender. Read the history of Israel, and see a host of instances.

There are still instances in which personal chastisement does follow personal sin in this life, especially among believers, and especially among believers in church fellowship. We read of the Corinthians, when they misbehaved themselves, "For this cause some are sickly among you, and many sleep." Within the chosen family there are chastisements unknown to the outside world. But when we go with our confession, and find pardon of the Lord, the temporal chastisement is usually removed, or else it is so changed in its purpose as to become quite another thing.

But, further, when I speak of the consequences of sin being taken away, this is very apparent in respect of certain sins. A man being a drunkard brings himself to poverty; he asks forgiveness for the drunkenness, he ceases from it; by honest industry his abject poverty is soon ended. Within a few weeks you see a difference in the very aspect of the man. Oftentimes when by some sin of impurity a sinner weakens his body and injures his health, his cure is much helped by his repenting and forsaking his uncleanness. It may not be so with some great transgressions, for which cannot be healed in this life; but true repentance will turn even these into a means of humiliation, and make them serve as safeguards against any return to folly. When sins are frankly confessed and forsaken, then the gracious message comes—"The Lord hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die."

Believers do not escape the sorrows of this life; but, then, no sorrow that comes to a Christian is sent as a penal infliction. It is not sent as a vindication of law, but as a tender parental discipline. Vast is the difference between the chastisement of love and the infliction of justice. To the forgiven man "all things work together for good;" yea, even those things which naturally follow upon the sin which is now forgiven. The curse is turned into a blessing; the poison acts as a medicine; that which kills the impenitent helps the cure of a believer. Yea, look at death itself. Do Christians die as a punishment for sin? God forbid. Death is no punishment to the believer; it is the gate of endless joy. It is not death to die, now that Jesus hath died, yea, rather, hath risen and gone into glory, on our behalf. We thank God that the bitterness of death is past. Death itself is mentioned in the list of our possessions: "All things are yours, whether life or death."

MAYBE, WE SHALL NOT DIE

at all; for our Lord may come on a sudden; and if He comes while we are alive and remain, we shall not sleep, though we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump.

Believe, once more, that all the eternal penal consequences are gone from the forgiven man. For him there can be no condemnation at the day of judgment; for him there can be no "Depart, ye cursed;" for him there is no blackness of darkness forever; for him no worm that dieth not, no fire that never can be quenched.

III. The speciality of what I want to say lies in my last point—that the Lord even of His people. "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick;" there is the point. Why shall they not say, "I am sick?" First, they have no need to say it when the Lord comes and dwells with them; for the Sun of Righteousness hath risen upon them with healing in His wings. When Jesus healed the sick of the palsy, He said to him, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee." Pardon and healing were one. Spiritually the pardoned one shall not need to say, "I am sick," because his soul-diseases then receive a healing medicine.

All spiritual disease receives its death-blow when sin is forgiven. Sin is crucified by the same cross which brings atonement. You may have to struggle with it, for the corruption of the flesh still remaineth, but "sin shall not have dominion over you; for you are not under the law, but under grace." "Whatsoever is born of God, sinneth not."

THE NEW NATURE SINS NOT.

John saith, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin," that is to say he cannot sin as others do; it is not the rule and drift of his life. God will avert the pestilence of sin from pardoned men; they shall be preserved from those moral pests which slay their thousands. You were once the victim of every fever of sin, but now your sin is forgiven. You pass unharmed through the temptations which surround you. God will preserve the true believer from the malaria of corruption which is in the world through lust; he shall be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." Next, they shall have no thought of saying, "I am sick." He that feels the joy of pardoned sin forgets all his pains and griefs. In my own person I know what it is to be vexed with sore pains and yet to feel such rest of heart that I have felt no desire to complain. When we rejoice in divine love we make small account of our bodily condition? If deaf, blind, or otherwise full of infirmities of the flesh, we make small reckoning of the whole when we know

THE JOY OF PARDONED SIN.

The inhabitant shall not say, "I am sick," because he says, "I am forgiven." The Lord gives to His people at times such peace and joy in believing that though they are poor, they do not say, "I am poor," but sing, "I am forgiven, I am forgiven."

A brother had grievously offended, and had been put out from church fellowship for his sin; and he so behaved that his pastor thought of him with pain, and was glad to avoid an interview with him, for it only produced a sad attempt at self-justification. At length the Lord brought him to a better mind. He sought his pastor, and said, with tears, "Will you shake hands with me?" The pastor replied, "Right gladly. I rejoice to feel that the past is all forgiven. How are you?" The repentant one made this reply, "I am quite well now that you restore me to your esteem." The poor man was extremely ill, but the joy of being once more in his old place in his friend's thoughts made him refuse to say, "I am sick." The news of victory has made lame men leap. How much more shall it be so when the Lord Jesus manifests His power to save, and the Holy Spirit assures the heart of blood-bought pardon; then, indeed, "the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick."

I find some read this sentence in the past tense: "The inhabitant shall not say, I have been sick." The joy of pardon makes us ignore the sorrow of the past.

THOU SHALT NOT REMEMBER

the reproach of thy widowhood any more." Since their enemies were all gone, the citizens of Jerusalem rejoiced in their safety, and said nothing about what they had suffered. Many of the sick quitted their couches, crowded the battlements, and looked out with pleasure toward the quarter where the foe had been. The Assyrian power was broken; the great king had fled; the men of Jerusalem forgot they had been half-starved, and that the plague had been among them. The inhabitant did not say, "I am sick." Their misery was swallowed up in victory. Glory be to God for such mercy as this. When God changes our estate from condemnation to acceptance, then is our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing, because "the Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

Yet once again, and I have done. Pardoned people shall not say they are sick, for by a little anticipation they shall declare the very contrary. In a little time—how little a time none of us can tell—we shall be where the inhabitant shall never be sick again. We are on our way to eternal health; we have the life within us which is to be perfect forever and ever. Why should we then say, "I am sick?" If a man could be quite sure that he would be in perfect health tomorrow, he would say little about the sickness of an hour. A blind man who will see tomorrow hardly numbers himself with the blind. Before another Sabbath comes round some of you may be with the angels; yea, before tomorrow's sun shall rise you may be where they "need no candle, neither light of the sun." Happy men to be so nearly well—so nearly home! Happy beings who shall so soon be "Far from a world of grief and sin, With God eternally shut in!"

Then shall you realize the fullest meaning of these words, "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity."

Who comes this way? Who comes this way? Welcome, brother, to pardon and healing through our Lord Jesus. Who is going the other way? Let such a sad wanderer consider his way, and retrace his steps, and seek his God, who in Christ Jesus can heal him. Oh ye who are now sick unto death, ask to be forgiven, and healing will come from the pardoning hand. God bless you! Amen.

CASTLES IN THE AIR.*

THE youthful mind, especially if of a vain or of a pensive and indolent turn, is much tempted to exercise the imagination in castle-building. Speaking of his younger years, Sir James Mackintosh tells us: "Reading of Echarde's Roman history led me into a ridiculous habit from which I shall never be totally free. I used to fancy myself Emperor of Constantinople. I distributed offices and provinces among my school-fellows. I loaded my favorites with dignity and power, and I often made the objects of my dislike feel the weight of my Imperial resentment. I carried on the series of political events in solitude for several hours. I resumed them and continued them from day to day for months. Ever since I have been more prone to building castles in the air than most others. My castle-building has always been of a singular kind. It was not the anticipation of a sanguine disposition expecting extraordinary success in its pursuits. My disposition is not sanguine, and my visions have generally regarded things as much unconnected with my ordinary pursuits and as little to be expected as the crown of Constantinople at the school of Fortrose. These fancies, indeed, have never amounted to conviction, or, in other words, they have never influenced my action, but I must confess they have often been as steady and of as regular occurrence as conviction itself, and that they have sometimes created a little faint expectation, or state of mind in which my wonder that they should be realized would not be so great as it naturally ought to be."

A person of a very different temperament, Charlotte Elizabeth, describes herself as falling in her younger years, into a similar habit, which, however, she speedily corrected. "I acquired that habit of dreamy excursiveness into imaginary scenes and among unreal personages, which is alike inimical to rational pursuits and opposed to spiritual-mindedness."

I have remarked in my own experience, for I confess to have been an architect of these airy fabrics, that all such vain thoughts sooner or later end in sadness; after the height comes the hollow, deep in proportion to the previous elevation; after the flow comes the ebb, to leave us stranded on a very sandy waste. The mind when it awakes, as it must, revenges itself for the dreams by which it has been deceived. For the time they enfeeble the will, they relax the resolution, they dissipate the energies, and they issue in chagrin, disappointment with the world, ennui, and not unfrequently bitterness of spirit. The indulgence in such weak imaginings is like the sultry heat of a summer day; it is close and disagreeable at the time, and it is ever liable to be broken in upon by thunders and lightnings. These gathering clouds, though they may seem light and floating, will sooner or later pour forth tempests. They that sow the wind shall reap the whirlwind. If the imagination is unlawfully engaged when building palaces among the gilded clouds, it is equally misemployed when under the guidance of a melancholy spirit; it is hewing out sepulchres in desolate and gloomy places, and peopling them with ghosts and demons to keep the timid from going out into the dark night when duty calls. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

This vain spirit is much fostered and increased by the excessive novel-reading of the age. I am not to enter upon a crusade against the perusal of works of fiction. I should be sorry to debar the child from "Robinson Crusoe" or the "Pilgrim's Progress," or to prevent any one from becoming acquainted with the character of Jeannie Deans or Uncle Tom. But I do protest against that constant and indiscriminate perusal of romances in which so many indulge. Those who consume this garbage will soon take its hue, as the worm takes the color of the herbage on which it feeds.

THE LATE KING OF BAVARIA.

MENTION has been made in our news columns of the deposition and subsequent suicide of the King of Bavaria, whose portrait appears here. The history of this eccentric sovereign is one of the most striking illustrations in our day of the absurdity of hereditary monarchy.

He was born August 25th, 1845, and succeeded to the Bavarian throne at the age of nineteen, on the sudden death of his father, Maximilian II., March 10th, 1864. His boyhood was passed in virtual seclusion with his ecclesiastical instructors. They allowed him no boyish companions and no indulgence in boyish sports and games. To these he had recourse after he ascended the throne, and he has been known to play at marbles for hours with his courtiers in one of his palaces just outside of Munich.

His first political step of any importance proved to be a blunder. When, in 1866, war was declared between Prussia and Austria, King Ludwig threw in his lot with the latter. After the defeat of the Austrians at Sadowa, Prince Bismarck treated him with far more leniency than was accorded to the other States which had fought against Prussia. In return for this, when, in 1870, France declared war against Prussia, King Ludwig at once placed his army at the disposal of King William. Utterly devoid of military tastes, he took no active part in the campaign, but he was foremost among the Teutonic sovereigns in offering the German Imperial Crown to the King of Prussia at Versailles.

After the war the first incipient signs of his malady began to be manifest. As years went on, stories of his vagaries were circulated throughout Europe. He would have magnificent dramatic performances produced at great cost, and played before him as he sat alone in a darkened auditorium. He would rise at midnight and with a troop of light cavalry to attend him drive through the streets of his capital and away on to the mountains like a whirlwind. During a visit which he made incognito to Paris, after the conclusion of the war of 1870-71, his mania received a new direction. He visited Versailles, and thenceforward determined to outdo Louis XIV. in architectural extravagance. Various gorgeous and almost inaccessible Alpine palaces were put in hand and fabulous sums spent upon their decoration, until the Royal Exchequer became bankrupt.

Until a year ago King Ludwig's vagaries were politely referred to as eccentricities, but it then became impossible to ignore the fact that the man was insane. The King's uncle, as the nearest of kin, accordingly interfered. Physicians disguised as common soldiers visited the King and certified to his mental incapacity. He was deposed, and Prince Luitpold was made Regent. The King was placed under the care of Dr. Gudden, a specialist in mental disease, but on June 13th last he succeeded in killing the physician and committing suicide.

THE RULE OF JONATHAN EVANS.

"WHERE is Lucy? Is she out again?" The inquiries were addressed to his wife by Jonathan Evans, a middle-aged, industrious mechanic, who had just returned to his home from an evening service at the little church of which he was a leading member. "Yes, father; she is only gone for a walk; she will be home presently." The conciliatory tone in which his wife answered indicated that she was the peacemaker in the home, and that Jonathan was not prone to the fault of Eli, who saw his children do evil and "restrained them not." But Mrs. Evans could not make peace this time. She saw with fear that one of those explosions of parental wrath was impending which led her to doubt whether "the second blessing" which Jonathan professed to have received had been effectual.

"You are always making excuses for Lucy," he said. "Eh! I'll see if I am not to be obeyed in my own house. I've told her before that she shall not be out after sundown unless she goes to a prayer-meeting."

"O Jonathan, don't be hard on the girl. She is in the factory all day. She must have a little change, and a walk on a summer night does no harm."

"You don't now what harm it does. 'A child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame,' the Bible says, and I reckon we might say herself as well as himself."

"Lucy ain't a child now, Jonathan; she's eighteen next Thanksgiving. I'm scared of treating her hard. She's got your spirit, father; you can lead her with love anywhere, but you can't drive her."

"I don't want to drive her, but she's got to obey. Now, you go to bed and I'll stay up and let her in, and we'll have this thing settled once for all."

The mother obeyed tearfully, and when she reached her chamber prayed earnestly that God would soften her husband's heart and show him how to rule by love. The sounds that reached her ear told her that a stormy scene was taking place down stairs; but she was helpless to interfere, and she dare not speak to her husband when, with a stern face, he retired to rest an hour later.

There were no traces of weeping on Lucy's handsome face when she came down to breakfast next morning, but a hard, cold look which the mother dreaded beyond all other signs. She kissed the girl affectionately, and in a hurried whisper, for Jonathan's step was already heard on the stairs, she said, "Don't cross your father, Lucy; he means well; he only wants your good."

"He don't, mother," said Lucy, her dark eyes flashing. "He wants to break my heart. You don't know the cruel things he said. I won't bear it!"

No more could be said then, and the meal was eaten in silence. Lucy dressed to go to the factory, and her father rose to go to his work. The girl gave her mother a hug and a kiss, but she took no leave of her father, and would have passed out silently had he not called her back.

"You remember what I said last night," he said. "I mean it, and I'll do it, too, if you give me cause."

Lucy gave him a look inflexible as his own, and said, "I am not likely to forget," and so saying, she went her way.

It was late that evening when Jonathan returned from his work, but Lucy had not come home, and her mother was in tears. Something had happened, she was sure, for Lucy had never been so late before. The factory must have been closed more than two hours. She would have gone to search for her daughter, but her husband would not allow it. Lucy was sulky, he said, and meant to defy him, but she would "have to come down from her high horse."

He went to a meeting of the church, and while he was away a hastily-written note was placed in the mother's hands. It contained only a few words, but they were enough to tell the old, sad story. Lucy had left home forever. Ease and luxury with dishonor had been offered her before, and indignantly rejected, but when, smarting under her father's threats and restive under his restraint, the temptation was renewed, Lucy had listened and yielded.

Jonathan found the mother weeping with this letter before her when he returned to his home. He had no tears to shed. His face took a sterner look as he turned to where the family Bible lay on its special stand. Opening to the fly-leaf containing the family register, he deliberately blotted out Lucy's name from the record, and bade his wife never mention her to him again. "She is dead to us for the future," he said; "she has chosen her portion; let her reap her reward." His wife obeyed him uncomplainingly, as she always did, but she could not forget her child, and prayed for her continually. Jonathan did not forget either, but having done his duty as he saw it, there was no pity for the erring one in his heart.

One moonlight night five years afterward Mrs. Evans was sitting at home alone, with her Bible open before her, but with her thoughts far away with the absent one. She heard a timid tap on the window, and, looking up, saw a white, scared face. Hurrying to the door she held out her arms, and Lucy sank weeping on her bosom. Beautiful still, and elegantly clothed, the prodigal had tremblingly come home for refuge. Deserted and despairing, it was her last hope. For a few brief minutes the mother and daughter rejoiced together in the reunion, but in both hearts there was a dread soon to be realized. Lucy sank to the floor and buried her face in her mother's lap as she heard her father's step approaching. She heard the door open, heard as in a dream her mother's pleading tones, and then she was taken roughly by the shoulders and thrust out into the night. Swiftly, with the strength of despair, she flew before the bitter words of reproach her relentless father hurled at her, making her way instinctively to the river.

Oh, had there been some one to tell her of the love of God for the lost, of Him who said, "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more"—if only some pitying hand had at that supreme crisis pointed her to the cross, she might have been saved. There was none. She felt herself an outcast, and with mad haste plunged into the pitiless stream.

There was much sympathy manifested for Jonathan Evans when the body was found and recognized. It was an inscrutable dispensation, his friends said, that so good a man should be so disgraced by his sinful daughter, and in the prayer-meetings petitions were offered for "the brother on whom God had been pleased to lay His afflicting hand." The Sunday-school children were warned by Lucy's fate, and the sad event was "improved" in a special sermon. Only one poor heart-broken woman, rapidly sinking into the grave, bowed down by sorrow, took a different view of the calamity, and she was silent. It might be that the others were right; they were better instructed than she; but she loved the transgressor, and mourned for her who had found no place for repentance, though she had sought it carefully and with tears.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

Trust.

THE completeness with which Fritz Edelstein had disappeared seemed like death to his betrothed. No word, no sign, no message came from him, and the days passed on, each one like another stone upon his grave, making his return to his life and duty and his waiting love more improbable. The Moravians, who knew something of the intensity with which Juliet loved their friend, saw, while they sympathized with her, that she was gaining new strength from this heavy trial. Only a soul born again could live as she was living. The torturing suspense did not incapacitate her for duty; nor was she buoying herself up with hope of her lover's return. She did hope, as they all did; but that was not the source of her strength and cheerfulness. It was clearly the acquiescence in God's will that the true Christian feels, which was Juliet's support. All her future was in the hands of a loving Father, and as she believed for herself so she believed for him who was dearer to her than herself.

The third week had nearly reached its close when a special messenger arrived from Bethabara with letters from Pastor Smidt, who was not well enough to come himself. The news of Edelstein's disappearance had reached the Northern station, and all that the deepest sympathy could suggest was written to the afflicted missionaries at Eschol. Letters from both Smidt and Sister Louisa were enclosed for Juliet. She retired into her own little room to read them alone.

Pastor Wilhelm was greatly depressed. Submissive as the good Moravian ever was to the will of God, he bitterly sorrowed for his dear companion.

"I miss Fritz at every point," the Pastor said to his wife. "He was more than a right hand. Fritz was ever ready to help, always prompt with resources—never at fault, never desponding."

"And we must not despond now," said Sister Anna, in her quiet, practical way. "Does not Brother Smidt in his letter write about cherishing hope?"

"I have none, dearest wife, I have none; I feel no doubt of Fritz's death. You do not know these Red-hands. They are a tribe in which Christianity has not made a single convert. Some sixty years ago they utterly destroyed an Esquimaux settlement, plundering, burning, slaying; only a few poor creatures escaped. I used to think, in my youth, that it would be a grand thing for a missionary to go among them, to carry the Gospel of peace even to these men of blood. But now all my energies seem gone. The loss of our Fritz has made me ten years older; I can scarcely struggle through necessary work."

"When the Harmony comes again," said Anna, very sadly, "we must apply for other help, if dear Fritz do not return."

The Pastor pressed his hand over his eyes; he could scarcely suppress a groan. "Yes, another missionary couple must come here," he said, "to take the place of our lost Fritz and his Juliet." Anna touched her husband suddenly on the arm, for Juliet, leaving her room, now stood in the doorway.

"Oh! my dear child, forgive!" cried the Pastor, aware that she must have heard his last words.

"There is nothing to forgive," said Juliet, gently, coming forward and seating herself at the Pastor's feet. She spoke with effort, but in a voice distinct though low.

"Other Moravians will be needed," she continued, "if—if all that we fear be true. But, my father and mother, why should not your Juliet stay, too? May I not, at my own expense, have an additional little room built here? I wish never to leave Eschol; I wish never to leave the place where he labored; I want to follow in his steps. Where I first met him, first worked with him—where he first helped to guide my wandering feet to Christ, there be my home, there be my grave! I, too, would be a missionary, and one enlisted for life!"

"Oh, brave and true—" began Pastor Wilhelm, but he could not finish his sentence, for Juliet suddenly sprang to her feet almost with a scream.

"Hark! hark! a shout!" she cried, with quivering lips.

"I hear nothing," said the Pastor and his wife in a breath.

"I hear—'tis his voice! Oh, Heaven be praised!" exclaimed Juliet, and forth from the room and out of the house she rushed, heedless of all but the one hope which had dazzled her like a sudden flash of lightning.

That hope was no transient flash. The ear of love had not been deceived. Again comes the shout—the shout of triumph—and all now can hear it. See the sledge rapidly driven over the snow, with one form in it standing upright! Fritz is impelling Springer to utmost speed; a few minutes more, and his betrothed is sobbing with delight in his arms.

The whole station was in an uproar of joy. Men shouted, women clapped their hands, and the children made more noise than all. There was such laughing, and crying, and shaking of hands as never had been known in Eshcol before. It was some time before Fritz, quiet in the missionary home, could give to his nearest and dearest friends an account of his past adventures.

Lightly he passed over his dangers, though they had been great. The expedition, bravely undertaken, had proved successful. Northwind had not only been restrained from his resolve to make a raid in Eshcol, but had, after a time, seemed impressed by the preaching of Fritz. Its effect had been greatly increased by the relief which the Moravian, by his medical skill, had been enabled to give to the chief's brother, suffering under a painful disease which the medicine-man of the tribe had attempted in vain to cure.

Edelstein had found it impossible to quit his patient at once, and most undesirable not to follow up the spiritual work commenced. He had accompanied the tribe for some distance, thankful to see them going further from Eshcol. Fritz had not left the Indians till Northwind's brother had asked for baptism at his hands. The first Christian Red-hand was the fruit of the venture of faith, when a solitary missionary had gone forth alone to meet savages thirsting for blood, and, like the Prophet arresting the wild current of Jordan, had stayed their fierce course in the name of the Lord.

It was strange to see how quietly Fritz resumed his duties as if he had done nothing out of the ordinary course. There he was, going from one igloo to another on his pastoral visits, conducting the services in the little church, and doing the work temporarily suspended, in the calm, placid way that he was wont to do it. The man was a true hero, but he did not appear to have the slightest consciousness of the fact. Had he been questioned about his expedition he would probably have answered that he had done his duty in the circumstances, and no more. His life was consecrated, and if the Lord called him to lay it down he was ready. But God had not required the sacrifice. As Abraham received Isaac back as from the dead, so his life had been given back to him and those who loved him. To both Fritz and Juliet the trial had been a blessing, and, chastened and invigorated by it, they were drawn nearer to God as well as to each other.

"And so if you had been bereaved," said Fritz one day, as he and Juliet were returning from a visit to Samson's hut, "you would not have deserted Eschol? Sister Anna told me last night that you were going to build an extension to the Mission House for a domicile."

"I would have remained, dear Fritz. I could not have gone home. I could go anywhere with you, but, without you, Eschol would have been the only place where life would have been possible for me. Besides, at Eschol I might have done something for the people; they would have missed you so much."

"The old life has no attractions for you now, Juliet? Do you never long for the old pleasures? They were very sweet once, I suppose?"

"Very sweet, indeed. I was thoroughly absorbed in them. But their charm is completely gone now. I could no more go back to them than I could go back still farther and enjoy playing with the doll I loved so when I was five years old. I am completely disillusioned. No, I have not the slightest longing for the old delights; they would seem frivolous now."

"And you are not less happy?"

"No; I never was so happy as now. There were times when I thought I could never be so happy as I was then, but my capacity for enjoyment is enlarged. The joy of service and usefulness, small as my experience of it is compared with yours, is greater and more lasting than the joys of the most brilliant social triumph I ever achieved. I am truly happy at Eschol, dear Fritz, and I hope I may be made more useful."

Fritz looked at the beautiful lady by his side, whose grace of form and movement not even the uncouth dress necessary in that climate could conceal, and was thankful that God had so changed a heart that Satan must have thought would be an easy prey. Little as he knew of the gay world in which Juliet had moved he could understand that the triumphs to which she had alluded were likely to have been very brilliant. Flashes of wit, quick, keen intelligence, unflinching good-humor and an inexhaustible store of kindness combined with her rare beauty to make Juliet one who would reign as a queen in any social circle. Yet he could not doubt the sincerity of her words nor question the purity and depth of her love for himself. Truly God had been very good to him, and with an humble, grateful heart he blessed Him for this crowning gift so strangely brought into his life.

The winter was now breaking. Already the cold was less intense and the days were lengthening perceptibly. Both Pastor Wilhelm and Sister Anna welcomed the brighter weather, though Fritz and Juliet insisted on their resting, and gladly relieved them of duties that would have entailed exposure. The old couple loved them as their own children, and no children could be more dutiful or thoughtful of their comfort. The aged pastor rejoiced with his young colleague, and seemed to grow more youthful in contact with Fritz's exuberant vitality. So the last weeks of winter glided swiftly by, and in no country on earth was there a home so full of happiness and love as that little Mission House on the inhospitable shores of Labrador.

Again came the welcome spring; all was sunshine and joy. Fritz and his betrothed looked forward with longing to the return of the Harmony. It would bring them, as they both hoped and prayed, the favorable answer from Fritz's father and the other Moravian Brethren.

Again it was on a day of July, a bright, balmy, joyous day, that the missionary party, when seated at breakfast, were startled by Samson's stentorian cry, "The big ship! the big ship is in sight!"

All started up at the call. The Pastor and Fritz rushed eagerly out of the house. They would not have outstripped Juliet, had she not stayed to aid the feeble steps of Sister Anna.

"You are too anxious, darling," said Anna, who, with her arm thrown fondly around Juliet, could feel how fast the maiden's heart was beating.

"No, I am not anxious," replied Juliet, softly; "I have put all into the hands of our Heavenly Father. He knows—" She was interrupted by Fritz's loud exclamation of delight, "The white flag, the white flag is waving!" He had recognized it before it was visible to any eye but his own.

Anna, with thoughtful kindness, left Juliet and joined her own husband, leaving the happy ones to wander a little away from the crowd on the beach. At such a blissful moment the betrothed pair would need to be a little alone together.

"Oh, Juliet! mine own, are we not happy?" exclaimed Fritz.

"I feel as if the Lord's blessing were upon us," said Juliet; "He will be at our wedding-feast, and turn the water into wine."

"He hath done so already," said Fritz. "Truly may I say, My cup runneth over!" Then, as a thought struck him, he cried, "I must send instant notice to Brother Smidt; you know that he and his wife promised to be present at our wedding."

"They will return in the Harmony," said Juliet; "you know that it must visit Bethabara, and touch at Eschol when it comes back."

"Such a delay!" exclaimed the impatient bridegroom; "I had hoped to have had our marriage to-morrow."

"Oh, no; that would never do!" cried Juliet. "Not do! What can you mean?" exclaimed Fritz.

"Why, how could I cut up five hundred yards of red flannel? How could our good folk get their new bridal garments ready?" replied Juliet, laughing. "Do you think that I could bid them to my feast in their dirty seal and bear skins?"

Fritz gleefully joined in her laugh. "So you are going to array all our guests in scarlet! What a gaudy display we shall have; our Esquimaux will look like a bed of poppies."

"No color so warm nor so picturesque with a background of snow," said Juliet. "I hope that dear old Samson's axe has not been forgotten nor the present for my little Puffin. I have hardly been able to keep my secret from the child."

"The white flag is plain enough now!" cried Fritz, turning to look at the ship.

"Oh, that I could lend the Harmony wings!" cried Juliet, with a child's gleeful impatience. "But still we have something to do while we wait. Fritz, will you and one or two of the men remove the poor little harmonium from the church to the house?"

"Will you teach me to say 'No' on such a day as this?" exclaimed Fritz. "The harmonium is small and feeble indeed, but we really need it in church for the hymns."

"An organ will be better," said Juliet, with a smile.

"An organ! You do not mean to say that there is one in the ship?" exclaimed Fritz, who was passionately fond of music.

"I want you, dear Fritz, as you carve so well, to cut a little inscription on the organ which I have ordered. I wish it to contain a dear name, a date, and a verse."

Fritz noticed that his betrothed's joyous manner had changed to one of deep feeling; Juliet's eyes filled with tears as she went on.

"I have for long wished to raise some monument to her—my first friend, who died for me two years ago. I thought sometimes of a marble slab in our chapel; then of a tall cross on yon mount, to be the first thing which sailors should see when approaching Eschol. But one night it came into my mind that the best memorial of her, whose whole life was like a hymn of praise, would be an instrument for sacred music. When we sing to the praise and glory of God, we will remember Maria, whose voice now joins in the anthems of heaven."

"It is well thought of," said Fritz, gently pressing the hand of Juliet.

"I owe so much to Maria," continued his betrothed. "Words from her which I thought little of when they were uttered often occur to my memory now. I remember her saying—on that last day, 'You are like a harp whose deeper chords have never yet been sounded; there has been a light running over the upper strings, but the instrument has not been struck by a master's hand.' Maria spoke too well of me, Fritz. I was more like a mere frame of a harp, with not a single string—the shell of an organ, through which no wind had ever sounded."

"The Lord has strung the harp, His Spirit has breathed through the organ," said Fritz, looking on his betrothed with fond admiration.

"And you will try to bring out some music," murmured Juliet, "music like Maria's, which has left its echo on earth."

"Will yours be joyful music, my Juliet? Will there never be a minor chord of regret for all which you have given up so bravely?"

The reply was conveyed in Juliet's bright eyes raised to his own, before her lips softly replied, "What can you and I ever regret of the pleasures of the world, the dainties of Egypt, as we go hand in hand on our pilgrim way to the happy land, fed with manna, the bread of angels?"

THE END,

THE RESURRECTION OF LAZARUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 25, John 11: 17-44. Golden Text, ver. 25.

The Power Superior to Corruption—Where Martha's Faith Stopped—Christ's Assurance Misunderstood—A Life Death Cannot Touch—The Receptive Sister—Superfluous Comforters—Why Jesus Wept—The Stone a Sign of Unbelief—The Dead Comes Forth.

WHEN Jesus came to Bethany, He found that Lazarus had lain in the grave "four days already." To human sense, the last vestige of hope was gone. True, Jesus had before this raised the dead, but in both cases He had recalled the spirit to a body which was still perfect. Here, however, was a body which had for four days been undergoing a process of corruption. But He who is above sickness and above death is

"The Resurrection and the Life," in His creative power, is above decay, and has, vested in Himself, the power to reverse its laws.

Yet Mary and Martha acted still as though the eternal Word of God had never said, "This sickness is not unto death." According to custom, the Jews came from Jerusalem to mourn with them, and their faith never rose to the point of saying, "There is nothing to mourn about for Jesus will raise our brother from the dead, He has said, 'This sickness is not unto death,'" for the promise, as they understood it, was not fulfilled, Lazarus's sickness was unto death. Martha, hearing that He was coming, went out to meet Jesus, but, instead of meeting Him with joyous gratitude for His Word regarding Lazarus, she met Him with reproach, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Are there none of us who meet Jesus with reproaches when we do not see the fulfilment of His promises, and who miss the glorious, never-to-be-repeated opportunity to testify that we know that heaven and earth may pass away but that not one jot or one tittle shall pass away from His Word, till all be fulfilled (Matt. 5: 18). Appearances may be all against it, but if we leave Him to work out His purpose, He will be true to Himself.

Martha had, nevertheless, some kind of expectation from Jesus, "I know," she said, "that even now, whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee. Jesus saith unto her,

THY BROTHER SHALL RISE AGAIN."

The words met every need of her heart, explained the apparently unfulfilled promise of Jesus, but Martha could not see in them an actual, present deliverance; her unbelief gave them a future meaning, and she said, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Oh, how unbelief detracts from the force of the Word of God! "This sickness is not unto death" could never be fulfilled by Lazarus rising again at the last day! Martha's unbelief represented Jesus as overcome and conquered by death, and His power as something yet to come! Oh how strong is the habit of unbelief among us! "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin," says the Word of God (Rom. 6: 11). "I pray, Lord, make me dead to sin, but I cannot say I am so," is the utterance of unbelief. "I am the Lord that healeth thee," says God. "I hope the Lord will heal me, but I cannot feel any change," says unbelief. Mary and Martha judged Jesus by what they saw, and when His Word was not fulfilled in the way they had expected it to be, and Lazarus was not healed, but was actually dead, they looked upon His Word as contradicted by fact, and acted accordingly.

"Jesus said unto her, I am the Resurrection and the Life." Yes, Jesus has life in Himself. "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom He will" (John 5: 21, 26). "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world." Thank God, whosoever believeth hath everlasting life, and is "born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever" (1 Peter 1: 23). Thank God, the life of Christ within us is

INDEPENDENT OF THE ACCIDENT OF DEATH.

Death touches and puts out that life which we have in common with the beasts which perish, but it cannot touch that life which we have in common with the Son of God, Jesus Christ. Just as in the seed which is sown in the earth and dies there exists the living germ of the plant which shall be a germ that lives through the death and decay of the seed, so the germ of Christ-life, eternal life, which we have through believing in Jesus, shall never die with the death of the body, but develop into a glorified soul and body in the resurrection. Martha had most imperfect conceptions of the resurrection, but she believed in the Person of Jesus, "I believe that Thou art the Christ." Oh, it is blessed, when we are conscious how poor are our conceptions of the truth of God, yet to turn back to the Person of our Lord, and to say, "I believe, Thou art the Christ, God's anointed."

Then Martha "went her way and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee." To Mary the disappointment to her faith had been so great that she could not go out as Martha had done to meet Jesus. More, Mary was a listener, she did not initiate, she was not all action like her sister, so now she was still, and from the Master. Mary was receptive, and thus, though her faith was sorely tried, she did not go out to reproach Jesus as Martha had done. But no sooner did she know that Jesus called for her, then she arose quickly and came unto Him. If she was deceived, if her hopes were all blasted, still no one but Himself could explain it to her, so Mary went quickly to meet Him. The company of Jews who were there to comfort her followed. There are around us many whose minds are not made up as to what they think of Jesus. What effect have our lives upon them? Are they attempting to comfort us about our cares, or do they find that we so really believe that God cares for us, that we have ceased to be anxious, because we have cast all our care upon Him? Are they sympathizing with us about our sicknesses, or do they find that between Jesus and us there is such an understanding that when sickness does come upon us, we look upon it as but

AN OPPORTUNITY TO TRUST

Him farther on? When temptation assails us, do they comfort us that so many others are tempted in the same way, or do they see the Lord's deliverance so quickly in us, that they cannot but praise Him?

Had Martha and Mary taken the divine side in this extraordinary trial of their faith, they would have remained still, and would have been able to comfort the Jews instead of being comforted by them. They would have said, "He who has power over life and death has pledged His word that this sickness is not unto death; we do not know how that is to come about, but we know that death cannot hold our brother." But Mary, as well as Martha, was conquered by the seeming failure of the Word of Jesus, and she uttered the same reproach, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." This unbelief of Mary's, of the one disciple who had taken in more of His teaching than any other, troubled Jesus so much that He groaned in spirit and said, "Where have ye laid him?" and when "They said unto Him, Lord, come and see,

JESUS WEPT."

Surely it was man's unbelief that caused the groans and the tears of Jesus. He knew He was going to raise Lazarus, so that it would have been idle sentimentality to weep because he was dead. The Jews misunderstood Him, and suggested that He might have rescued Lazarus from death.

There was one thing between the dead Lazarus and Him who named Himself the Resurrection and the Life, and they must take it away, "Take ye away the stone." That stone was a monument of their unbelief, it was a sign that they thought the grave of Lazarus was to endure undisturbed, and that they expected no resurrection. Martha raised the objection, "Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days;" she was still occupied with things on human lines. Jesus saith unto her, "Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe thou shouldest see the glory of God?" What had He said? "This sickness is not unto death," "Thy brother shall rise again," and "If thou wilt believe, thou shalt see the glory of God." The test of faith to which the sisters were put could not, perhaps, have been greater, and they failed under it. But, thank God, Jesus did not fail. "If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful; He cannot deny himself" (11 Tim. 2: 13). All the time we are looking at the apparent failure of God's promises, we are unbelieving; but if we will believe, we shall see the glory of God. The believing eye is the eye which sees God and is blind to all else.

"Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up His eyes, and said, Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me. And I knew that Thou hearest Me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that Thou hast sent Me. And when He had thus spoken, He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And

HE THAT WAS DEAD CAME FORTH, bound hand and foot with graveclothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin." All these things were requisites for death; there was no sign of looking for resurrection. "Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go." The word of Jesus had conquered, the sickness of Lazarus was not unto death; when the word of Jesus was spoken, death was obliged to relinquish his prey. But what about the sisters? Would they most rejoice that Lazarus was raised, or would they be most ashamed for their unbelief? Probably not one of us would have acted differently, but, oh, how glorious it would have been if Mary and Martha had stood firmly upon the word of Jesus in spite of everything that took place. How they might have glorified Him in telling the Jews when their brother was buried that he was going to be raised again. Oh, how few of us can stand on God's Word against the apparent evidence of our senses; how few of us believe and speak, and act for the glory of God, in such a way that the Son of God may be glorified thereby.

Volume VIII. of the Christian Herald, containing the Numbers for 1885, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3, including postage. A few volumes of 1883 and 1884 are also for sale. We have none prior to 1883.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

HUGH STOWELL BROWN.

A Restless, Active Boyhood—Becomes an Engineer—Greek Characters in the Locomotive Cab—Becomes a City Missionary—Services in the Dives—Pastor of a Church—The Sunday Lecture.

PROMINENT among the many names already recorded on this year's obituary list are those of the three eminent men, whose portraits appear on the first page. Each in his own department won world-wide renown, and has left the world poorer by his death.

The first in order is Hugh Stowell Brown, the famous preacher, lecturer, and earnest Christian worker, who died on February 24th, last. He was born August 10th, 1823, and was therefore less than sixty-three years old when he died. He was a native of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, and came of a family of noted preachers. His father was a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and one of his maternal uncles was the eminent Canon Stowell of the same Church.

Under his father's care he acquired the rudiments of his education, and subsequently went to the Douglas Grammar School. He decided that he would be a land-surveyor and for a time studied for that profession. After a brief experience he left his studies and announced his determination to be

AN ENGINEER.

That occupation he followed until he was twenty-one years old, and during that period the future preacher might have been seen daily driving his locomotive between Wolverton and Crewe, on the London and North Western Railroad. (See illustration No. 1.)

It was while he was so engaged that the young man was brought under the power of the Gospel and became a converted man. His was not the nature to enter half-heartedly into the service of Christ. He resolved to consecrate himself and all his powers to the cause of his Master. He commenced the study of Greek, getting up his first lesson with a piece of chalk on the coal-box of his engine, one evening, in an interval of his work. At the termination of his engagement with the railroad company he entered King William's College, in the Isle of Man, to prepare for his life-work. It was his intention to become a clergyman of the Established Church of England with which his family was so conspicuously identified, but he was attracted to the Baptist Communion, and though he had no friends among the Baptists and no prospects of advancement there, he joined a Baptist church and commenced work in that denomination.

The beginning was humble. He served as in Liverpool. Never was man better fitted for the duty. His burly figure, cheery, good-humored face, and hearty manner made him a favorite everywhere. His ready wit disarmed opposition, and more than once he was forced to accept an invitation to some sailors' haunt where, under the charm of his speeches, liquor was laid aside, and the lewd songs that were the regular entertainment were omitted for that night. Sound common-sense talks, brightened by sparkling humor, in his genial style, kept the audience in a roar of laughter for a time, and then having won their attention he passed by some touching, pathetic story to a more serious mood, carrying his hearers with him until the sailors who had come together for a debauch were on their knees, while the man who had been entertaining them prayed for their salvation. He preached anywhere and everywhere as he had opportunity, and the common people heard him gladly. Such a man could not be hid. His services were eagerly sought, and he was at length induced to become the

PASTOR OF A BAPTIST CHURCH.

His sole stipulation was that he was not to be expected to go from the house of one wealthy member to another drinking tea and chatting with the ladies, but might continue his work among the lost and those who were out of the way. Many a staid, ultra-respectable clergyman visiting Liverpool has been shocked at seeing the popular pastor of the Myrtle Street church dressed in a common suit of dark blue, such as sailors wear, a soft felt hat on his head, entering some disreputable dive to spend his evening. Hundreds of men, however, were rescued from those haunts, under his labors, who became a blessing to the ships to which they belonged, they were saved themselves and laboring for the salvation of others.

Though a vigorous total abstainer his presence was always earnestly sought at public dinners and banquets, and occasionally he was induced to attend. On one occasion he was requested to respond to the toast of "The ministers of other denominations," after a sleek, aristocratic curate had replied for the bishops and clergy of the Established Church. Mr. Brown's half-humorous, half-apologetic reproof of the curate's somewhat supercilious reference to himself as belonging, as a Baptist, to an inferior order of the clergy, was the cause of much comment there and in the press (see illustration No. 2), and brought him into a discussion from which he came out with greatly increased popularity.

The celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his settlement over the Myrtle Street church was made a matter of public concern. By that time the value of his services was known throughout Liverpool, and Christian men of all denominations and public-spirited men who were not Christians, united in doing honor to the man whose work had been a blessing to the town. It was a perfect ovation (see illustration No. 3).

The most remarkable success, however, with which the name of Hugh Stowell Brown was connected was the innovation of the

SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURE.

He was deeply concerned at the failure of his efforts and those of other ministers to draw non-churchgoers to a place of worship on Sunday. He tried the experiment then unprecedented of hiring a hall and delivering a lecture with some homely title. "Five Shillings and Costs" was one of these. Another, and that, perhaps, the best known, was one on "Manliness." The lectures drew an audience from the first of two thousand persons (see illustration No. 4), and much good was accomplished.

Mr. Brown was twice married. His second wife died in 1884. Her death was a severe blow to her husband. His elasticity of mind and body failed, and he seemed unable to recover from the shock. He continued his work, however, until the commencement of this year when his health completely broke down. The scene at his funeral will never be forgotten. Thousands of the poor of the city, all wearing some sign of mourning, procured in many cases at the cost of a meal, lined the route of the procession, their sad faces showing that they knew how true a friend they had lost.

LEOPOLD VON RANKE.

AT the beginning of this year one of the most interesting and remarkable men this world contained was the eminent historian whose portrait appears on the first page. He had then entered upon his ninety-first year, and was busily engaged on a work that he expected would require nearly ten years to complete. It was a history of the world, commenced when he was eighty years old, and six volumes of which had already been published. A visitor who called upon him in the early days of January found "the little, unimposing, and hermit-looking man, with bald head and waving beard," full of life and energy, laboring hard in his humble abode in Berlin, and showing but little trace in body and none in mind of the decrepitude associated with ninety years of life. He was then doing his usual two hours of walking a day, and eight hours a day of literary labor. Even in a country renowned for the industry of its scholars, Von Ranke was reckoned a prodigy.

He was born at Wiehe, in Thuringia, December 21st, 1795, and died, May 23d, this year, in his ninety-first year. His father was a wealthy lawyer who had a farm at Wiehe, and it was on that farm that Leopold and his brothers—all of whom became famous as scholars or divines—spent their early years. Leopold was educated for a teacher, and graduated from the college of Schulpforta, in Prussia, in 1814. Shortly afterward he was appointed head-master of the gymnasium of Frankfort on the Oder. His extraordinary love of history manifested itself while he held that position, and the publication of his "History of the Nations of Europe in the Sixteenth Century" at once won him public recognition. He was appointed Professor of History in the University of Berlin, and he held the position and performed its duties for more than forty years.

With Von Ranke a new era in historical work was inaugurated. He had an abhorrence of "literary hash." He was the first of the greater race of historians who think no time lost, no labor too great that is spent in discovering original documents. Leaving abstractions to others, Von Ranke hugged his fact. It was for facts he searched, and he ransacked the archives of Europe for letters and musty documents that had not seen the light for a century. He believed in the homely, but always little appreciated, truth that only by a critical examination of authorities, by carefully weighing their merits as witnesses, can good work be produced. With this view Ranke dispassionately examined Guicciardini, Beaucaire, the many Florentine historians, and a cloud of Spanish and German writers, the very names of whom are unknown to most readers. This modest work was the fit preface to his future labors. His precept and example forever put an end to the idea that the sole, or for many periods the chief, materials are to be found in printed books.

In a speech which he made on the occasion of his jubilee, he claimed for German historians that they made it a rule to be as much conversant with foreign as domestic materials. None among them has conformed to this lofty standard more closely than Ranke. But he had other qualities very rare in the historical literature of Germany. In greater degree than almost any other historian, he had the gift of seeing the course of events as a whole. That history should have a wide intellectual horizon is a lesson which he constantly taught by precept and example, and in not the least remarkable of his productions he sharply reproves those who confound it, a science universal in its nature, with politics, as if its object were to glorify a particular land or people. Lord Acton said little more than the truth when he observed of Ranke that he was the first German to pursue the study of history for no ulterior purpose.

In 1827 he was commissioned by the Prussian Government to undertake the congenial task of making researches in the archives in Vienna, Venice, Rome, and Florence; and he procured, especially from Venetian sources, a vast mass of materials totally unknown to his predecessors. The results of his labors were seen in a group of works, published between 1829 and 1834, and since that time, every year has seen one volume of history issued from his pen. More than fifty volumes in all, each one the product of laborious research, he has given to the world, and it must be remembered that during all that time that he was writing these volumes he was delivering daily lectures in the university, before an audience learned and critical, who, as he knew, were looking to him for an education, and whose claims his conscience never permitted him to neglect. Yet all those forty years eight hours of the day were given to the preparation of his books. "My first spell," he said, to a visitor who inquired how he performed such labors, "is from ten in the morning until two. I get back to my desk again at nine, and work till one in the morning. Midnight is my most congenial hour, and that is the time I find when I can produce most." Here is revealed much of the secret of Ranke's unique position. Hard work strenuously pursued for many years, almost as much as native genius, had gained for him the place of præceptor Germaniæ.

Von Ranke's earlier works were: "Princes and People of Southern Europe in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," and the "Conspiracy Against Venice in 1688." These were followed by the "Popes of Rome: Their Church and Their State in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," which is his most famous and interesting work, many persons having read that who have never opened another volume of his writings. His most complete and elaborate effort, however, is his "German History in the Times of the Reformation." He also published "Annals of the German Monarchy Under the House of Saxony," nine books of Russian history, "Civil Wars and Monarchy in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," a "History of France" and many other works. In 1865, Von Ranke ceased to lecture. It was not that he was unable to work, but, being seventy years old, he feared that his remaining years would not be sufficient to allow him to accomplish the task on which he had set his heart, the "History of the World," already referred to. A "History of England in the Seventeenth Century" and a "History of Frederick the Great" were also in hand, and those had to be completed. The "History of the World" is brought down to about the year 1000, but it is reported that Von Ranke's secretaries have material left in order by the great historian which will enable them to issue at least two more volumes.

The Emperor William was a warm friend of his distinguished subject. In Germany, it is not the fashion, as it is elsewhere, to despise "them literary fellers." The Emperor visited the historian frequently, presented him with a full-length portrait of himself, ennobled him, and made him Chancellor of the Order of Merit.

PRINCIPAL TULLOCH.

In the death of the Very Rev. John Tulloch, D.D., LL.D., senior Principal of St. Andrews University, which occurred on February 13th last, Scotland has lost one of the foremost of its representative men, and the English-speaking world a most thoughtful and brilliant author. The loss will be all the more keenly felt because the learned principal has been cut off in the vigor of his days and when he was in full possession of his widely diversified powers.

He was born near Tippermuir, in Perthshire, in 1823, and he has therefore died in his sixty-third year. He entered the United College of St. Andrews when in his fifteenth year, and after completing his literary and philosophical studies there he passed into the College of St. Mary as a student of theology, the college of which he afterward became principal. After completing his course there he was licensed as a preacher, and in a short time thereafter obtained a church in Dundee.

In 1854, that is, at the early age of thirty-one, he succeeded Principal Haldane as the head of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, and as Professor of Divinity there. In the discharge of the duties of the twofold office he spent the remainder of his years. He was the author of many works, the chief of which are the "Leaders of the Reformation," "English Puritanism and its Leaders," and "Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in the Seventeenth Century."

In the public business of his own Church he took a prominent part. He was for many years one of the clerks of the General Assembly, and in 1878 he was raised to the Moderator's chair, and his graceful and genial manners enabled him to fill such public offices with dignity and acceptance.

In 1874 he paid a visit to this country, but as it was at a time when his indefatigable labors had rendered absolute rest essential to him, he was obliged to decline all invitations to preach. His books, however, are widely read here and are much prized by theological students and intelligent young men.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Good Work in These "Hard Times."—At a large meeting of workmen Mr. Watt observed: "The other night I was urging a man to give up his evil ways, and turn to God, who alone could supply all his need; and he replied, 'I have enough to do in these hard times to look after the needs of my body, without thinking anything of the welfare of my soul; I have no time for such things.' Like many others, this poor man had never realized that in Christ he had and might enjoy everything. People will not give Christ a trial. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.'"

Opening Wide the Door.—A Devoted Servant of Christ told us that recently "he spoke to a young woman about her need of Christ to save her and make her happy. She was deeply concerned, and seemed really anxious to find the way of salvation. I repeated that beautiful verse, 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock,' etc. 'I think I see it,' she said, in a hesitating voice. 'Read it again, yourself,' I said. After doing so, she said, 'Yes, I will not go out of this building until I find Christ. I will throw open wide the door of my heart, and let the waiting Saviour come in!' She did so, and He took up His abode with her. If there is one condition more miserable than another, it is that of a man who is near the kingdom, but not in it—a hungry man in sight and within easy reach of a feast, but not partaking of it."

The Hand on the Knocker.—A Scotch Minister remarked: "I was in the far north, recently, and attended a series of evangelistic meetings in Aberdeen, and I have not for many years, seen such a wonderful work of divine grace; so many are taking an interest in the things of Christ, and pressing into His kingdom, while many more, though not inside, are not far from the kingdom of God, for their hand is even on the knocker. I was speaking to two men in Stirling, one of whom was deeply anxious about his soul. When I asked him to enter in at the strait gate, he said, 'No, not to-night; I will be better prepared to take Christ by the end of next week.' 'But what,' I said, 'if your soul be in the eternal world before then?' But he went away hoping that God would hold out His arms of mercy until that time. He was not far from the kingdom, but he was running an awful risk."

A Mischievous Audience.—"As I was One day walking into a meeting in Birmingham which I had to address, Major Bond, the chief of the police, told me that of the seven hundred men who were inside the chapel, four hundred of them were convicted thieves. He advised me to call in the police if the least sign of disturbance took place; but I replied that I was there to show the men that I loved them, and to keep them outside the jail and not in it. But I soon found that these men were bent on mischief. They destroyed a small organ in the back gallery by turning round the pipes of it; they broke a clock which was placed in the front of the gallery, and then broke every window, without exception, in the place. But we were not daunted, and never appealed to the police, and now I am glad to tell you that the ring-leaders of these men are our truest friends, thus proving that love is a greater power than physical force."

The Irish Occupants of a Wooden Shed.—Mr. McFarlane said: "I was once in the north of Ireland and spoke to a man there of God's readiness to pardon sinners. He and his wife were in the habit of drinking, and so notorious had they become that their neighbors objected to live beside them, and when they were refused a house they went to live in a wooden shed where no one would be annoyed by them. But this man would not forsake his evil way, and once when I was urging him to give up drinking, and turn to the Lord, he said, 'Young man, there is no use you talking to me. Dr. Chalmers and Mr. McCheyne have both spoken to me on that subject, and do you think you can do me any good, after they have failed? No, no, I am Gospel hardened; there is no use you talking to me.' I have heard of people being Gospel hardened, but I never heard of any one before confess that they themselves were in this hopeless condition. And yet that man was once a respectable church-going person, and his wife at one time thought she was a Christian. I am sorry to say that the man died as I found him. I tried to direct his wife in the right way, but nothing would do it; and yet, there was a time when she wept listening to the story of Christ on the cross."

Visit to a Pretty White Cottage.—A Minister remarked: "When I was a little fellow our nurse used to take me and the other children for a walk through a village where there was a cluster of white cottages; but there was one cottage that was far whiter than any of the others; it was of a dazzling whiteness, and we thought it very pretty. October, November, and December passed, and we continued our walk through the village, and looked at the pretty white cottage. One morning the snow came, and covered the ground, and when we took our usual walk we looked for the pretty white cottage, but, alas, it was no longer white; it was a dingy yellow color, and brown streaks all over it! 'What is the matter with the cottage?' we asked each other. But the owner told us that it was just as white as ever; but it was in comparison with the snow only that it now looked so dingy. Friends, let us give up comparing ourselves with one another, and like the snow and the cottage, let us compare ourselves with the perfect purity of Christ, and then we shall see ourselves as never before."

In a Churchyard at Midnight.—"One Night," said Mr. Wookey, "I was speaking at an open-air meeting, which lasted until half-past ten. At the close of it, a young man said to me, 'I suppose, sir, you are very tired.' 'Yes,' I replied, 'I am quite done up.' 'Can you come with me for half an hour?' he asked. 'No,' I said, 'I must go home now, and have supper.' 'Well, go in and have your supper, and then give me half an hour,' pressed the young man. And past eleven o'clock he led me to what I think the grimmiest churchyard in the three kingdoms. As we entered the gate I saw by the moonlight that he was leading me toward a green mound, and as the tender moon looked down the young man threw himself across the mound and exclaimed, 'Mother, dear mother, I have started at last.' He again repeated these words, and by them I learned that he had begun a Christian life. Could that mother, who had long prayed for her boy, have seen him at that moment, her heart would have been rejoiced. Pray on, mothers, for although you may not live to see your prayers answered, He who has promised will not fail."

A Doctor in the Middle Ages had Found a cure for a certain disease which was very prevalent in the centre of Europe at that time, and was bringing thousands of people to a speedy and early grave. No one could find the medicine which could cure this disease, save this one doctor, who kept it a profound secret. Thousands seized with the disease went to him who had the blessed cure, and all were healed who came to him. At length, he himself fell ill, very ill, and was nigh unto death. Many physicians came to him, pleading that he would make known his secret to them, that the people might not suffer without chance of salvation. But he shook his head to all their entreaties, and said, 'No, I will not tell you, for I may get better, and it might be of use to me yet.' He died, however, and the valuable secret went to the grave with him, which might have done so much good to others. Many followed his funeral bewailing their great loss. Oh, could that doctor have heard the cry of sorrow that rose from the suffering throng, it would have been a great reproach to him. It is not so with the malady of sin. The cure is offered openly "without money and without price."

THE INSIGNIFICANT SPARROW.

The third of Dr. Talmage's Vacation Sermons on the Voices of Gardens and Fields.

"Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? and not one of them is forgotten before God."—LUKE 12: 6.

God in the Insignificant—In the Trivial—I. He Chooses our Occupation—Intentions Thwarted—Each in his Appointed Place—II. Chooses our Location—III. Arranges Friendships—IV. Circumscribes our Prosperity—Two Things Not to be Fretted Over—The Slate Cleaned—God's Map of Your Life—V. Guides our Steps—A Missionary's Child Killed at St. Helena—The Shawls being Woven—Contentment the Great Lesson.

YOU see the Bible will not be limited in the choice of symbols. There is hardly a beast, or bird, or insect, which has not been called to illustrate some divine truth—the ox's patience, the ant's industry, the spider's skill, the hind's surefootedness, the eagle's speed, the dove's gentleness, and even the sparrow's meanness and insignificance. In Oriental countries none but the poorest people buy the sparrow and eat it—so very little meat is there on the bones, and so very poor is it, what there is of it. The comfortable population would not think of touching it any more than you would think of eating a bat or a lamprel. Now, says Jesus, if God takes such good care of a poor bird that is not worth a cent, won't He care for you, an immortal?

We associate God with revolutions. We can see a divine purpose in the discovery of America, in the invention of the art of printing, in the exposure of the Gunpowder Plot, in the contrivance of the needle-gun, in the ruin of an Austrian or Napoleonic despotism; but how hard it is to see personal affairs of our lives! We think of God as making a record of the starry host, but cannot realize the Bible truth that He knows how many hairs are on our head. It seems a grand thing that God provided food for hundreds of thousands of Israelites in the desert; but we cannot appreciate the truth that, when a sparrow is hungry, God stoops down and opens its mouth and puts the seed in. We are struck with the idea that God fills the universe with His presence; but cannot understand how He encamps in the crystal palace of a dewdrop, or finds room to stand between the alabaster pillars of a pond lily. We can see God in the clouds. Can we see God in these flowers at our feet?

We are apt to place God on some great stage—or to try to do it—expecting Him there to act out His stupendous projects, but we forget that the life of a Cromwell, an Alexander, or a Washington, or an archangel, is not more under divine inspection than your life or mine. Pompey thought there must be a mist over the eyes of God because He so much favored Cæsar. But there is no such mist. He sees everything. We say God's path is in the great waters. True enough! but no more certainly than He is in the water in the glass on the table. We say God guides the stars in their courses. Magnificent truth! but no more certain truth than that He decides which road or street you shall take in coming to church. Understand that God does not sit upon an indifferent or unsympathetic throne, but that He sits down beside you to day, and stands beside me to-day, and no affair of our lives is so insignificant but that it is of importance to God.

I. In the first place

GOD CHOOSES OUR OCCUPATION

for us. I am amazed to see how many people there are dissatisfied with the work they have to do. I think three fourths wish they were in some other occupation, and they spend a great deal of time in regretting that they got in the wrong trade or profession. I want to tell you that God put into operation all the influences which led you to that particular choice. Many of you are not in the business that you expected to be in. You started for the ministry and learned merchandise; you started for the law and you are a physician; you preferred agriculture and you became a mechanic. You thought one way; God thought another. But you ought not to sit down and mourn over the past. You are to remember that God arranged all these circumstances by which you were made what you are.

Hugh Miller says: "I will be a stonemason;" God says: "You will be a geologist." David goes out to tend his father's sheep; God calls him to govern a nation. Saul goes out to hunt his father's asses, and before he gets back finds the crown of mighty dominion. How much happier would we be if we were content with the places God gave us!

GOD SAW YOUR TEMPERAMENT and all the circumstances by which you were surrounded, and I believe nine-tenths of you are in the work you are best fitted for. I hear a great racket in my watch, and I find that the hands and the wheels and the springs are getting out of their places. I send it down to the jewelers and say, "Overhaul that watch, and teach the wheels, and the spring, and the hands to mind their own business." You know a man having a large estate. He gathers his working hands in the morning, and says to one, "You go and trim that vine;" to another, "You go and weed those flowers;" to another, "You plough that tough glebe;" and each one goes to his particular work. The owner of the estate points the man to what he knows he can do best, and so it is with the Lord.

II. I remark further, that God has arranged THE PLACE OF OUR DWELLING.

What particular city or town, street or house you shall live in, seems to be a mere matter of accident. You go out to hunt for a house, and you happen to pass up a certain street, and happen to see a sign, and you select that house. Was it all happening so? Oh, no! God guided you in every step. He foresaw the future. He knew all your circumstances, and He selected just that one house as better for you than any one of the ten thousand habitations in the city. Our house, however humble the roof and however lowly the portals, is as near God's heart as an Alhambra or a Kremlin. Prove it, you say, Proverbs 3: 33: "He blesseth the habitation of the just."

III. I remark further that God arranges

ALL OUR FRIENDSHIPS.

You were driven to the wall. You found a man just at that crisis who sympathized with you and helped you. You say: "How lucky I was!" There was no luck about it. God sent that friend just as certain as He sent the angel to strengthen Christ. Your domestic friends, your business friends, your Christian friends, God sent them to bless you, and if any of them have proved traitorous, it is only to bring out the value of those who remain. If some die, it is only that they may stand at the outpost of heaven to greet you at your coming.

You always will have friends, warm-hearted friends, magnanimous friends; and when sickness comes to your dwelling, there will be watchers; when trouble comes to your heart, there will be sympathizers; when death comes, there will be gentle fingers to close the eyes and fold the hands, and gentle lips to tell of a resurrection. Oh, we are compassed by a body-guard of friends! Every man, if he has behaved himself well, is surrounded by three circles of friends—those of the outer circle wishing him well; those in the next circle willing to help him; while close up to his heart are a few who would die for him. God pity the wretch who has not any friends! He has not behaved well.*

* [Dr. Talmage's dictum needs a word of qualification, or it may lead his readers to form an unfavorable opinion of men who do not deserve it. It would be rash to conclude that every friendless man has misbehaved. Some have lost their friends by falling into poverty. Solomon said: "All the brethren of the poor hate him, and his friends go far from him." (Prov. 19: 7.) It is so in our country and in our day. If the friendless man had only misbehaved, he might have retained his friends, who would have forgiven him. If he is absolutely without a friend, it is safe to conclude that he has committed the unpardonable crime of becoming poor, which would cause old friends to fall away from him and preclude him from making new ones. Misbehavior is not half so expeditious or so potent an isolator as poverty.—E.B.]

IV. I remark again, that God puts down the limit to our TEMPORAL PROSPERITY.

The world of finance seems to have no God in it. You cannot tell where a man will land. The affluent fall; the poor rise. The ingenious fail; the ignorant succeed. An enterprise opening grandly shuts in bankruptcy, while one of the peat dug up from some New England marsh the millionaire builds his fortune. The poor man thinks it is chance that keeps him down; the rich man thinks it is chance which hoists him; and they are both wrong. It is so hard to realize that God rules the money market, and has a hook in the nose of the stock-gambler, and that all the commercial revolutions of the world shall result in the very best for God's dear children.

My brethren, do not kick against the divine allotments. God knows just how much money it is best for you to lose. You never gain unless it is best for you to gain. You go up when it is best for you to go up, and go down when it is best for you to go down. Prove it, you say. I will, Rom. 8: 28: "All things work together for good to them that love God." You go into a factory and you see twenty or thirty wheels, and they are going in different directions. This hand is rolling off this way, and another hand another way; one down and another up. You say: "What confusion in a factory!" Oh, no! all these different hands are only different parts of the machinery. So I go into your life and see strange things. Here is one providence pulling you one way, and another in another way. But these are different parts of one machinery by which He will advance your everlasting and present well-being.

Now you know that a second mortgage, and a third and fourth mortgage, is often worth nothing. It is the first mortgage that is

A GOOD INVESTMENT.

I have to tell you that every Christian man has a first mortgage on every trial, and on every disaster, and it must make a payment of eternal advantage to his soul. How many worriments it would take out of your heart, if you believed that fully. You buy goods and hope the price will go up, but you are in a fret and a frown for fear the price will go down. You do not buy the goods using your best discretion in the matter, and then say, "O Lord, I have done the best I could; I commit this whole transaction into Thy hands!" That is what religion is good for, or it is good for nothing.

There are two things, says an old proverb, about: First, things that you can help; and second, things which you cannot help. If you can help them, why do you not apply the remedy? If you cannot help them, you might as well surrender first as last. My dear brethren, do not sit any longer moping about your ledger. Do not sit looking so desponding upon your stock of unsalable goods. Do you think that God is going to allow you, a Christian man, to do business alone? God is the controlling partner in every firm; and, although your debtors may abscond, although your securities may fail, although your store may burn, God will, out of an infinity of results, choose for you the very best results.

YOU OUGHT NOT TO FRET

Do not have any idea that you can overstep the limit that God has laid down for your prosperity. You will never get one inch beyond it. God has decided how much prosperity you can stand honorably, and employ usefully, and control righteously; and at the end of 1886 you will have just so many dollars and cents, just so much wardrobe, just so much furniture, just so many bonds and mortgages, and nothing more. I will give you one hundred dollars for every penny beyond that. God has looked over your life. He for you, and He is going to bless you in time, and bless you for eternity; and He will do it in the best way. Your little child says: "Papa, I wish you would let me have that knife." "No," you say, "it is a sharp knife and you will cut yourself." He says: "I must have it." "But you cannot have it," you reply. He gets angry and red in the face, and says he will have it; but you say he shall not have it. Are you not kind in keeping it from him? So God treats His children. I say, "I wish, heavenly Father, to get that." God says: "No, my child." I say, "I must have it." God says, "You cannot have it." I get angry and say, "I will have it." God says: "You shall not have it;" and I do not get it. Is He not and the best of Fathers? Do you tell me there is no rule and regulation in these things? Tell that to the men who believe in no God and no Bible. Tell it not to me!

A man of large business concludes to go out of his store, leaving much of his investments in the business, and he says to his sons: "Now, I am going to leave this business in your hands. Perhaps I may come back in a little while, and perhaps not. While I am gone you will please to look after affairs." After awhile the father comes back and finds everything at loose ends, and the whole business seems to be going wrong. He says: "I am going to take possession of this business—you know I never fully surrendered it; and henceforth consider yourselves subordinates." Is he not right in doing it? He saves the business. The Lord seems to let us go on in life, guided by our own skill, and we make miserable work of it. God comes down to our shop or our store, and says: "Things are going wrong, I come to take charge. I am master, and I know what is best, and I proclaim my authority." We are MERELY SUBORDINATES.

It is like a boy at school with a long sum that he cannot do. He has been working at it for hours, making figures here and rubbing out figures there, and it is all mixed up; and the teacher, looking over the boy's shoulder, knows that he cannot get out of it, and cleaning the slate, says: "Begin again." Just so God does to us. Our affairs get into an inextricable entanglement, and He rubs everything out and says: "Begin again!" Is He not wise and loving in so doing?

I think the trouble is, that there is so large a difference between the divine and the human estimate as to

WHAT IS ENOUGH.

I have heard of people striving for that which is enough, but I never heard of any one who had enough. What God calls enough for man, man calls too little. What man calls enough, God says is too much. The difference between a poor man and a rich man is only the difference in banks. The rich man puts his money in the Park Bank, or the Nassau Bank, or the Fulton Bank, or some other bank of that character, while the poor man comes up and makes his investments in the bank of Him who runs all the quarries, all the mines, all the gold, all the earth, all heaven. Do you think a man can fail when he is backed up like that?

I want to bring this truth close up to the heart of those people in this audience who have to calculate rigid economy, who are perplexed how they will make the old garment hold out a little longer, with whom the great question is not which is the best investment or the most lucrative security, but how shall I make the two ends meet? To such people I bring the condolence of this Christian truth.

You may have seen a map on which is described, with red ink, the travels of the children of Israel through the desert to the Promised Land. You see how they took this and that direction, crossed the river and went through the sea. Do you know of your life with paths leading up to this bitterness and that success, through this river and across that sea? but, blessed be God! the path always comes out at the Promised Land. Mark that! Mark that!

V. I remark, again, that all those things that seem to be but accidents in our life, are under the divine supervision. We sometimes seem to be going helmless and anchorless. You say, "If I had some other trade; if I had not gone there this summer; if I had lived in some other house." You have no right to say that. Every tear you wept, every step you have taken, every burden you have carried, is under divine inspection, and that event which startled your whole household with horror, God met with perfect placidity, because He knew it was for your good. It was part of a great plan projected long ago. In eternity when you come to reckon up your mercies, you will point to that affliction as one of your greatest blessings.

POLISHED DIAMONDS.

God has a strange way with us. Joseph found his way to the prime minister's chair by being pushed into a pit; and to many a Christian down is up. The wheat must be flailed; the quarry must be blasted; the diamond must be ground; the Christian must be afflicted; and that single event, which you supposed stood entirely alone, was a connecting link between two great chains, one chain reaching through all eternity past, and the other chain reaching through all eternity future, so small an event fastening two eternities together.

A missionary, coming from India to the United States, stopped at St. Helena while the vessel was taking water. He had his little child with him. They walked along by an embankment, and a rock at that moment became loosened, and falling instantly, killed the child. Was it an accident? Was it a surprise to God? Had He allowed His servant, after a life of consecration, to come to such a trial? Not such is my God. There are no accidents in the divine mind, though they may seem so to us. God is good, and by every single incident of our life, whether it be adverse or otherwise, before earth and heaven, God will demonstrate His mercy.

I hear a man say, "That idea belittles God. You bring Him down to such little things." Oh, I have a more thorough appreciation of than I have in great things! The mother does not wait until the child has mashed its foot or broken its arm before she administers sympathy. The child comes in with the least bruise, and the mother kisses it. God does not wait for some tremendous crisis in our life, but comes down to us in our most insignificant trials, and throws over us the arms of His mercy.

Going up the White Mountains some years ago, I thought of that passage in the Bible that speaks of God as weighing mountains in a balance. As I looked at those great mountains, I thought can it be possible that God can put these great mountains in scales? It was an idea too great for me to grasp; but when I saw a blue-bell down by the mule's foot, on my way up Mount Washington, then I understood the kindness and goodness of God. It is not so much of God in great things I can understand, but of God in little things.

There is a man who says: "That doctrine cannot be true, because things do go so very wrong." I reply it is on the part of God, but a lack of understanding on our part. I hear that men are making very fine shawls in some factory. I go in on the first floor, and see only the raw materials, and I ask: "Are these the shawls I have heard about?" "No," says the manufacturer; "go up to the next floor;" and I go up, and there I begin to see the design. But the man says: "Do not stop here; go up to the top floor of the factory, and you will see the idea fully carried out." I do so, and having come to the top, see the complete pattern of an exquisite shawl. So in our life, standing down on a low level of Christian experience, we do not understand God's dealings. He tells us to go up higher and higher, until we begin to understand the divine meaning with respect to us, and we advance until we stand at the very gate of heaven, and there see God's idea all wrought out—a perfect idea of mercy, of love, of kindness. And we say: "Just and true are all Thy ways." It is all right at the bottom. Remember there is no inconsistency on the part of God, but it is only our mental and spiritual incapacity.

Some of you have been disappointed this summer—vacations are apt to be but whatever have been your perplexities and worriments, know that "Man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps." Ask these aged men in this church if it is not so. It has been so in my own life. One summer I started for the Adirondacks, but my plans were so changed that I landed in Liverpool. I studied law and I got into the ministry. I resolved to go as a missionary to China, and I stayed in the United States. I thought I would like to be in the East, and I went to the West; all the circumstances of life, all my work, different from that which I expected. "A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps."

So, my dear friends, this day take home this subject. Be content with such things as you have. From every grass-blade under your feet learn the lesson of divine care, and never let the smallest bird flit across your path without thinking of the truth, that "five sparrows are sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God." Blessed be His glorious name forever. Amen.

ROUGHING IT ON THE CONGO.

IN the course of an article on medical mission-work in Africa, published in Dr. Dowkontt's excellent Medical Record, Dr. A. Sims, who has recently left his labors on the Congo to visit this country, gives some valuable advice to persons contemplating mission-work. It is easy to gather from his remarks how arduous must be the work of a physician laboring as a missionary on the Congo.

"African equatorial medical missions," says Dr. Sims, "are quite different from those at home and in China. If you want to be a medical missionary, pure and simple, you cannot do it; the people do not come up in sufficient numbers daily; you may pass whole days, with a populous town near you, without applications for advice or medicine. You are generally among people who object to a rational system of medicine, who only believe in charms, and among whom, therefore, you have to push your medical work, to go out and find it with a medicine-box under your arm, visiting from house to house, searching for the poor, suffering creatures to minister to. On the Congo, for instance, unless you do that you will have next to no work, and you will begin to consider that your choice of a mission was bad, and that China were better. You will not find a hospital ready for you, or even a house; you must be prepared to build them both. You may have to receive patients in your dining-room or bedroom, and to keep the in-patients in a mere shed. The patients will come at all hours, and any day. Punctuality and times have no importance for them, and it will be years before you can induce them to come regularly.

"A peculiar trial of the Central Africa Missionary is that he will generally be placed among people speaking various dialects; let him meet this by learning as many of them as possible. In such a case quit narrow ideas of work, think more of the poor, dying world than of personal trouble. It may be desirable to teach in the day-school for two or three hours in the morning. While I was at Stanley Pool I found the languages were not reduced, so I worked away in my spare time at Kiteke, Kiyansi, and another Upper Congo tongue. If he wants to see souls converted and accept God's gift, if he can conform himself to, and do cheerfully these miscellaneous things and varied works, if he is loyal to the Saviour's cause, the medical missionary will get a rich reward in Central Africa."

Volume VIII. of the Christian Herald, containing the Numbers for 1885, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3, including postage. A few volumes of 1883 and 1884 are also for sale. We have none prior to 1883.

A MAN PARALYZED BY FRENZY.

IN an interesting letter to the Missionary Herald, Mr. Perkins, who is laboring at Tientsin, in China, describes a curious case in which his services were requested, but whether as physician or missionary he does not say: "I was called by a church-member to go to the home of a relative and do what I could for a man who had lately been prostrated by passion. I went, and found that exactly the case. He had been rendered helpless and speechless by his frenzy of passion. His eyes were contorted, and the muscles of the mouth and tongue so much paralyzed that he could only make sounds between a grunt and a squeal. This I proved to my own satisfaction by forcing him to drink some not very pleasant medicine which he tried to escape. After this sedative he went to sleep, but did not get about until some thirty-six hours after. He slowly improved, at first being able to speak only very slowly. It sometimes happens that after these frenzies of passion the voice is lost for weeks.

"But the curious feature of this case was its origin. It seems that the father, very severely, and probably, harshly, scolded him for certain real or supposed sins, and as it came from his father there was nothing to do but to bear it all without retort. The pressure proved too much for him, even though some of it was allowed to escape upon other members of the family. A Chinaman is a strange compound of stoicism and passion. Sometimes this latter amounts practically to madness or insanity. The question as to its being a demoniacal possession is of no practical interest. It must come from infernal sources; whether directly or indirectly makes but little difference."

AN INDIAN COLPORTEUR OFFENDED.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Witness tells an amusing story of his resentment at a supposed lack of courtesy when calling with tracts at a gentleman's house in India.

"A few days ago," he says, "I was visiting from house to house, and distributing tracts, at one of our railway stations. At a certain house there was no one about, and so I called out, 'Is any one at home?' when an answer was given in an abrupt and most uninviting tone, 'Who are you?' I felt somewhat discouraged at this, but decided to take no notice of it, and repeated my question, 'Is any one at home?' when, again, an answer was returned in a voice which sounded as if the speaker was provoked and out of temper, 'What do you want?' The words were uttered most deliberately, and each one was emphasized. I was about to say who I was, when, on looking into the veranda, I saw a magnificent parrot eyeing me most intelligently, and he repeated the question in the same deliberate, emphatic way, 'What do you want?' I was considerably relieved and amused, and thought of saying, 'Poll, I want your master, to give him a tract,' when the said master appeared. After my errand was delivered, I told the gentleman about his parrot's answers to my calls, and he told me that his parrot was known to be a very clear and good talker." He did not appear to have any idea that a person of quick temper might be annoyed by so clear and good a talker being guilty of rudeness.

THE MISSION TO ALASKA.

THE Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church has undertaken mission-work in Alaska. The Spirit of Missions states that the board has founded a mission-station at St. Michael's, and appointed the Rev. Octavius Parker to take charge of the work. Mr. Parker sailed early in May with his family from San Francisco for St. Michael's, which he will make his place of residence, and the headquarters of his missionary duty in the Yukon district. By a joint arrangement between this Society and the United States Government, an important part of Mr. Parker's duties will be the teaching of a native school at St. Michael's, the Government paying a stipend to Mr. Parker as a teacher and providing a house for him to live in. St. Michael's is situated on the sea-coast, north of the delta of the Yukon River, which is lined with a number of native Indian villages, which aggregate a population of about 700. It is a trading post originally founded by the Russians in 1835.

When Alaska came into the possession of the United States by purchase from Russia, in October, 1867, the latter government had been sustaining a mission there of the Russian Church for about seventy years, and at one time there had been seven missionary districts, with their clergy, and a lay membership of several thousand, and with a number of schools, but under the new government the Russian missionaries were withdrawn, and for about ten years no effort was made to continue Christian mission-work, until in 1877, the Rev. Dr. Sheldon Jackson and Mrs. A. R. McFarland, two devoted Presbyterians, went to Fort Wrangell and established a station there, as the first two American missionaries to Alaska. The territory covers an area of 580,107 square miles, more than twice the size of Texas, and a larger area than is covered by Germany, France, and the British Isles combined.

AN ASTONISHED BORROWER.

CHRISTIAN men often suffer disappointment and humiliation unnecessarily when they seek human help in trouble, instead of availing themselves of the inexhaustible treasures which God has placed at their disposal (Mal. 3: 10). A man who, like them had no faith in the promises made to him, had a surprise in Wall Street, New York, a few days ago.

His experience, as related in the Times, explains his amazement. He had just come from the office of a well-known broker, whom he visited pretty frequently two years ago, but whom he had not seen since the great panic. Then he was in Wall Street as an investor, and was a partner with the broker on equal terms in a joint speculation. It ended disastrously, and the loss was equally divided. The broker could afford to bear his share without acute embarrassment, but his friend's share took all the savings of a life of industry and frugality. He was too much distressed to pay much attention to the broker's attempt to cheer him, and placed no confidence in the broker's promise that if he would wait things would come right. He went away sorrowfully, and avoided Wall Street until the other day, when, being in urgent need of money, he went to the broker's office to see if he could raise a loan. He went to the cashier's desk, and laying down some engrossed parchments, asked if he could borrow two thousand dollars on that as collateral. The clerk looked up in surprise. "Raise two thousand dollars!" he ejaculated. "What do you want to put up collateral for? Why don't you draw on your own account?" "I have no account," said the man, sadly. The clerk produced the office ledger, and spreading it out before him, showed him an account, from which it appeared that over fifty thousand dollars stood to his credit. The broker had kept his word, and the borrower's delight equalled his amazement.

AN EAST INDIAN'S TESTIMONY.

A CHRISTIAN lady in India reports an interesting case which she recently heard from Mrs. L—, the wife of an English judge in that country. A native boy, of good family, and large prospective means, was converted in the Church Missionary Society's schools, and declared his wish to be baptized as soon as he should be of age, which is eighteen in India. His family opposed this and did all they could to dissuade him. He was heir to a lakh of rupees, but was to be disinherited if he became a Christian. However, as soon as he was eighteen he came to the principal missionary there, Mr. B—, and asked to be baptized. Mr. B— took legal advice, and finding it was all right, baptized him. Then the family instituted proceedings against him on the grounds that he was not of age.

Major L— had to try the case, and it was one that excited the deepest interest. Two brothers, pleaders, asked to be allowed to conduct it free of charge, the one, a Christian, on the boy's side; the other, a virulent heathen, on the opposite. One question that was put to the lad was, "What do you believe in?" On which he got up and repeated the Lord's Prayer. Then they asked him why he believed in the Lord Jesus? He made answer that in no other religion could he find that the gods so loved their people that they were willing to suffer and die for them, and in no other religion could he find so much love and such rewards.

The case was never completed. While it was in progress the boy's relatives came around him in a friendly manner and offered him some candy. He took some and ate one. He was immediately seized with violent convulsions, and his life was saved only by the prompt use of the stomach-pump. The candy was poisoned. As the boy's relatives were arrested on a charge of attempted murder, there were no witnesses in the original case, and the trial collapsed.

PURITY OF LIFE.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

The Fastidious Ermine—The Politeness of the Devil—Quits when Requested—The Sins that Thrive—A Hateful Penknife.

"HE that hath this desire," says the Book, "to be like Christ purifies himself even as Christ is pure." Above all things, a Christian ought to be a pure man—pure in life, pure in all manner of conversation. Purity, purity like that of the little ermine, the most fastidious animal in the world. Its hair and skin is white almost as the driven snow, and when they seek to capture the little ermine—for it is very sly and shy—when it comes out of its den, they sprinkle dirt and mud along its pathway, and when it returns and sees the mud and dirt in its pathway, it will lie down and subject itself to capture and death before it will smirch one of its little white hairs. And I want to see God's people reach the point where they will lie down and die any minute before they will smirch their Christian characters, or say or do anything that is improper or unclean before the eyes of God. That is what we mean. Character like that will win this world to Christ.

We talk about heaven and about going to heaven. I will tell you, my brother, when you reach that purity of heart and life where you will die before you will do wrong, you just stay right where you are, and if God don't call you home to heaven some of these days, I will tell you what He will do—He will bring the streets of the New Jerusalem right on in front of your building, and incorporate you right into heaven, where you shall live in the sight of God forever and ever. You and if heaven don't draw you to it, you will draw heaven to you, and you will be incorporated into the family of God.

I tell you, my brethren, the time has come for us to wake up and ask ourselves in the Church and in the community, "Are we pure people before God?" Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. There is the secret of pure life. It is pure heart. The hardest thing a man can try to do is to be a Christian without religion, to be a good man with a bad heart. It is like the man down yonder in the branch trying to clear the water so that he can drink from the branch; and a friend looked at him and said: "If you will go up there and run that hog out that is wallowing in the spring, the water will clear itself." It is a mighty hard matter to keep the stream of your life pure, with the devil wallowing in the fountain, old fellow. You must get the devil out of there. The devil goes bogging around and goes a heap of places where he is not invited, but he is too much of a gentleman to stay where he is not welcome; and if he puts up on you, old fellow, it is because you treat him well and because you give him a hearty welcome.

and good hospitality. That is the truth about it.

I say in my place here to-night that sin he will quit it, and he is not going to quit it until he does want to quit it. I overhauled my life four years ago and I will tell you how I wound up. I found out I had quit every sin in the world that I wanted to quit, and them that I did not want to quit I was still running. Now is not that where you stand, brother? That is the truth of the whole matter.

IF A MAN WANTS TO QUIT

A GOOD OLD METHODIST

brother said to me once, "Jones, my trouble is, I lose my temper and I swear when I get mad, and I cannot help it to save my life." "Well," I says, "go on and swear then. I don't care. I will not turn you out of the church, nor the Lord won't bother you about it; if you cannot help it, old fellow, go ahead." "Oh, well," he says, "why, why, I—I, maybe I could help it." "Well, now," I said, "if you can help it, God will put you in hell for doing it just as sure as we are standing here talking, and I will turn you out of church for it, you rascal, you." I met him about six months after that and he said to me, "Brother Jones, I have not cussed a single oath since I talked to you that day about swearing."

Whenever a fellow wants to quit he will quit; and he is not going to quit until he does want to quit. Here, let's look at the thing from a sensible, reasonable standpoint now. Suppose a fellow is a merchant. It is a sin, you know, to cheat. Well, now, honesty and fair dealing says thirty-six inches to the yard. Now, can a good old Methodist deacon cut an inch off the yardstick and measure cloth by it and get to heaven? That is not the way to get to heaven. Can a good old Baptist deacon take one ounce off his pound weight and weigh everything out to his customers with it and get to heaven? If your good old Presbyterian miller dips his toll dish twice into one of my bushels of corn, can he get to heaven? That is the way to bring it down, right now. Lookee here, brothers, its the principle of the heart that makes you do those things, that makes you unfit for heaven, and you will never get there. That is the truth about it.

Here is a mother, sitting in her room, quietly sewing, and little Willie, four years old, runs in and stands around his mother's knee, and he sees a beautiful little pearl-handled penknife, lying open before his eyes, and he takes the little penknife up. Mother does not see him come in or go. In about an hour mother calls the nurse and says, "Where is Willie?" And nurse commences hunting for Willie. Mother begins to look about for him. Nurse walks out into the flower-yard and as she is walking out behind the rose bushes, she sees little Willie lying prostrate. She goes up close to him and she sees the blood all scattered around his head and face; and she saw the blood on that little penknife, on the open blade. As he fell the open blade jobbed into his jugular veins, and there he is gasping his last in his own blood. The nurse picks him up carefully in her arms, runs into the house, and mother takes him up in her arms, and says, "Oh, precious Willie, speak one time to mamma." But the poor little bloody angel is gone; the spirit of the little one is gone.

Mother takes the little one and dresses it for its coffin, and the next day she buries it out of the sight of man and comes back to her desolate home, and in a few minutes the nurse walked in and said: "Madam, here is the little knife Willie had yesterday." Mother looked at its blade that was covered with the blood of her precious child, and she shrank back in horror and said, "Oh, take that knife out of my presence; I never want to look at it again; it has the blood of my precious little child upon it." And whenever Christians in this world can reach the point in their purity of life where they see that every sin in the moral universe is covered with the precious blood of the Son of God, and turn in horror and say, "Away with it; my soul loathes it; it has got the blood of the precious Saviour upon it; I will have nothing to do with it." There is no safe ground for the Christian this side of a total abhorrence of sin.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

By Rev. Capel Molyneux, B.A.

At Israel's Supreme Crisis—Israel His First Concern—How He will Come—Personally in Glory—Suddenly—Manifestly—When He will Come—At the Beginning of the Millennium—Where He will Come—The Mount of Olives.

THE crisis of Israel's "trouble" will be the signal for her deliverance, the prelude to her everlasting exultation; Antichrist's triumph the signal for his ruin, the prelude to the "lake of fire burning with brimstone"—his endless doom. It is remarkable that as with Israel's King, so with Israel herself; when her King expired on Calvary, and Satan apparently triumphed, at that moment the cry was heard, "It is finished!" and salvation, complete and everlasting was accomplished for a perishing world. And again when Israel herself shall be expiring in Jerusalem, and Antichrist apparently triumphant, even at that moment shall the cry be uttered, "It is done!" (Rev. 17:17), and salvation, complete and everlasting, be vouchsafed to that otherwise lost and perishing people; for then it is, as the prophet tells us, even then, that the Lord will fight for His people; and "His feet"—the feet of their Deliverer "shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives." (Zech. 14:3, 4).

As at the First Advent, though Christ came "the Saviour of all men," and to die for all, yet, by His own confession, was in His esteem, and first as His object—"I am not sent," said He, "but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel"—so at the Second, though He will come to judge the world, to settle the world's affairs, to take its kingdoms to Himself, and reign over the same forever, yet, evidently, even then, will Israel be first before Him, and her well-being His prime concern. Hence, mention of His Advent is rarely found in Scripture, but in immediate connection with Israel's circumstances, and Israel's prospects.

It is in order to close her tribulation (Matt. 24:29); it is for the purpose of rescuing her from the hands of her enemies, and destroying the same (Zech. 14:2, 3); it is to meet her heart's desire when she shall cry, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23:39); it is that the true David may be her king (Ezek. 37:24); it is that a fountain may be opened to her for sin and for uncleanness (Zech. 13:1); it is to turn away ungodliness from Jacob, and save all Israel (Rom. 11:26); it is that He Himself may be her light, and that she may herself arise and shine (Isaiah 60:1).

Thus, the bearing of the Advent on Israel's prospects, and its connection therewith, is abundantly evident; but for the more particular illustration of this, as well as of this subject generally, let us now proceed to consider,

HOW WILL THE LORD COME?

Personally, I reply, personally in glory. Jesus Christ, who lived and died on earth, and afterward rose and ascended into heaven, will Himself return, the same Jesus Christ, the same Man, who once trod earth's highway, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" even He the same, though in highest glory instead of deepest humiliation; though garbed in light instead of shrouded in a "body marred more than any man"—otherwise the same, even as the angels testified, "this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

HE WILL COME SUDDENLY!

When the world is crying "peace, peace;" when the most remote expectation of His Coming shall not generally prevail; when men are eating and drinking; marrying and giving in marriage; planting, buying, selling; absorbed in their ordinary concerns; overcharged with cares, interests, and pleasures of this world; when the heart whispers, if the lips give not birth to the sentiment, "Where is the promise of His Coming?" Then, at such a time, even then, He will come!

HE WILL COME MANIFESTLY.

There will be no doubt or possibility of question about His Coming; no need to go forth and search and look for it; it shall not be in a corner, or in a chamber, or in the desert! No man shall tell his neighbor it is come—for his neighbor, like himself, shall see it! It shall be terribly obvious—seen alike in the palace and the cottage; in the mansion and the cabin; in the court, and on 'change, and in the field; in the squares and the lanes of the city; in the brilliant assembly and the darkest abode of squalid destitution; where men are revelling, and where men are praying; where the world is decked out in fashion's gaudiest plumage, and where rags and tatters are the only habiliment. It will burst on all—an appalling, unmistakable reality—on all alike, all without exception, all at once. "Even as the lightning which lighteneth from one end of heaven to the other, so shall also the Coming of the Son of Man be."

WHEN HE WILL COME.

It is clear, and we need not fear to assert it, that the time of the Advent, relatively considered, will be, when Israel's trouble closes; when Antichrist's work is done, and when the Gospel shall be preached throughout the world as a witness; then Christ will come, but not till then.*

Scripture literally interposes nothing but the preaching the Gospel for a witness unto all nations—the restoration of Israel in part—the revelation of the man of sin—and the battle of Armageddon; these are the only events Scripture interposes, and these, literally understood, would not of necessity, and (with the exception of the first) will not, we believe, in fact, require more than a few years—some seven years or so—for their entire accomplishment. Perfectly, therefore, does this principle harmonize with the exhortations and admonitions in question; fairly does it invest them with their full and legitimate force; from the ascension to the present moment, unto the Advent, their application is palpable and unquestionable!

So much for the time of the Advent; it will occur at the close of the great tribulation, and be introductory to the Millennial age.

WHERE WILL THE LORD COME?

Everywhere! Everywhere, I conceive, as far as the "brightness" of that Coming is intended; this will be universal throughout the earth: "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the Coming of the Son of Man be." But personally, the Advent must have relation to some particular locality; and that locality is distinctly revealed. Not only are we expressly taught that the host, for the destruction of which the Lord will come, will be gathered around Jerusalem, and congregated in the valley of Jehoshaphat, contiguous to Jerusalem; but my text specially states that "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives;" and this conclusively settles the point—He shall come to the Mount of Olives! The mount so often visited by Him in the day of His humiliation; so often His chosen retreat from the world and its persecutions; so often the place of His rest and communion with His Father—the Mount of Olives! Endured in its recollections, precious in its associations to every soul that loves the Lord! That shall be the place—the first place on earth for the "soles of His feet;" "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives."

Thus, then, the Lord will come. He will come personally. He will come at the close of the great tribulation. He will come to the Mount of Olives.

* [The lecturer is here speaking of the second stage of the Lord's Coming, when He comes to take vengeance; not of the first stage when He comes into the air and the waiting believers and the dead saints are caught up to meet Him there.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Timely Warning to Office-holders was Issued last week by the President. This is usually a period of activity with them, as the primaries must be influenced now if at all. This year it appears that activity will be attended with danger. The President says: "I deem this a proper time to especially warn all subordinates in the several departments, and all office-holders under the General Government against the use of their official positions in attempts to control political movements in their localities. Office-holders are the agents of the people, not their masters. Not only is their time and labor due to the Government, but they should scrupulously avoid in their political action, as well as in the discharge of their official duty, offending by a display of obtrusive partisanship their neighbors who have relations with them as public officials." If the President's warning is heeded the primaries will this year miss some of their most conspicuous features.

A Horizontal Reduction on the River and Harbor bill was made in the Senate last week. Whether the conscience of the Senators was awakened, or they were disturbed by apprehensions about their political future, does not appear. There was abundant room for both influences. The reduction was a scaling of each appropriation twenty-five per cent. The total called for by the bill had risen by industrious log-rolling in the Senate to nearly nineteen millions, or three millions and a half since it left the House. The reduction leaves the total a little less than fifteen millions. The total number of items is nearly three hundred and fifty, a large number having been added in the Senate. It was passed on Friday by a vote of 42 to 14. A conference committee will now be needed, and when that has completed its work the bill has still to pass the ordeal of the President. Both political parties must be held responsible for the bill; it remains for the people to deal with individuals. There was no hesitation in the performance of that duty four years ago.

A New Extradition Treaty with Great Britain is said to have been arranged. One report states that it has already been sent to the Senate for ratification. Though its provisions have not been authoritatively published, there is a general feeling of satisfaction that the subject is being dealt with. It has long been a scandal to the two Governments that criminals have found a safe refuge from justice by crossing the border between this country and Canada. There are many persons here, too, who ought to be in English prisons. Under the treaty of extradition now in force there are only seven crimes for which the perpetrators may be extradited. They are: murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, and the utterance of forged paper. How incomplete this list is may be inferred from the fact that in some of our later extradition treaties more than twenty crimes are enumerated. The new treaty is said to add four crimes to the seven now extraditable. They are manslaughter, burglary, embezzlement or larceny, involving the amount of $50 or £10, or upward, and, finally, malicious destruction of property which endangers the life of others, and which in either country is made a crime by law. As the treaty is not to be applied to crimes committed before its ratification, there will be no raid, under its provisions, on the colony of American citizens in Canada, living in peace and safety on the funds they have stolen from widows and orphans.

A Surprise to Financiers was Administered on July 14th by the passage in the House of Mr. Morrison's joint resolution. It provides that "Whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be and is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than $10,000,000 per month, during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government." The resolution passed by an overwhelming vote—209 to 67. Its significance consists in the fact that it is a reproof to the Administration by its own friends, and an implied censure on its policy. It also requires the use of silver in the payment of the public debt, and will, if it passes the Senate and is approved by the President, compel a large number of national banks to close their business. The wisdom or folly of the resolution is not a question between the political parties, but between the sections.

The Trial of the Chicago Anarchists who were concerned in the dynamite outrage on May 4th commenced on Thursday last after twenty-one days had been consumed in obtaining a jury. Nine hundred and eighty-two men were examined before the twelfth man was agreed upon. The task of the people was simplified by the ruling of Judge Gary that, "If it is agreed to use violence for the destruction of human lives upon an occasion which was not yet foreseen, but upon some general principle on which the conspirators substantially agree, as in the case of a large number of men agreeing to kill the police if they were found in conflict with strikers, the occasion being left to their judgment, then, if that violence was used and resulted in the death of the police, those who were a party to the conspiracy are guilty of murder." The State attorney promised to prove to the jury who made the bomb, who threw it, and by whom the signal was given.

The Failure of Two Banks has Caused Much distress in the West. On July 14th, the Provident Savings Bank, of St. Louis, Mo., closed its doors. The petition for a receiver stated that the cashier had embezzled the available assets and absconded. The principal depositors are workmen, many of whom see the small provision they have made for sickness and old age swept away. On the same day the Dundy County Bank, at Benkleman, Neb., failed. The president of the bank went to its vault on the night before and stole everything available. It is stated that he left nothing belonging to the bank behind but its real estate and its furniture. The chief sufferers in this case are small tradesmen, who will be unable to meet their notes. Both the defaulters are understood to be in Canada.

Last Week's Elections of Members of the British Parliament bring the total to 663, leaving only seven seats to be filled. The classification is: Conservatives, 318; Unionist Liberals 74; Gladstonites, 187; Nationalists, 83—a Unionist muster of 392 ranked against 270 Home Rulers. Thus far there is a majority of 122 against Mr. Gladstone on his Irish policy. The seven constituencies still to be heard from were represented in the last Parliament by 1 Conservative, 3 Gladstonites, and 3 Nationalists. If they hold their former political complexion the new House will be composed of 319 Conservatives, 74 Unionist Liberals, 190 Gladstonites, and 86 Nationalists, a Unionist total of 393 and a Ministerial total of 276 on the Irish question. It thus appears that on general questions Mr. Gladstone would have a majority in the House of 26; but on the Irish question he is in a minority of 117. The people appear to be more equally divided. The total number of votes cast for Gladstone candidates was about 1,400,000, while those cast for Conservatives and Liberal deserters combined, numbered about 1,500,000.

An Attempt to Arrange a Coalition Government was reported last week by cable, but was probably premature. The terms stated were that four seats in the Cabinet and a proportion of smaller offices were to be placed at the disposal of Lord Hartington, with Lord Salisbury as Premier and Secretary of the State Department. The prevailing opinion is that even if the offer were made, Lord Hartington would not accept it, as he is shrewd enough to know that his prospect of succeeding Mr. Gladstone as head of the Liberal Party would be forfeited by accepting a seat in a Conservative Cabinet. Nor would he be able to carry the bolting Liberals with him. Mr. Chamberlain and John Bright certainly would not act with the Tories. As there is clearly a deadlock, the Parnellites, notably Justin M'Carthy, the historian, cherish the hope that the Conservatives will purchase a term of office by the concession of Home Rule to Ireland under the name of a comprehensive scheme of Local Government. It seems improbable, but there is a precedent for the policy. In 1867, under Disraeli, the Conservatives voted for an extension of the franchise still more advanced than the one they had opposed.

The Action of Russia in Closing Batoum as a free port is eliciting expressions of indignant remonstrance from the European governments. The London correspondent of the Journal des Débats says that the Earl of Roseberry, British Foreign Minister, has sent to Russia a precise and emphatic protest on the subject, characterizing Russia's action as a "flagrant violation of the Treaty of Berlin." In the event of Lord Salisbury being called to the premiership of England the incident is likely to assume serious proportions. He is known to be hostile to Russia, and his party has always favored a vigorous foreign policy. Besides this, Lord Salisbury has a personal interest in the matter, as he was one of the diplomatists who arranged the treaty of Berlin which Russia now proposes to disregard.

The Earthquakes and Volcanic Eruptions in New Zealand briefly reported by cable are graphically described in the local newspapers. On June 10th, about two in the morning, the side of Tarawera Mountain, an extinct volcano nineteen hundred and sixty-four feet high, was blown out, amid a storm of the elements—thunder, lightning and earthquake. On another peak of the same mountain another enormous crater was opened, sending forth showers of earth in the direction of Te Teko. An eye-witness reports that he saw a huge mass of flame rise in the heavens, and instantly lava and smoke covered the ground. Soon after a volume of flame issued from Runanga, close to Tarawera. Large balls of fire were thrown from the gaping mouth toward Taupo, this accompanied by terrible reports, which shook the whole place. Forked lightning followed close upon the balls of fire. The fall of earth into the open crater seemed to stop the fiery balls from coming up, but forked lightning still continued. Shortly afterward shocks of earthquakes were felt. The disturbances continued at intervals for two days. The immediate damage consists in the loss of seven Europeans and ninety-seven natives, and the destruction of five native villages, two hotels, two houses, and a mission hall, and the over-spreading of the country for one hundred and twenty miles with debris.

The Death of the Rev. Robert Nelson, D.D., who was for thirty years a missionary in China, is announced. Dr. Nelson returned from China six years ago with health completely broken down by his protracted labors. A slight improvement encouraged him to hope that he might engage in ministerial work at home. He accordingly settled in Connecticut as Rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Woodbury. A month ago his health again failed, and he went to Oakland, Va., his native place, for rest and recuperation. At first there was hope that he was deriving benefit from the change, but on July 15th he was seized with sudden pain, and died in a few minutes. Dr. Nelson was sixty-eight years old. He was a grandson of General Thomas Nelson, in whose house at Yorktown Lord Cornwallis surrendered the British forces in 1781. Mr. Nelson made the opening prayer at the Yorktown centennial celebration in 1881. Mrs. Nelson, his beloved wife and faithful helper during his long sojourn in China, died last September.

Dr. Whittaker, of Nevada, has been Elected by the Protestant Episcopal Convention of Pennsylvania Assistant Bishop for the diocese. Dr. Whittaker was chosen on the first ballot. Rev. Dr. W. N. McVickar was the candidate of the Low Church clergy. The High Church clergy, recognizing the impossibility of electing a candidate who should be distinctly a representative of their wing of the Church, agreed to support the Rev. Dr. Ozi William Whittaker, who is an Evangelical Churchman. Dr. Whittaker was consecrated as Missionary Bishop of Nevada and Arizona in St. George's Church, New York, on October 13th, 1869. Besides performing the duties of Missionary Bishop, Dr. Whittaker has served as Rector of St. Paul's Church, in Virginia City. He is described by his friends as mentally one of the best furnished men in the Church.

The Jerry McAuley Mission in Water Street New York, is now under the charge of Mr. S. H. Hadley, the former superintendent, Mr. Shorey, being now engaged in evangelistic work in the South. Mr. Hadley is a convert from the Cremorne Mission in Thirty-second Street. Four years ago no man seemed more unlikely than he to undertake mission work, but entering the Cremorne Mission one night, as it seemed by chance, he was led to Christ, and became earnestly desirous to labor for Him. Mr. Hadley has been rendering assistance at various missions since that time, and now enters on this hallowed sphere of Jerry McAuley's early labors with the best wishes and prayers of the Christian community.

The Translation of the Bible into Choctaw has been commenced by an Indian missionary. The Observer states that the Rev. John Edwards, who has been preaching among the Choctaws for many years, has undertaken the work, and has gone to Salem, Va., in order to have the assistance of Mr. William H. McKinney. Mr. McKinney, who is a full Indian, received the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Roanoke College in 1883, his graduating address being delivered first in Choctaw and then in English. On the 20th of last month he received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity from the Theological Department of Yale College, presenting as his thesis a translation of the Book of Malachi into Choctaw with a critical and exegetical commentary on the same. On his return to his home in the Indian Territory in the fall, Mr. McKinney and Mr. Edwards hope to complete the translation.

A Touching Appeal for Prayer has been Sent to the Fulton Street prayer-meeting by an evangelist in Arkansas. He writes: "I find several churches in this city of ten thousand people. But two thousand will more than cover the number who attend either regularly or occasionally; therefore, the larger part know not God, and are in darkness and sin. They are also the young and promising men and women. Now I find no helper, have no place to hold services except a high-priced opera house, no organist, and in all measures, so far as man is concerned, alone. And hence I ask you to pray for me.

A Dangerous Sleeping-place was Chosen by four tramps on July 12th. They were walking from Chicago to St. Louis, and on Monday followed the Chicago and Alton Railroad track. Being tired at night they lay down by the side of the track to sleep. One of them says that the midnight passenger train awakened him, and, in a half-dazed condition he aroused his companions, who quickly jumped to their feet, and, being only half awake, they staggered on the track and were struck by the train. Three were terribly injured about the head and body, and two of them will probably die. It would have been better for them if their companion had not awakened them. Lying motionless they would probably have been unharmed. That is never the case with men who are spiritually asleep. Unless they are aroused to a sense of their danger their destruction is certain (Eph. 5:14).

A Voyage Through the Whirlpool of Niagara was made by a cooper named Carlisle D. Graham on July 11th. The man had constructed a cask with oak staves and iron bands. It was seven feet long, and was weighted with lead at the lower end to keep it upright in the water. Inside was a canvas sack to hold his body, fitted with strong belts to keep it from striking the sides. He crawled into the sack, drew the cover over his head, and was set afloat on the edge of the pool. The cask kept pretty well in the centre of the river until it reached the whirlpool, when it struck a strong side current and was swiftly carried through, reaching the waters beyond in safety. There some fishermen saw the queer vessel, and, thinking it was a buoy, took it out of the water. The man inside was almost suffocated, and much shaken, but was otherwise unhurt. He said that his passage through the whirlpool seemed to him one series of jerks, but his chief suffering came from want of air. His sole object was to make money, and he probably succeeded. Though it was Sunday, thousands of excursionists went to witness the daring feat. They went to see a man risk his life, for it was not an exhibition of skill, as the man could do nothing to save himself; he simply lay still, inside the barrel, which at any moment might have been dashed against a rock, stove in and sunk. It was a pitiful exhibition, and every man who went to see it disgraced himself (Prov. 2:14).

Elephants Dragging the Funeral Car of a rhinoceros was the strange spectacle witnessed in New York a few nights ago. On June 19th a huge rhinoceros, Bombi by name, was brought at a cost of five thousand dollars to the menagerie in Central Park. He was docile at first, but when the hoarding in front of his cage was taken down that visitors might see him, he became violent. It was the sight of the elephants close by that enraged him. The bars in the front of his cage were an inch and a half in diameter, and the huge beast was unable to break them, but he made frantic efforts to climb over the top of his cage. The keepers tried to force him back with pitchforks, but the tines were turned by his hide, which in some places was two inches thick. The struggle lasted over an hour, and its termination was still doubtful when Bombi's foot slipped and he fell to the bottom of his cage panting and exhausted. He was perspiring profusely, and the cold night air blowing over him gave him a chill, which turned to pneumonia, and in two days the huge beast was dead. His carcass weighed nearly four tons, and all the horses available could not move it. Eventually the elephants were attached to the bier, and they drew the body to its last resting-place. The scene was a strange one to witness in an American city. As the procession of elephants yoked to the massive car, on which lay the dead body of their enemy, moved slowly in the calm moonlight under the trees of the Park, the spectator might have imagined himself in some Oriental land. It was a suggestive reflection, too, that the enormous creature, imper-vicious to the weapons of the keepers, had so quickly succumbed to disease. It is as God said of such a beast (Job 40:19), "He only that made him can make His sword to approach unto him." All power, whether of man or beast, is mixed with weakness, and Bombi met his death, as many mighty men have done, because he could not control his passions (Prov. 25:28).

A Fortune from the Bottom of the Sea was received last week by a sick, and almost destitute, widow at Newark, N. J. She came to this country with her husband some years ago from Scotland, where her relatives were in good circumstances. Her husband's health failed soon after their arrival, and after a long illness he died, leaving her in poverty. She struggled for a livelihood, and received assistance from charitable Christian friends, but encountered many hardships. For some reason unexplained, she did not apply to her family in Scotland for help. Last February, however, she heard that an aunt was dead and had left her a handsome legacy. It did not arrive, and the widow had almost ceased to hope for it, when last week a package was delivered to her by mail which had been recovered from the wreck of the Oregon after lying four months at the bottom of the sea. In it was a draft on the Bank of England for the amount of her legacy. It may be hoped that this precious package so strangely recovered will encourage the widow to put her trust in the Lord, who has control over the heaven and the earth and in the sea (Ps. 135:6).

An Attempt to Put the Probate Court to a new use was made recently in Connecticut. The Litchfield Enquirer reports that a petition has been presented to the Probate Court of that district for the appointment of a conservator, to take charge of a middle-aged lady well known in the locality. The court was embarrassed by the fact that it was not alleged that she was demented in any way. The sole ground on which the petition was presented was that the lady was about to make an imprudent marriage. The petitioner asserted that the man to whom she was about to ally herself was a worthless fellow, whose only object was to gain the comfortable property the lady possessed. If the judge is a sagacious, far-seeing man he will decline to allow the powers of his court to be applied to any such useful purpose. To grant the petition would be to establish a precedent that would encourage similar applications. A court that would place every one under a conservator, who designs to marry foolishly, would be a busy tribunal. It is with marriage as with the still more momentous concerns of the soul: the will is free. Wise friends may warn and implore when they foresee misery, but they cannot use coercion (Luke 10:11).

A Party Lost in the Mammoth Cave Wandered around for eight hours in constant danger, on July 8th. A despatch from Louisville states that a guide led into the cave a gay party of twenty-seven persons, who selected the long route of nine miles in and nine miles out. While the party were travelling through the winding passages, nine of them, who were in the rear, became separated from the main body, and those in front did not notice their absence for some time. From one till nine o'clock at night the unfortunates wandered about aimlessly, but constantly getting farther and farther away from the main track. To add to the terror of the situation, their lights went out, leaving them to wander on in the darkness and unknown dangers of the cavern. The wanderers finally adopted the plan of leaving small articles of clothing in their path as they walked along, and by these means a guide who went in search of them found them sitting on the banks of Echo River, to which they had finally arrived. The ladies in the party suffered greatly from nervous excitement, and all the others were very tired and distressed. That is the spiritual experience of the human race. Hopelessly lost and straying ever farther in darkness and danger, the Almighty Guide brought light and salvation to all who would follow Him (1 Peter 2:25.)

"THE TENDER MERCY OF OUR GOD."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"To give knowledge of salvation unto His people by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."—LUKE I: 77-79.

A Proof of Mercy—Greatness Combined with Tenderness—The Mercy of the Heart—How Shown—I. In Visiting Man—The Visit of the Incarnation—Intimate and Condescending—The Payment of the Debt—The Coining of the Heart—The Visit of Preaching—Of the Holy Spirit—Special Visits—II. In Visiting as the Dawn—Adapted to the Eye—Ends the Darkness—An Earnest of the Day—III. In Visiting the Troubled—IV. With Joyful Results.

OBSERVE how Zacharias, in this his joyful song, extolled the remission of sins as one of the most extraordinary proofs of the tender mercy of our God. He had been dumb for a season, as a chastisement for his unbelief; and therefore he used his recovered speech to sing of pardoning mercy. No salvation is possible without forgiveness, and so Zacharias says, "To give knowledge of salvation unto His people by the remission of their sins." At the very outset, I want any soul here that is burdened with sin to believe in the forgiveness of sins, and to believe in it because God is love, and has a great tenderness toward the work of His hands.

The main point of this morning's sermon will be to bring out into prominence those few words, "the tender mercy of our God." If you think of this tenderness in connection with God, it will strike you with wonder, for an instant, that one so great should be so tender; for we are apt to impute to Omnipotence a crushing energy, which can scarcely take account of little and feeble and suffering things. Yet if we think again, the surprise will disappear, and we shall see, with a new wonder of admiration that it must be so. He that is truly great among men is tender because he is great in heart as well as in brain and hand. The truly great spirit is always gentle; and because God is so infinitely great, He is, therefore, tender. Just as the leader to our psalmody sounds his tuning-fork at the commencement of our song, so have I done in these opening remarks. "Tender mercy" is the key-note of my discourse, I want you to keep it still in your ears.

I. In the first place, I invite you to observe that He shows this tender mercy in that

HE DEIGNS TO VISIT US.

"Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us." Observe that God has not merely pitied us from a distance, and sent us relief by way of the ladder which Jacob saw, but He hath Himself visited us. It needs no studied language to preach from this text, the expressions themselves are full of holy thought. A visit from God, what must it be! "Lord, what is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" A visit from the Queen would be remembered by most of you all your lives; you would feel yourselves half-enobled. But a visit from God, what shall I say of it?—that He should stoop to leave His high abode, and the majesty wherein He reigns, to visit insignificant beings like ourselves? This Bible is a letter from Him, and we prize it beyond the finest gold; but an actual visit from God Himself, what shall we say of such a favor?

In what ways has the Lord shown His tender mercy in deigning to visit us? I answer, first, God's great visit to us is the incarnation of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Many visits of God to men had been paid before that—read your Bibles, and see; but the most wonderful visit of all was when He came to tarry here, some thirty years and more, to work out our salvation. What but "tender mercy," hearty mercy, intense mercy, could bring the great God to visit us so closely that He actually assumed our nature? Kings may visit their subjects, but they do not think of taking upon themselves their poverty, sickness, or sorrow; they could not if they would, and would not if they could; this were more than we could expect from them. But our divine Lord, when He came hither, came into our flesh. This was a kind of visit such as none could have thought of granting save the infinitely tender and merciful God. The man is our next kinsman, a brother born for adversity; in all our affliction he is afflicted; he is tenderness itself.

Remember that He not only took our nature but He dwelt among us and sorrow. This great Prince entered our abode—what if I call it this hut and hovel?—wherein our poor humanity finds its home for a season. "He went about doing good." He mingled among men with scarcely any reservation; being through His purity separate from sinners as to His character, yet He was the visitor of all men. He was found eating bread with a Pharisee, which, perhaps, is a more wonderful thing than when He received sinners, and ate with them. A fallen woman was not too far gone for Him to sit on the curb of the well, and talk to her; nor were any of the poor and ignorant too mean for Him to care for them. He disdained no man's lowliness; He turned aside from no man's sin.

But remember that He visited us not merely to look upon us, and to talk with us, and to teach us, and set us a high and divine example, which, as I have said, were incomparably gracious, if it went no further, but He so visited us that He went down into our condemnation, that He might deliver us from it. He was made a curse for us, as it is written, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." He took our debts upon Him that He might pay them, to create the coinage. He gave Himself for us, which is more than if I said, "He gave His blood and His life;" His own self He gave. So did He visit us that He took away with Him our ill, and left all good behind. He did not come into our nature, and yet keep Himself reserved from all the consequences of our sin; nor come into our world, and yet maintain a status superior to the usual denizens of it; but He came to be a man among men, and to bear all that train of woes which had fallen upon human nature through its departure from the ways of God. Since God has visited us, not in form of vengeance, nor as a cherub with a flaming sword, but in the gentle person of that lowliest of the lowly, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto Me," we are herein made to see the tender mercy of our God. Nothing could be more tender than the divine appearance of the Man of Sorrows.

MINTING HIS OWN HEART

To this day we are visited of God in other respects, but with equal mercy. The proclamation of the Gospel in a nation, or is a visit of God's mercy. Whenever you come and hear the Gospel, be you sure of this, whether you receive it or not, the kingdom of God has come nigh unto you. It is a monstrosity—what if I say a miracle?—of iniquity, that men having sinned, and God having done so much to work out a way of remission of those sins, men should refuse to accept God's pardoning love. Oh, my hearers, why are you so besotted? Wherefore do you hate your own souls? Surely, the devils themselves would at the first have scarce believed it, that there could exist a race of creatures so hardened as to refuse the love which visits them in grace.

But, blessed be His name, He has visited some of us in a more remarkable manner still, for by the Holy Spirit He has entered into our hearts, and changed the current of our lives. What a visit is this! This visit of the Holy Ghost, when He comes to dwell in us, is surpassingly condescending. I have often said that I never know which to admire most, the incarnation of the Son of God, or the indwelling of the Spirit of God. This last is a wonderful condescension, for the Holy Ghost does not take a pure body of His own, but He makes our bodies to be His temples; He dwells not only in one of these, but in tens of thousands; and that not only by the space of thirty years, but throughout the whole life of the believer. He dwelleth in us notwithstanding all our provocations and rebellions. Mark the word, not only with us, but in us, and that evermore. Oh, this tender mercy! Who can describe it?

Often and often, since our first visitation by the Lord, I trust we have had from Him, bringing with them rapturous joys, singular deliverances, and countless blessings. This hath often happened when we have been in great trouble. When we were depressed in spirit, when we were burdened with unusual cares, or weeping over heart-breaking bereavements, the mercy of our God has made the dayspring from on high to visit us at just such times; and therein we have seen His tenderness. Our life is bright with these visits as the sky with stars.

II. I call your attention now to a second point. There is so much sea-room here that one scarce knows which way to steer. Secondly, He shows His tender mercy in that He visits us from on high. This means the dawning in the east, the rising of the sun at break of day. He does not come to us in Christ, or by His Spirit, as a tempest, but He has visited us as smiling morn, which in gentle glory floods the world with joy. While this Gospel visitation is apparently less in splendor than that of the law, yet it is not deficient in efficacy or in true glory. God has not visited us as a candle, which might suffice to cheer our darkness, but could not change it into day. David rejoiced, saying, "The Lord will light my candle;" but in this we go far beyond him; we need no candle, for the Lord has visited us with the day-dawn. He has come, moreover, not as a blaze which will soon die down, but as a light which will last our day, yea, last forever. After the long dark and cold night of our misery, the Lord cometh in the fittest and most effectual manner; neither as lightning, nor candle, nor flaming meteor, but as the sun which begins the day.

The visitation of the Lord to us is as the dayspring, because it suits our eye. Observe how the eye is suited to the light, and the light to the eye, in the economy of nature; and it is even so in the realm of grace. Day, when it first breaks in the east, has not the blaze of burning noon about it; but it peeps forth as a gray light, which gradually increases to the perfect day. So did the Lord Jesus Christ come; dimly as it were, at first, at Bethlehem, but by and by He will appear in all the glory of the Father. So doth the Spirit of God come to us in gradual progress.

The visits of God are like the dayspring, because

THEY END OUR DARKNESS.

The dayspring banishes the night. Without noise or effort, it removes the ebony blackness, and sows the earth with Orient pearl. Night stretches her bat's wings, and is gone; she flies before the arrows of the advancing sun; and the Coming of Jesus to us when He does really come into our hearts, takes away the darkness of ignorance, sorrow, carelessness, fear, and despair. Our night is ended once for all when we behold God visiting us in Christ Jesus. Our day may cloud over, but night will not return. Oh, you that are in the blackest midnight, if you can but get a view of Christ, morning will have come to you! There is no light for you elsewhere, believe us in this; but if Jesus be seen by faith, you shall need no candles of human confidence, nor sparks of feelings and impressions; the beholding of Christ shall be the ending of all night for you. "They looked unto Him, and were lightened; and their faces were not ashamed."

When the Lord visits us, it is as the dayspring, because He brings us hope of greater glory yet to come. The first Coming of Christ has not at once manifested everything; the dayspring is not the noon; but it is the sure guarantee of it; and so is the First Advent the pledge of the glory to be revealed. The sun never rises in error to set upon a sudden; he rises to complete his course, as the strong man cometh out of his chamber to fulfil his race. When we receive a visit from the Lord, it may be in the way of rebuke, or of feeble hope; but let us be patient, for the dawn shall grow with constant increase of light, and there is no fear of its dying down into the old sinful darkness. Now all this seems to me to be a wonderful instance of the tenderness of divine mercy. Think you not so? This Coming of the Lord, and of His light, so gradually, and yet so lavishly; so fittingly, and yet so effectually, does it not fill you with gratitude?

III. Thirdly, there is another instance of great tenderness in this, in that the Lord visits us in OUR VERY LOWEST estate. Permit me to read the text to you—"To give knowledge of salvation unto His people by the remission of their sins," from which it appears that God comes to visit us when we are in our sins. Let it never be forgotten that "When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." "God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." God comes to us as the morning, which does not wait for man, nor tarry for the sons of men. I cannot bear the spirit which I see spreading among us in reference to a'msgiving. It should not be indiscriminate, but it should be bounteous. Many cry, "We shall give help only to the deserving." If God were to adopt that rule, where would you and I be? It has even been muttered in an undertone that, with regard to hospitals, no doubt they are used by persons who ought to provide for themselves, and so help to support struggling medical men. It may be so; but I like not the hard and niggardly spirit which suggests such criticisms. Talk not so; this is fit chatter for barbarians. Those who know the tender mercy of God will recollect that, when we ourselves had no good about us whatsoever, His tender mercy visited us, even as the sun ariseth upon the just and upon the unjust.

Furthermore, our God visits us when we are in such darkness as to know nothing, see nothing, believe nothing, hope nothing; even then the Lord's mercy comes to us. Is not this tenderness? "Educate a man up to a certain point," says one, "and then we may hope that God's grace will visit him." Educate him by all means, but have hope that God may visit even those who have no education of any sort. "Follow the advance of civilization," cries one, "and do not risk your missionaries among barbarians." Not so; our marching orders are, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." The Gospel is to precede and produce civilization. Did you notice that it is said "to those that sit in darkness?" This is more than being in the dark. The man who sits in darkness does so because he feels that his case is hopeless, and therefore he forbears all further action. Those who have lost hope are lost indeed, and such the Saviour has come to save.

WHEN WE ARE IN DARKNESS;

Then it is added, "and in the shadow of death." Did you ever feel that shadow? It has a horrible influence. Chill and cold, it freezes the marrow of the bones, and stops the genial current of life in the veins. Death stands over the man, and if his hand does not smite, yet his shadow darkens joy, and chills hope, benumbing the heart, and making life itself a mode of death. The shadow of death is confusion of mind, depression of spirit, dread of the unknown, horror at the past, and terror of the future. Are any of you at this time bowing down under the shadow of death? Knowing your guilt, the Lord visits you this morning, and bids you look up. Look and live; look, and be delivered at once, even from the horrible death-shadow which now broods over you.

Is not this tender mercy? If He had not come to shine on such I should never have been saved. A Gospel for the cheerful would never have met my case; I wanted a Gospel for the despairing. I know some here who must have perished if the Gospel had only been suitable to those who are of good character, and have the beginnings of natural religion within them. As the good Samaritan did to the wounded man, "he came where he was," so did Jesus come to us in our ruin. The benefactor of the wounded did not stand and say to him, "Come here, and get on my beast, and he shall carry you to the inn." But he went to him when he was lying half dead, and therefore helpless; and he poured the oil and wine into his wounds while the poor wretch could not move an inch, nor stir hand or foot. He bound up his wounds, and then set him on his own beast, and took him to the inn. This is tender mercy; and in this fashion Jesus deals with us.

IV. Both time and strength fail me, so now I must finish with a fourth reflection from the text—Our God shows His tender mercy in that He visits us with such wonderful and —"to give light to them that sit in darkness, to guide our feet into the way of peace." One sketch must suffice. Help me as I make an outline. Imagine a caravan in the desert, which has long lost its way, and is famishing. The sun has long gone down, and the darkness has caused every one's heart to droop. All around them is a waste of sand, and an Egyptian darkness. There they must remain and die unless they can find the track. They feel themselves to be in a fearful case, for, hungry and thirsty, their soul faineth in them. They cannot even sleep for fear. Heavier and heavier the night comes down, and the damps are on the tents chilling the souls of the travellers. What is to be done? How they watch! Alas, no star comforts them! At last the watchmen cry, "The morning cometh." It breaks over the sea of sand, and, what is better, it reveals a heap which had been set up as a way-mark, and the travellers have found the track. The dayspring has saved them from swift destruction by discovering the way of peace.

Our point is this, that when the Lord Jesus Christ visits us, He actually brings light to our darkness; really leads into the way, and makes that way a way of peace to us.

PUT ALL TOGETHER,

and remember what the Lord has done for you. You did not know the way once, and all the preaching in the world would not have made you know it, if Jesus had not by His Spirit visited you as the dayspring. When you did know the way, you could not reach it of yourself; you saw it as from a distance, and could not enter upon it, but when Jesus came near, He actually guided your feet into that way. He put your feet upon a rock, and established your goings. That way, good as it was, would have been to you a way of doubt and fear and hesitation, if the Lord had not so sweetly shone upon you that your road became a way of perfect peace. Peace in our text means prosperity, plenty, rest, joy. I ask you, friends, whether you have not found it so. Since the Lord has visited you, have you not gone forth with joy, and been led forth with peace?

Well, now, the conclusion of all this is a practical matter. If the tender mercy of God has visited us, and done so much more for us than I can tell, or than you can hear, let us ourselves exhibit tender mercy in our dealings with our fellow-men. It is a wretched business for a man to call himself a Christian, and have a soul which never peeps out from between his own ribs. It is horrible to be living to be saved, living to get to Heaven, living to enjoy religion, and yet never to live to bless others, and ease the misery of a moaning world. Do you not know that it is all nonsense to regard religion as a selfish spiritual trade by which we save our own souls. It is useless to hope for peace till you know how to love. Only the way of unselfishness is the way of peace. I ask you, therefore, to think very tenderly of all poor people. These are hard times; let those who have more than they actually want be ready always to relieve distress, which is very urgent just now. All must be generous for the sake of that tender mercy which is the dayspring of our hope and life.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A JUDGE SILENCED.*

A WELL-KNOWN judge in Ohio was noted for his defence of slavery, upon the ground that the slaves knew what was best for themselves, and should be allowed to remain in the condition which admittedly brought them a degree of happiness seldom if ever attained by laborers in the North. His conversion to the opposite opinion was suddenly brought about by a runaway who had crossed the Ohio River from Kentucky, and entered the village in which our friend resided. Said the judge to the fugitive:

"What did you run away for?"

"Well, judge, 'wanted to be free.'"

"Oh! wanted to be free, did you? Bad master, I suppose?"

"Oh, no; berry good man, judge."

"You had to work too hard, then?"

"Oh, no; fair day's work."

"Well, you had not a good home?"

"Hadn't I, though! You should see my pretty cabin in Kentucky."

"Well, you didn't get enough to eat?"

"Oh, golly! Not enough to eat in Kentucky! Plenty to eat!"

The judge, somewhat annoyed: "You had a good master, plenty to eat, wasn't overworked, a good home. I don't see what on earth you wanted to run away for!"

"Well, judge, I left de situation down dar open. You kin go right down and git it."

The result was a five-dollar bill to start the unreasonable slave who had left well-being behind to become a free man.

LINCOLN AND BISMARCK.

THIS master trait of the British race shows resplendently in Lincoln, the greatest political genius of our era—greatest, judged either by the inherent qualities of the man, or by the material results of his administration. Even Bismarck's reorganization of Germany dealt with far less imposing, far less gigantic forces than those which Lincoln was called upon to control. Nor has Bismarck achieved the highest degree of political success; he has not harmonized—fused into one united whole the people he has consolidated, as Lincoln did. His weapons have been those of force alone—blood and iron his cry. Even in peace a master by brutal force alone. Lincoln was as generous, as conciliatory, as gentle in peace as he was always sad and merciful, yet ever immovable, in war. Bismarck excited the fears of the masses; Lincoln won their love. The one a rude conqueror only, the other not only that, but also the guider of the highest and best aspirations of his people. With monarchical Bismarck "might made right," with republican Lincoln "right made might." That's the difference. Hence the fame of one is to be ephemeral; that of the other immortal.

means enough upon which to live respectably. Of every American President it may be said as it was said of Pitt: "Dispensing for years the favors of the State, he lived without ostentation and died poor."

One turns from the dignified, simple life of the republican ruler to that of the nominal head of Britain, feeling that there he meets a coarser and less finely developed civilization. The parade and vulgar ostentation which surrounds at every turn the nominal ruler of the parent land is, indeed, in striking contrast. The cost to the State is as ten thousand to six hundred thousand pounds. "The entire family, mother and brother, and his cousins, and his aunts," are supported, and bands of retainers who are supposed to dignify the throne. The State processions strike an American as grotesque masquerades, and the official coaches in which royalty moves provoke the inquiry, "What circus has come to the town?" One instinctively looks inside for the clown.

THANKFUL FOR AN UNFAVORABLE DICTUM.

The last mail from China contains the melancholy intelligence of the death at Shanghai, of Mrs. S. C. Partridge of pulmonary disease. The Spirit of Missions, in the course of a notice of her life and death, says that some weeks before her death she was taken by the advice of her physician to Wuhu on the Yang-tse River. The change, however, did her no good, and she gladly returned to Shanghai to die in the midst of her work. The project of trying as a last hope of saving her life a return to the United States was mooted and discussed. The physicians, however, decided that she was too weak to be moved and that the journey would do her no good. When informed of their despairing verdict Mrs. Partridge said, in a cheerful tone, "Oh, I am so glad; for I can keep right on with my work and perhaps accomplish a great deal yet." She continued her labors until she was too weak to speak, and died on May 3d. Her husband is anxious that her friends in this country should know that "there were no indications of any trouble in Mrs. Partridge's case before we left the United States. A natural chain of events, which might have happened anywhere, culminated in pulmonary difficulties, which she was too weak to resist. She was a 'faithful soldier and servant unto her life's end.'

THE recent eruption of Mount Etna, in Sicily, which began on May 18th, was a startling phenomenon. Mount Etna comprises a group of mountains lying more than 3000 metres above the level of the sea, and bearing different names, according to their position. The eruption began at the principal crater, a mile south of the house where the Government observatory is situated. A few hours before the lava stream was visible, came premonitory warning of earthquakes and a burst of hot cinders, which were thrown as far as Messina, a distance of fully eighty miles. Twenty-four hours afterward streams of lava were seen coming out at seven points, and a day later these seven new mouths all joined the principal crater, so that red-hot lava was poured down simultaneously in a volume nearly two miles in breadth.

The rate of descent is reckoned at an average of twenty yards an hour. From time to time massive stones were cast down, together with a deluge of hot water. It was an appalling spectacle as seen from Nicolosi, a small village of some 4000 inhabitants, in a valley to the south-east of the amalgamated volcanoes. An eye-witness writes:

"I started on Saturday last from Catania in a carriage, and after two hours' journey reached Nicolosi. Here I hired a mule and a guide, and in company with a dozen other tourists I ascended as far as the Monte Rossi—the nearest prominent position from which the phenomenon could be seen with safety. A splendid sight awaited us. We found ourselves face to face with the downpour of lava. The stream was then fully three feet in depth. Within a few minutes of our arrival the lava came within so short a distance from where we were standing that we were compelled to beat a retreat. The heat was so intense that our straw hats were scorched as though we had put them in an oven. The lava shifted so that there was no hope of saving Nicolosi. The catastrophe was deemed so imminent that the authorities at Catania requisitioned every available conveyance, and carried to town all the property of the villagers which was thought worth rescuing. The scenes of distress were heart-rending. Some of the poor people, having already lost the few acres of land they owned, preferred to die where they were born rather than live on and become homeless and penniless elsewhere. An attempt was made by soldiers and firemen to cut a new road, so as to divert the stream into a fresh channel and thus avert the threatened fate of Nicolosi. After a hard day's work the lava undid all that had been done, and followed the same direction as before. At length the stream deviated to the north side, and Nicolosi was saved. On June 4th the eruption ceased, but the villagers have not yet recovered their composure, and many of them are utterly ruined."

A YOUNG city clerk, spending his Fourth of July at a little seaside village, received an unexpected lesson from a boatman. He was an inveterate smoker, and being away from the city streets where he would have been ashamed to smoke anything but a cigar, he thought he might indulge in a pipe. Taking a well-colored meerschaum from his pocket, he examined it lovingly, polished it tenderly, and, filling it with fragrant Virginia, began to smoke.

It was rather a dull place, and the smoker did not feel that he was making the best of his holiday. He wanted society, and was glad to see a boatman pull his row-boat up on the sandy beach and walk in his direction. The man might be dull and ignorant, but his company would be better than solitude.

"Fine day!" said the smoker. "Have a cigar?"

"Thank you, sir, no. I don't smoke."

"Don't suit you, eh?" queried the smoker.

"Well, no; not in one way. I like it well enough, but I've quit."

"How was that?"

"I could not afford it. You see there is not much chance of getting money down here, and one time, not long ago, I had a spell of real hard luck. I had to go in debt, and was pretty hard put to it to keep bread on the loaf anyhow. I had a good customer—a lady—or I don't know how I should have worried through. She was one of the pious sort—gave tracts and that. She knew all about me, and was a good friend to my wife. It was her talk made me quarrel with tobacco."

"Oh, you gave it up to please the ladies, did you?"

"No, sir; I gave it up to please myself. It was the lady's doing, though. She used to say, 'George, I wonder how you can smoke when times are so bad.' It didn't seem to cost much, and I said so, and, besides, it sort o' comforted me—kept me from grizzling. 'You don't know what it does cost,' says the lady. Well, next time I saw her, she'd got a tract about it. There it was figured up just how much it cost. Pretty fair, too. All the figuring in regular tables like an insurance circular. Twenty-five cents a week for one year, and five years, and ten years, and twenty. Fifty cents a week the same, and a dollar, and so on. Then there was a calculation of what the totals would buy."

"It surprised you, did it?"

"Yes; and it d'd more. It made me ashamed. I picked my line out—fifty cents a week for ten years—two hundred and sixty dollars. My, if I had only that in my pocket it would have cleared me, and given me a decent start! 'No more, George,' I said to myself; 'this day you quit!'"

"Did you have much difficulty?"

"Have you ever tried?"

"No."

"Then you can't have a notion of it. It was awful. I got so as I did not hardly know what I was doing, I wanted a smoke so bad. I carried the tract about with me and had a look at it when I was feeling bad. I had my pipe, too, and I used to take it out and say, 'Which is boss, you or I?' and that kind o' stirred my pride. I had to try all I knew, you see, for it was a hard fight. I won, and I have not had a smoke now these three years."

"If you had a fortune you would take to it again, I suppose?"

"I think not, sir. I've got to despise it. A man ought to be man enough to do without that sort of thing. Besides, it's a waste of money, and however much money I might have I would not like to waste it. If I had more than I knew what to do with, why, there's plenty of poor struggling folks, I'd be glad to help. A man who has been in a tight place himself can feel for other folks. And it really does cost a pile, does the pipe. Look here, sir; here's the tract, find your place on the map. It'll surprise you. Just think of what it would be to have that total in your hand."

The smoker took his pipe from his mouth and looked for his place as directed. He found it, and, as the boatman had predicted, he was surprised. His salary as clerk was not a large one, and he had saved nothing. Just now he was wishing he could get married, but had no money to furnish a house, and did not want to go to boarding. He saw that he had consumed in smoke a sum that would have sufficed for a modest home, and he was mortified.

"You have quite given it up?" he asked, at length.

"Yes," said the boatman. "A regular total cut off."

The Tract that Opened his Eyes.

"I guess I'll follow your example," said the clerk, and he did.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.*

The Young Student.

"DEAR BROTHER ALLAN: My school closes next Friday, after which I shall come home to remain a week. Then I shall go away to college. You remember I have expressed some dissatisfaction with the M— College, on account of its lack of scientific advantages, as well as considerable inefficiency in the faculty. I have carefully examined the catalogue of the N. S. College, and have corresponded with a student friend of mine there, and I believe that its facilities are better in every respect. So I have concluded to try it. During the winter I have been employing my leisure in pursuing certain studies, and I believe I can enter the third term of the Junior year."

"Meet me at Dover, on Saturday, at 2 P.M., with the buggy. Love to mother."

"Your brother,

"LEROY T. RANSOM."

This letter tells us something about the individual in whom we now claim an interest. He was a young man of considerable talent. Some people used the word "brilliant" in connection with his mental endowments, but as this adjective is used to qualify the talents of almost every college boy, we refrain from employing so trite a term. He was the son of a widow, his father having died when he was but eight years old. His mother was not able to furnish the money for his education, and so we find him remaining out of college for a time to earn by teaching the needful funds.

Indeed, he was a young man of good—probably more than ordinary—general information. He devoured almost everything in the way of reading that he could secure, except, of course, trashy novels. Whatever were his faults, this was not one of them. In general literature, poetry, and on the stirring questions of the day, he was pretty good authority.

But there is one thing we must tell at the start, for it was a conspicuous and fatal blemish on his character—he was an infidel. He had imbibed these sentiments by reading Hume, Voltaire, and especially the modern scientific opposers of the Christian religion. Honest? Oh, yes, entirely honest. He had in a manner been driven into scepticism, and then into infidelity against his will. He would have preferred to remain in the faith both for his own comfort and for his own interest. To abandon his religious beliefs would, as he knew, be painful to himself and would give pain to others, especially to his mother, and would cost him the friendship of many whose influence would be helpful to him if he retained it. It was as if he had been living in an old mansion, which his family had dwelt in for many generations and which he loved. But some practical man had assured him that it was unhealthy, that the walls were unsound, and that the foundations were faulty. Not being able to test the truth of these assertions for himself, he had made a superficial examination, had taken much on credit, and had finally quitted the house with reluctance and gone out into the open country without a shelter for his head. It was a pitiable condition, and there are many young men in it to-day. Perhaps the history of this one may be of service to some others. If so, the journey on which we are setting out will be profitable. Come, then, reader, with us, as we try to tell his difficulties and embarrassments, and the story of his love.

On Friday his school closed. Some tears were shed, good-bys spoken, and on Saturday he was flying on the "parallels of steel," toward the station nearest his home. Arriving at Dover, he had scarcely stepped upon the platform before a strong hand grasped his, and a hale voice said,

"Hello! old pilgrim, how are you?"

"Well, I'm nearly famished just now. But I'm well. How are you? You needn't answer, for I can see that bad health and you have not been introduced yet. How is mother?"

"Quite well."

By this time the two brothers were at the buggy.

"Ho, Bally!" said Leroy, patting the mare's neck. "Bless your soul, if you have one. You look as sleek as a sunshiny day."

After the delivery of this simile, they both leaped into the buggy and soon had left Dover far in the rear. They rode over delightful hills and along shady valleys for about five miles, when they reached their country home. It was a delightful place—such a humble home as many a great man has issued from to move the world.

Mrs. Ransom came out to the gate to meet them, her face a-smile. She looked the dear, lovable woman she was. Cheery, contented, intelligent, there was also in her face that open, clear expression from which any one would have inferred that she was a good woman. There could not be an uneasy, accusing conscience behind that face. It was lighted up, too, at this moment with pleasure at the sight of her son, and glowed with the love and admiration that a widow cannot but feel in her boy, when he is not wholly unworthy of her confidence.

"Ah, mother, mine!" said Leroy, jumping from the buggy and taking her in his arms and kissing her energetically and affectionately. "'Tis good to see you again. I've hungered for the sight of your dear face. How are you? Well and strong, eh?"

"Yes, dear boy, thank God," said the old lady, devoutly. "It is only when I look at you two great lads that I see how old I must be. I don't feel old yet. The Lord has been very good to me. And how are you?"

"I'm in splendid health, but nearly famished. Have you any pie in the cupboard, mother?"

"Bless you, yes; and supper's already on the table, and there is pie there and in the cupboard, too, and you may eat until you can't get around any more."

"Thank you, mother; you don't know what a blessed thing it is to get home where you can do as you please, especially in regard to stomachables."

The days passed pleasantly. Leroy busied himself getting ready for college, visiting old friends, and now and then lending a helping hand to his brother in his spring work.

At last the time came for his departure. Leroy stood at the gate as his mother took his hand to say good-by.

"Leroy, put your trust in God," said his mother. "You don't know how soon death might come, and what then?" Poor, simple-hearted woman to fear death thus, and make her religion lie so much in her emotional nature. And yet, philosophers, ye who would bring everything through the crucible of reason, might there not be sound sense in her argument? Death might come—what then?

"Oh, mother," he replied lightly, "I'm not afraid of death coming; and, if it does come, it will come, and that's the end of it."

"How can you say so, Leroy? You know you are afraid of death. They tell me you are becoming an infidel. You know I can't argue with you, for I don't understand half of these learned things you talk about; but I believe one thing: It is better to be at peace with God, and be happy, than to be ever so learned and have no rest or hope. Do promise me, Leroy, that you will not oppose the Bible," she pleaded. "We want to be an unbroken family in eternity. Some have gone already, and we ought to follow them." And her tears fell fast.

Leroy was tender-hearted, and the fountains broke loose at the mention of the departed loved ones, and he wept with his mother; but against conviction he steeled his heart, and said,

"Mother, I will do everything I can to get the truth. I will reason this thing through and through until I get out into the light."

Then he said, "Good-by," and she said, "Good-by; God bless you," and he jumped into the buggy with his brother Allan. As they drove along, the tears fell silently down Leroy's cheeks. Soon he dried them and resumed his wonted gaiety. But at last he said,

"Mother is troubling herself about me. I wish she wouldn't talk to me about religion, and especially that she wouldn't try to rouse my feelings. I am willing to talk and argue this question with anybody but her. She always cries and refers so touchingly to heaven and all, that it completely unmans me. I don't intend to fight this out on emotional grounds, but by reason. It seems to me at any rate that religion is such a sentimental institution."

Allan mused awhile seriously as if some subject were powerfully stirring his mind, and at last remarked,

"And yet, Lee, mother may be right."

"Right, Allan, right!" exclaimed Leroy. "How can she be right when she has studied and investigated the subject so little, and knows nothing about the unanswerable scientific objections to the Bible, while I, who have examined this matter with patient study, do not believe, cannot believe?"

"Ah, Leroy, there are some things above reason, or at least that don't come within the reach of mere unaided reason. But I can't argue that question with you any more than can our mother, because I, too, have not investigated the difficulties. But I am going to make a confession to you. Do you want to hear it?"

"Yes, go ahead, brother, mine."

"Well, of course you know that I united with the church last winter. Now, let me give you some actual facts of experience, and see what your philosophy will do with them. The Christian people at W— held a series of meetings. They had an earnest and intelligent preacher, who, by the way, has, I think, been over the ground you speak of so much, and might give you some light on the subject."

Leroy winced under this remark, for we must confess that he had a good share of conceit, and the mere suggestion of the idea that a village preacher might enlighten him on any point was humiliating and hurtful to his self-esteem. So he said somewhat testily:

"These preachers are generally an uneducated set, and are the last persons I would go to for help on any subject."

"You, perhaps, would change your opinion," rejoined Allan, "if you were better acquainted with them. At least, Mr. Danton, the minister I refer to, is an educated man. But let that go. I wish to tell you of my experience."

"Go on, then."

"Well, quite a number of persons manifested a serious purpose to become Christians under the earnest preaching of the Gospel. In a few days I, myself, became convinced that I ought to change my course of life. My consciousness of sin became very vivid, for it seemed that every word from the pulpit was an arrow aimed at my heart. I could not restrain the tears. Mr. Danton noticed my seriousness, and inquired concerning my attitude toward God. I told him candidly, as near as I could, the state of my feelings. I was not frightened, but I felt that I had all my life sinned against One who had been very kind to me, and I wanted forgiveness."

"How could you feel that way, Allan, when you did not know whether such a Being exists or not?" queried the sceptical Leroy.

"Never mind about that now," Allan replied. "To be brief, this state of mind continued for a few days. At last, one night as I was returning home across the fields alone, my heart became heavy beyond endurance. The night was very bright, but my mind was in utter darkness. The burden seemed to weigh me down. I sank to my knees, and said, 'O God, I cannot find the way myself; show me the way, for Christ's sake!'"

"After a short time engaged in prayer, the burden was removed from my heart, like the burden of Bunyan's pilgrim when he came to the cross. I leaped to my feet a changed man. The distress, the horrible fear, the sense of alienation from God were entirely gone. I was bright, happy, and full of joy. I strode home through those fields a different being from the one who commenced the journey from the church."

"And now comes the problem. The feeling did not pass away. I was changed every way. I felt kindly to every one. My heart was opened so that I loved all about me. I had two or three quarrels on hand at the time, and I could not rest until I was reconciled to those who were feeling bad to me. I don't know that I was in the wrong. I am sure I was not in one case. But I did not care about that. I went and hunted the young fellow up and I put my hand on his shoulder, to his amazement, for we had parted in anger and had not spoken for months, and I said, 'Come, old man, let us be friends; if I've hurt your feelings I apologize,' and we shook hands on it. I settled all the quarrels right off that day. I am pretty hot-tempered, as you know, but I have not had any quarrel since. I couldn't; that is a fact. I feel to love everybody and to be on good terms all around. Now, Lee, I want to ask you what did that? It's a phenomenon which I fancy your philosophers cannot explain."

"Allan, I do not wish to disturb your peace of mind. The experience might be explained on the ground of mental action and reaction. A study of the science of mind might solve the problem without any resort to a supernatural agency." Thus the sceptic argued.

"It is a little hard for me to follow you; but I should rather say that the soul is so constituted by the Creator that the plan of salvation fits and satisfies it," answered Allan.

"Maybe, maybe, Allan; I admit that it is all dark."

"It is not dark at all, my brother. God's mind simply operates upon our minds through the channels of truth."

Leroy hesitated for a time.

"Truth?" he exclaimed. "Truth is in science, in all the realms of knowledge."

"But there is a realm of spiritual knowledge," replied the younger brother, "that you ought not to ignore or despise."

"Well, Allan, do you dip into that spiritual knowledge now? I have made a specialty of metaphysical studies, and I should be glad to know your line of investigation."

"I doubt," said Allan, quietly, "whether the knowledge I have gained comes into the category of metaphysics. My mind doesn't run off into speculation. I am just trying to live the life God wants me to live. I am trying to find that out by reading the Bible and by asking Him to show it me. It is just quiet, practical effort. I distrust my own reason. When I am in a difficulty, and, of course, they come now as well as before, I try to get hold of the principle of the case. I ask God to show it me and I come out right."

"Do you get the principle in answer to your prayer?" Leroy asked, almost sneeringly.

"No; not always. And that is almost laughable. The difficulty seems to clear itself away. I have been amazed, sometimes, at my experience. I have made elaborate preparations for meeting it, have thought how I would act in certain phases of it, what I would say and do if it took this or that turn, and when I have gone out armed, as it were, for the conflict, there has been no difficulty, no opponent at all. The whole thing has vanished."

"In other words you made a mountain out of a molehill, and did not find out your mistake until you got close to it."

"No, it was not that," said Allan, seriously. "You may laugh, Lee, but the explanation is that God clears the way. The troubles were formidable enough as you would have said had I been near to you to consult you, but God removed them."

"Of course," said Leroy, "it is open to you to account for it in that way, but it is very unphilosophical. Instead of looking to the supernatural for an explanation I should expect to find it in the natural. Centuries ago people who saw an eclipse of the sun accounted for it by the action of their gods. We know what causes it and when it will come. In nature there is no need to introduce a Creator to explain its phenomena. Every natural effect is the result of a natural cause. We do not yet know them all, but our knowledge is growing, and we are far in advance of our fathers. Every step tends to the exclusion of God from the universe. The natural forces are sufficient without Him. It is so in the mental universe. It is the easiest solution for every problem to say 'God did it,' but it is, excuse my saying so, Allan, only the ignorant and stupid who solve difficulties in that way. You should be more practical."

"Oh, I am practical. I told you so. My life is intensely practical, and useful, too, I hope. I take a greater interest in the welfare of others; I am not so selfish. I labor now to instruct people and help them to become better. Do infidels work for the good of their fellow-men in a self-sacrificing way? Are they, as a class, doing anything, besides talking, to make the people better?"

"But here we are at the depot," Allan exclaimed, checking himself. "The train is almost ready to start. Get your ticket, quick, Leroy. And now good-by, big brother."

"Good-by, Allan. Write often."

And he was just able to enter the coach before the train went whirling away.

JESUS HONORED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 1, John 12: 1-16. Golden Text, Ps. 72: 17.

The Effects of the Miracle—Some Unconvinced—The Council Called—A Question of Policy—The Absorbing Topic—Mary's Significant Tribute—Blamed for Wasting the Ointment—Christ's Prediction—The Attraction at Bethany—The Jealousy of the Priests—An Exception to Christ's Habit—The Triumphs of Jesus.

THE raising of Lazarus produced two different results. Many of those who before had been only half persuaded of His Messiahship, now believed on Jesus. But His own words "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead" (Luke 16: 31), were strikingly fulfilled in some of the Jews, who, having come to comfort Martha and Mary, had been witnesses of the raising of their brother. Instead of becoming His disciples, they made it their business to go to the chief priests and tell them what had been done, and they, instead of proclaiming everywhere that He who had power over death and hell was in their very midst, obstinately determined that He was not the Christ, and gathered a council to consult what should be done with Him. Oh why did they not take counsel of the Word of God, the Old Testament Scriptures, to find out who He was, and whether His claim to be the Messiah was just or not? Why did they not ask, "Who is this to whom death itself is subject?" Because he did not of what the Messiah should be, they would not believe on Him. There was in Him nothing with which they had fellowship; they were of the world; He was not of the world, and thus all He was and all He did, silently, but surely, condemned them. They, the Pharisees, held to a future state as part of their boasted creed, but "the powers of the world to come" (Heb. 6: 5) were practically unknown to them. They were carnal and walked as men (1 Cor. 3: 3), and as the life and works of Jesus did not form part of their narrow idea of Messiahship, they condemned them as diabolical. Not one of them could deny that the works of Jesus were supernatural, but they would not acknowledge that they were of God. Their reasoning was very shallow, they did not so much as raise the question whether Jesus were the Messiah or no. They only said, "What do we? for this Man doeth many miracles. If we let Him thus alone, all men will believe on Him, and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." And where was God in their counsels? Was there no appeal to Him? No, not any, and so the

of that day, for a cause professedly political, without so much as a pretence of prayer for God's guidance, agreed that they would put Jesus, the Son of God, to death. Caiaphas, the high priest, prophesied that one man should die for the people; but he knew not what he said, and, no doubt this prophecy strengthened the hand of Jesus' enemies.

The hour of Jesus' greatest honor, and the hour of His deepest humiliation both approached as the days of the Passover, that Passover of Passovers, drew near. Jesus was in retirement with the disciples, and as Jerusalem began to fill with country people from Galilee, Samaria, and the more distant parts of Judæa, the one name in every mouth was that of Jesus. Men did not ask whether King Herod was going to take part in the feast, but every one asked if Jesus would be there.

The chief priests and Pharisees had not been idle, they were determined that, this time, He should not escape them, and an order had gone forth, and was, no doubt, widely published, that, "if any man knew where He was he should shew it, that they might take Him." But our beloved Lord knew that He was not yet delivered into the hands of men, and six days before the Passover, unhindered by all the plots which were brewing against Him, Jesus came to Bethany where Lazarus was, and the Resurrection and the Life sat at table with the man whom He had raised from the dead, in the house of a healed leper, called Simon. Martha was busy, as usual, in serving, Mary was occupied, as usual, with Jesus Himself; Martha was following out her thoughts of devotion, Mary was expressing in action how she had

TAKEN IN HIS THOUGHTS.

She took "a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." This was more to Jesus than all the service of Martha. Mary had been blamed by her sister (Luke 10: 40), and now she was blamed by Judas Iscariot, and by the other disciples, who were probably set on by him (Matt. 26: 8). Judas argued, "Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence and given to the poor?" But Judas's zeal for the poor was but a cloak for his covetousness. Judas "was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein." The blame of Martha had been the occasion for Jesus to say "one thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her" (Luke 10: 42). The blame of Judas led to His saying, "Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on Me. For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but Me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint My body to the burying. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever this Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her" (Mark 14: 6-9). Why should there be so high a commendation of this simple action of Mary's? It was the token that a sinner recognized her Saviour, and it was the first testimony of man to a recognition of the death of Jesus. Mary in this quiet act of faith and devotion put more honor upon Jesus than did the multitude who cried, "Hosanna to the Son of David," for she shewed by it an APPRECIATION OF HIS REDEMPTION WORK.

The poor are always at hand to be cared for, but only once in the history of the world could Jesus be anointed for His burying, and Mary seized the opportunity.

Jesus was not left in quiet retirement while in Bethany. The tidings of Lazarus having been raised from the dead had got abroad, and it was soon known in Jerusalem that Jesus was in Bethany, and so the people came out there in crowds to see both Jesus and Lazarus. It was impossible it should be otherwise. A man who had been four days subject to corruption, raised from the dead, this was something which cast into the shade the wonders of old time. In Moses's time, the firstborn of a nation were simultaneously slain; in the time of Hezekiah, Sennacherib's army lay dead around the walls of Jerusalem, slain by the sword of the Lord; and Elijah and Elisha were both used of God in the raising of the dead a few hours after death.

* The prediction is fulfilled, for this is one of the few incidents which every one of the four Evangelists is careful to mention.

But the raising of Lazarus was something beyond all the history of the past or the experience of the present, and the curious and the scientific, the gossip and the earnest inquirer alike turned their steps toward Bethany. This maddened the chief priests. In measure as the power of Jesus became more manifest, their power and influence among the people declined; and this must be maintained at any cost. Priestcraft is cruel and jealous. They "consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death, because that by reason of him, many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus." Jesus was to die because He

HEALED THE SICK AND RAISED THE DEAD.

Lazarus was to die because he had been raised from the dead by Jesus. If Caiaphas could have done what Jesus did, how it would have been blazoned abroad! But the chief priests knew nothing personally of the power of God.

The people, however, could not be restrained. Jesus had always avoided popularity; He received not honor from men. But there were just now in Jerusalem multitudes from all over the land who had been blessed by Him, and for once He permitted them to let out their hearts in an acknowledgment of Him. It was the day after His anointing at Bethany. He was going into Jerusalem, and sent His disciples to the owner of an ass's colt, with the simple message, "The Lord hath need of him." On His way, the multitudes who were coming out from Jerusalem, met Him, and gave Him an ovation. It was one which would have brought a smile to the faces of the great ones of this world. Neither horses nor chariots were there, neither gorgeous robes nor jewelry, no banners other than the branches of palm-trees, and, instead of costly carpets, there were the outer garments of His followers. This was all, but this was acceptable to Jesus. What made Jesus great? Nothing which this world could give. His greatness was in this hour of His triumph, invisible to man. He was "despised and rejected of men" yet this was He who raised the dead, healed the sick, stilled the storm, fed the multitude! And the triumphs of Jesus in the world are always of this kind. When He has full sway in a heart, there is nothing very striking except

THE PRESENCE OF JESUS.

I remember an old minister, called Peter Turner. There was nothing very learned or very eloquent in his preaching, but it always brought one into the presence of God; his prayers were always simple, there was nothing in them except that they always left one face to face with God; his features were not striking, but his face reminded one of Jesus, and he could not enter a room without the sweet sunshine of Jesus coming with him. In this dear man's life Jesus triumphed.

Who would have thought, except they knew the Scriptures well, that a prophecy was being fulfilled in this entry of Jesus into Jerusalem? "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: He is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass" (Zech. 9: 9). True, a few days later, the multitude were shouting, "Crucify Him, crucify Him;" but, among them were those who were being prepared to receive the Holy Ghost and to go out to witness for Jesus to the very ends of the earth.

THE LORD OUR BURDEN-BEARER.

"Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."—Ps. lv. 22.

Christian, when thy way seems darkest,
And thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God thy Father hast'ning,
Tell thy sorrows unto Him.
Not to human ear confiding
Thy sad tale of grief or care,
But before thy Father hast'ning,
Pour out all thy sorrows there.

Sympathy of friends may cheer thee
When the fierce, wild storm is past;
But God only can console thee
When it breaks upon thee first
Go with words or tears of silence,
Only lay them at His feet;
Thou shalt prove how great His pity,
And His tenderness how sweet.

Think, too, thy divine Redeemer
Knew as thou canst never know
All the deepest depth of suffering—
All the weight of human woe;
And, though now in glory seated,
He can hear thy feeblest cry—
Even hear the stifled sighing
Of thy dumb heart's agony.

All thy griefs by Him are ordered,
Needful is each one for thee;
All thy tears by Him are counted,
One too much there cannot be;
And if, whilst they fall so quickly,
Thou canst own His way is right,
Then each bitter tear of anguish
Precious is in Jesus' sight.

Far too well thy Saviour loves thee
To allow thy life to be
One long, calm, unbroken summer—
One untroubled, stormless sea.
He would have thee fondly nestling
Closer to His loving breast;
He would have that world seem brighter
Where alone is perfect rest.

Though His wise and loving purpose
Clearly now thou may'st not see,
Still believe, with faith unshaken,
All shall work for good to thee.
Therefore, when thy way seems darkest,
And thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God thy Father hast'ning,
Tell thy sorrows unto Him.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."
This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.

This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

This

Is the offer that calls forth such responses: WASHINGTON IRVING'S "The Sketch Book" and "Knickerbocker's History of New York," are just published in style worthy of this most widely celebrated and universally honored of American authors. The two books together form one of the nine volumes of his works just issued. The type is large, leaded, beautiful; the two volumes bound in one comprise 606 pages; the binding is half Morocco, marbled edges. The only other edition in the market that at all compares with this or rivals it, is advertised by the publisher at $3.00 per volume.

MY PRICE when sold in sets of nine volumes, is $8.00, a little less than $1.00 per volume. I propose to offer this single specimen volume until September 1, 1886, for the price (if it can be called a price) of 50 cents, by mail, post-paid.

If you want to complete your set after you have received this volume you can do so by paying the additional price for the set.

A BOOK FOR THE FIRESIDE.

By Rev. J. MARSHALL LANG, D.D., of Barony Parish Church, Glasgow.

The Evangelist, of New York, says: "We should hardly know where to find another book so replete with profitable suggestions for a Christian family as this volume."

The N. Y. Observer says: "These words are Scriptural, simple, strong, personal, practical, appealing to the domestic sentiments and the highest instincts. They are the words of one who knows the mind of God in his word, and the need of the human heart in the labor of the ministry."

The Congregationalist says: "Practical, earnest and devout, touching lightly but effectively almost every point which a good man thinks of naturally when he tries to teach others how to gain and keep the spirit of Heaven in the homes of earth."

THE COMTE DE PARIS.

M. GRÉVY, PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

PRINCE VICTOR NAPOLEON.

CLAREMONT, the Residence of the COMTE DE PARIS—The Comte as McClellan's Aide-de-Camp.

THE EXPULSION OF THE FRENCH PRINCES.

MUCH has been said about the petty spite of the French Republic in exiling the princes who possess claims to the crown. There ought to be less sympathy in America than there is with such talk. We should give the leaders of the French Republic credit for knowing the circumstances of their case better than we do. In this country we should smile at the idea of any danger menacing our free institutions from the presence, in our midst, of a whole gang of kings and princes. But in France it is different. She is surrounded by countries governed by men who have a dread of republicanism, who hate the name of it, and who would be willing openly or secretly to aid any man who could put an end to it. Besides, the aristocracy of France, and the wealthy classes who have a longing for titles, would like to have a king or emperor to hold a court. So that within and without her borders France sees the existence of

THE REPUBLIC MENACED.

It is natural that when the Republic is fighting for its existence it should take extreme measures for its safety—measures which it may be reluctant to take, and which it would not take if, as in our own favored land, free institutions were strong enough to despise danger.

While we thus sympathize with the Republican leaders in the object they had in view—the perpetuation of Republican institutions—and applaud the patriotic motive which doubtless animated them, it is legitimate to doubt whether they have acted wisely. The method they have adopted for the defence of the Republic may be ill-chosen. It is possible that the princes will be more dangerous out of France than in it. They will now be beyond the control of the Government, and may plot with greater ease and safety than they could have done in France. They will also enjoy an accession of sympathy which, in France as elsewhere, is evoked toward men who are harshly treated. They will be regarded as martyrs, and people who would have been indifferent to them and their claims under other circumstances, may now feel more kindly toward them. Doubtless the statesmen who have advocated the expulsion of the princes recognized this danger and gave it due consideration in reaching a decision. Their position was a difficult one, and they are entitled to the sympathy of all the citizens of this sister Republic in their efforts to protect their Government, even if our judgment does not altogether indorse the mode of defence they have chosen.

THE COMTE DE PARIS.

The House of Orleans—His Ancestor Egalité—Birth and Early Life—Abdication of his Grandfather—His Mother's Character—Visit to America in 1861—Enters the Army—McClellan's Estimate of Him—Volunteers in the Franco-German War—Exile Revoked—Marriage of His Daughter—The Second Exile.

THE chief of the exiles, and the man whose virtues and generally estimable character render him the most dangerous of the foes of the French Republic, is Louis Albert Philippe D'Orleans Comte de Paris, whose portrait appears on the first page. He is the son of the late Duc D'Orleans, and grandson of the late Louis-Philippe, who reigned as King of the French from 1830 to 1848, when he abdicated. Thus the Comte de Paris is the head of the younger branch of which ruled the country for more than two centuries. King Louis-Philippe was the son of that Philippe nicknamed "Philip Equality," who in the revolution of 1789 voted in his place in the National Convention for the condemnation and execution of the king, his relative, and by so doing earned the hatred of all Royalists as a traitor to his order. The Comte de Paris is therefore the great-grandson of a man who made himself conspicuous in history as an extreme Republican, who carried his hatred of kings to the extremity of regicide. It was a fresh offence to the Bourbon family when Louis-Philippe, in 1830, mounted the throne that belonged to Charles X., and it was not until a few months ago that a reconciliation was effected between the two branches of the family. Then, when the Comte de Chambord, the head of the elder house and the grandson and direct heir of Charles X., was dying childless and the long line was becoming extinct, he sent for the Comte de Paris, the head of the hated House of Orleans, and made him his heir. He thus became the recognized representative of royalty in France, and united in his own person the claims of the Bourbons and Orleanists to the throne.

The Comte de Paris was born August 24th, 1838, and is therefore now nearly forty-eight years old. As the

he was regarded as the hope of the family and was treated with the utmost consideration. Reared in a palace, and expecting one day to be ruler of France, his childhood was a time of luxury and magnificence. All that was roughly ended in the convulsion of 1848, when he was ten years of age, and he accompanied his family into exile. The death of his father prior to the Revolution, and his grandfather two years afterward left him, at twelve years of age, the head of the House of Orleans. He was happy in the character of his mother, who devoted herself wholly to the education and training of himself and his brother, the Duc de Chartres. She was a staid, intelligent, German princess—a Lutheran, quiet and serious of disposition, and a model mother. Under her care the comte grew up a studious, well-informed youth, without the vicious habits which are often formed by royal persons. They lived at Claremont, in England, in the mansion a picture of which appears on the first page. The mother died there in 1858, leaving her two sons to the care of their uncle, the Prince de Joinville.

IN AMERICA

the young men and their uncle have many friends. They came here in 1861 and took a deep interest in the great struggle then going on. The young men were authorized by President Lincoln to join the army as aides-de-camp without pay. They were attached to General McClellan's staff, and in that capacity won the full confidence, respect, and regard of their commander and their comrades. Of the Comte de Paris especially, General McClellan always spoke in the highest terms. "At the battle of Gaines's Mill," says the general, "where I saw him under fire (see illustration on first page), he carried himself with perfect self-possession, and displayed courage of such an unassuming character that I was much impressed by his bearing. It was that of an earnest, gallant, God-fearing man in a moment of trial."

In another place General McClellan said: "In the dull routine of office work, in the intelligent analysis of reports in regard to the number and position of the enemy, in the labor of organizing the Army of the Potomac, in long and fatiguing rides with his general, whether through the widely extended camps around Washington, or from column to column in the field, in accompanying advanced guards and cavalry detachments, in carrying orders by day and night, in storm and rain (see illustration on first page), in the performance of his duties on great battlefields, he was excelled by none in the alacrity, tact, courage, and intelligence with which his work was done."

In 1862 at the close of the seven days' battles, and when an immediate attack on Richmond was declared improbable that the comte and his brother and uncle yielded to the urgent appeals of friends in Europe and resigned from the army. They left carrying with them the regard and good feeling of all who had been brought in contact with them. On his return to Europe the comte undertook the preparation of "A History of the Civil War" which is one of the standard works on the subject. It displays considerable literary ability as well as imparality and soundness of judgment. He has published several other works of great merit, notably one on "The Trades-Unions of England."

THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR

of 1870 deeply stirred the comte's patriotism. He wrote offering his services in the French Army, and begged that he might be permitted to serve in any capacity. His application was curtly refused, but in 1871 the National Convention revoked the decree of banishment and permitted him to reside in France. He settled at the Château d'Eu, on the coast of Normandy, not far from Dieppe.

Probably the real, though not the ostensible, cause of the sudden outbreak of Republican antipathy to the Comte de Paris was a family celebration which took place recently. His eldest daughter, Princess Marie Amélie d'Orleans was married to the heir of the King of Portugal, and the comte with very natural feeling invited his friends to the wedding. When the Republicans read the names of the guests and noticed that the ministers in France of foreign countries attended the ceremony as if it had been the wedding of a member of the reigning family, they took alarm. The guests, too, returned with more pronounced and ostentatious loyalty, and uttered ominous words about what might be expected soon. The result was the enactment of the law expelling the princes, which passed on June 22d. There was no alternative but prompt obedience, and two days later the comte was again on English soil.

The Comte de Paris on May 30th, 1864, married his cousin, Princess Marie-Isabelle-Françoise, the daughter of his father's brother, the Duc de Montpensier. His eldest son, Prince Louis-Philippe Robert, is seventeen years of age.

M. JULES GREVY,

President of the French Republic.

THE quiet, unassuming gentleman who is now enjoying his second term of the Presidency was born at Mont St. Vaudrey, in the Province of the Jura, on August 15th, 1813. He is therefore now nearly seventy-three years of age. He studied at the College of Poligny, but when the Revolution of 1830 broke out he was a student in Paris. Although he was only seventeen years of age he took part in the fighting on the insurgents' side, and was one of a party that captured the Babylone Barracks in the city. He appears to have escaped any serious consequences of his conduct, and after his three days of fighting he quietly returned to his studies.

After the Revolution of 1848, which drove Louis-Philippe from power, M. Grévy was appointed Prefect of the Provisional Government of his native place. In his assuming this office the inhabitants were alarmed by his reputation for radicalism, but in a short time they gave him their confidence and elected him as their representative in the Assembly, and continued to do so with overwhelming majorities at each succeeding election. His keen insight into character led him to mistrust the aims of Louis Napoleon when the latter assumed the Presidency of the Republic of France in 1848. He endeavored to curtail the powers entrusted to him, and when later events justified his foresight the people remembered his warning.

His objections to the policy of Louis Napoleon brought him into trouble when the latter assumed the government as Emperor in 1851. As a suspected person M. Grévy was arrested, and for three weeks lodged in the State prison at Mazas, of which Napoleon himself had once been an occupant. On his release he was prohibited from becoming a candidate at the elections which were then about to be held. It was not until the amnesty of 1869 that he could hold office, when he was again enthusiastically returned as member for the Jura.

In the reconstruction days after the Franco-German War he was an ardent supporter of M. Thiers. He was elected President of the National Assembly and continued to hold the office until 1873. He was re-elected in 1877 but resigned in 1879 to assume the duties of President of the Republic. At the conclusion of his seven years' term in December last he was re-elected for another seven years.

PRINCE VICTOR NAPOLEON.

THE decree of expulsion passed on June 22d was intended to apply to the representatives of Imperialism as well as to those of Royalty. Accordingly, Prince Jerome Napoleon and his two sons, Prince Victor and Prince Louis, have, like the Comte de Paris, gone into exile. Prince Jerome, better known as Plon-Plon, is a cousin of the late Emperor Napoleon III., who before the birth of his own son designated him heir to the throne. The birth of the Prince Imperial, however, put an end to his pretensions for the time, but they revived when that young man was killed by the Zulus on June 1st, 1879. He is now by hereditary right the heir to the Napoleonic traditions, and it may be assumed that should the French people become so demented as to desire a Napoleon to sit on the throne of France Prince Jerome Napoleon would be the man chosen, as he is certainly the head of the family.

Prince Victor, however, has been placed in the anomalous position of superseding his own father, and it is upon him rather than his father that the hopes of the Bonapartists are fixed. He is twenty-four years of age, having been born on July 18th, 1862. But little is known of him and that little is unfavorable. Scandal has been busy with his name, and, rightly or wrongly, he has a most unenviable reputation. The vices which have made his father's name a by-word through Europe are said to characterize the son. European correspondents of American journals describe him as stooping to conduct alike atrociously wicked and contemptibly mean, and recount acts which, if they are true, prove him to be unfit for decent society.

Prince Victor's position as a rival of his father is due to the fact that the late Prince Imperial made him his heir in a boyish will, which was opened after his death in Zululand. The motive of the Prince Imperial is easily understood. Prince Jerome Napoleon was regarded by the Empress Eugénie with feelings of abhorrence. He was her enemy, and she felt for him the loathing which is felt by every pure woman for a man of vicious life, to which, in her case, was added the horror of a devout Catholic at a blatant and coarse-minded infidel. The Prince Imperial, doubtless, shared in some degree his mother's views, and, with the arrogance that characterizes the Imperial mind, supposed that all he had to do to reverse the order of nature was to issue his edict in his will. Prince Jerome and his son, however, agreed to disregard the Prince Imperial's arrangement, and Prince Victor publicly announced his allegiance to his father. Since that time there has been a quarrel between them, and the father has of late suspected the son of intriguing against him.

In forming an estimate of Prince Victor's character it is only just to remember that his circumstances have been peculiarly unfavorable for the development of virtue. In his childhood he was deprived of his mother's care. The Princess Clotilde, to whom, for reasons of state, Prince Jerome was married, was unable to endure the affronts of her husband, and shortly after the birth of her second son she quitted his home forever. She went to reside at the Palace of Moncalieri, near Turin, which was left to her by her father, King Victor Emmanuel. She has since spent her time wholly in the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, and in ministering with her own hands to the wants of the poor around her. Meanwhile her sons were left to their father's care, and were brought up under the influence of his infidel teaching and his vicious example. We cannot expect good of the son of a man whose character is so vile that it lends confirmation to the opinion which many have formed, on other grounds, that he is the Antichrist of prophecy.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Saved Woman's Regret.—At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Cumming said: "It was only a few weeks ago that I had the joy of seeing a woman being brought to Christ. After she had accepted Him as her personal Saviour she said, 'Oh, that I had given myself up to Christ, when I was quite a little girl.' Yes, had she done that, many sorrowful days would have been saved her, and also the evil influence which must have gone from her, which could not fail to have done harm to others, and must still be doing harm."

Dan's Answer to the Roll Call.—"I Recollect an old man who had fallen in the battle. A comrade was passing by unheeding, when he heard the old man say: 'Here, here.' 'What is it, man?' asked the comrade, bending over him. 'They are calling the roll in heaven, and I am only answering to my name,' responded Dan. After a few moments he again said: 'Here,' and his spirit took its flight from that battlefield into the presence of Him under whom he had long fought as the Great Captain of salvation. Oh, friends, are you ready to answer when your name shall be called from the roll in heaven? Take heed that you are not missing in that great day when the Lord shall gather His own together, and shall separate the sheep from the goats."

A Military Deserter.—Mr. Robertson said: "Beware of the danger of backsliding; how easy it is to go farther and farther astray when once a step is taken in the wrong direction. I knew a military officer who had been led to Christ, and continued in His service for a number of years, but he gradually turned back. At length, he took to drinking heavily and often, and was soon dismissed from his post. He then grew more careless than ever, and recklessly spent what money he had until he and his family were destitute of every comfort, and I have known of him getting money several times from his friends to keep them from starvation. He has again come to the Lord, but what a loss he has sustained by straying from His side, and what harm he has done. Oh, that Christians would fully realize the great necessity of keeping close to the Divine Master."

A Press Correspondent's Anxiety.—Mr. McDonald narrated the following incident: "A man came into my evangelist meeting one night, and I asked him, 'Were you in the meeting last night?' for I thought I had seen him the previous evening with a very troubled expression on his face, as if some heavy weight of black care had settled there. 'Yes, sir, I was,' he said, very quietly. 'Are you a Christian?' I asked. 'No, I am not,' was the reply, given in a mournful tone; and then he told me this story. He said: 'Some time ago I was correspondent to a newspaper in London, and I went to a Gospel meeting, and heard something there which deeply convicted me of sin; and since then so intense has become my anxiety that I had to give up my post, and have not been able to do anything since.' That night as we talked together the Holy Spirit clearly revealed Jesus Christ to him as the only source of forgiveness and true peace and happiness."

A Deceitful Peddler.—Mr. Love Observed: "Some time ago I was travelling along a country road when I saw before me a woman who was evidently a peddler. She came to a spot where the road divided into two lanes; one leading to a farm, and the other to a gentleman's castle. She stood at the junction and seemed uncertain as to which way she should take, and then in a superstitious manner she threw up her stick. She repeated this again and again, until she had done it no fewer than twelve times, and then she lifted her stick and walked on toward the farm. I thought she was working my divination, and when I got to the farm I spoke to her. 'What made you hesitate at the dividing of the road as you came along?' And she replied, 'Whenever I come to a place where the road divides, I always stand for a moment and ask the Lord to guide me as to which way I should take.' 'But what was the meaning of throwing up the stick?' I asked. 'That is the sign by which I am to know the Lord's mind; I throw up the stick, and whichever road the head of the stick points to, I know that is the way I must go.' 'But if you take that as a sign from the Lord, for what purpose did you throw it up so often?' 'Because,' said the old woman, 'the head of the stick would not fall the way I wanted it until I had thrown it up so often.' I learned a lesson from that peddler which shall serve me until my dying day, namely, never to trifle or practise deceit with the Almighty under the pretence of prayer."

Can Dead Things Grow?—Mr. R. B. Stewart related the following: "I was once asked to speak in a little country place, and chose for my subject, 'A soul without Christ is dead.' On our way home that night a minister, who had been a fellow-student of mine, said to me: 'Do you know that I do not believe what you were saying to-day.' 'Indeed,' I said, 'what is it you do not believe?' 'I do not believe that a soul must be either dead or alive.' 'And what is your belief?' 'Well, a soul, in whatever condition, must be continually growing.' 'And did you ever see a dead thing growing?' 'Ah, no, dear friends, he could not say that he had. We must be either dead in our sins or alive through Jesus Christ our Lord. And you hath He quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins. But it is a blessed thought, that if we are once part and parcel of Christ, our communion may be broken, but our union can never be. He gives unto us eternal life.'"

A Wrong Confessed and Forgiveness.—A Devoted evangelist observed: "A gentleman came to my house the other night, and asked if he might have an interview. But I said, 'No, not now, for I am going out to a meeting, and will not be back until half-past ten.' When I came home he was waiting for me, and he said, 'I have come to tell you that I have wronged you.' 'Wronged me,' I replied; 'In what way?' 'I knew nothing of it.' After hearing his story, I told him that I freely forgave him for all he had done, and then he went on to tell me how much he had wronged God. 'Ask His forgiveness as you asked mine,' I said. 'But I do not see how I am to be forgiven,' he said. 'Do you mean to say that you believe that I have forgiven you, and you do not believe that the Lord will? Is God less forgiving than I?' 'No; I do not mean that.' 'Then ask Him as you asked me.' He did ask and received forgiveness of all his sins from Him who rejoices to see repenting sinners come to Him."

An Untrusting Wife.—The Rev. Mr. Sloan said: "Suppose a gentleman got married and took his young wife to live in a beautiful mansion, and lavished all sorts of kindnesses upon her. She was pleased with her husband's attention and devotion, for he withheld nothing from her; but one day she said to him, 'You have been very kind to me since we were married; everything have you given me that a wife could desire; but there is just one thing, I am almost afraid to speak of it; but it has given me unrest, and raised a feeling of uneasiness in my soul. When I look at you, you have a strange expression on your face which has almost settled there, and for which I cannot account, and those things which I would enjoy I cannot until this mystery is clear.' He looked at her and said, 'I will tell you what it is; I cannot trust you.' How, think you, would that wife feel when her husband disclosed such a fact? What were his kindness and devotion worth now? Nothing. Oh, how gladly she would have given up riches, position, and everything, if only her husband trusted her. And yet, that is just what many are doing daily with Christ. They will work for Him by giving their money and time to His service, but it profiteth nothing. Jesus Christ looks down, and says, 'These things are all very good, but they are worth nothing so long as you cannot trust Me. Trust must come first and service after.'"

THE CENSOR'S DOOM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, July 25th, 1886, at Asheville, N. C.

"With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."—MATT. 7:2.

Retribution for Critics—Judgment of Human Conduct—Extenuating Considerations—I. Hereditary Taints—The Princess Mary School—Criticising the Declaration of Independence—Margaret the Mother of Criminals—Swimming against the Current—Resistance Possible—II. Conjunction of Circumstances—Risking Trust Funds—The Uncharitable Man's Crisis—Ebullitions of Temper—A Touch of Malaria—Noble Victims of Dissipation—A Huntsman's Confession—A Bishop in a Cage—No Mercy for the Merciless.

In the greatest sermon ever preached—a sermon about fifteen minutes long according to the ordinary rate of speech—a sermon on the Mount of Olives, the Preacher, sitting while He spoke, according to the ancient mode of oratory, the people were given to understand that the same yard-stick that they employed upon others would be employed upon themselves. Measure others by a harsh rule, and you will be measured by a harsh rule. Measure others by a charitable rule, and you will be measured by a charitable rule. Give no mercy to others, and no mercy will be given to you. "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

There is a great deal of

of human conduct. It was to smite that unfairness that Christ uttered the words of the text, and my sermon will be a re-echo of the divine sentiment. In estimating the misbehavior of others we must take into consideration the pressure of circumstances. It is never right to do wrong, but there are degrees of culpability. When men misbehave or commit some atrocious wickedness we are disposed indiscriminately to tumble them all over the bank of condemnation. Suffer they ought and suffer they must, but in difference of degree.

I. In the first place, in estimating the misdoing of others we must take into calculation the

HEREDITARY TENDENCY.

There is such a thing as good blood and there is such a thing as bad blood. There are families that have had a moral twist in them for a hundred years back. They have not been careful to keep the family record in that regard. There have been escapades and maraudings and scoundrelisms and moral deficits all the way back, whether you call it kleptomania or pyromania or dipsomania, or whether it be in a milder form, and amount to no mania at all. The strong probability is, that the present criminal started life with nerve, muscle, and bone contaminated. As some start life with a natural tendency to nobility and generosity and kindness and truthfulness, there are others who start life with just the opposite tendency and they are born liars, or born malcontents, or born outlaws, or born swindlers.

There is in England a school that is called the Princess Mary school. All the children in that school are the CHILDREN OF CONVICTS.

The school is under high patronage. I had the pleasure of being present at one of their anniversaries, in 1879, presided over by the Earl of Kintore. By a wise law in England, after parents have committed a certain number of crimes and thereby shown themselves incompetent rightly to bring up their children, the little ones are taken from under pernicious influences and put in reformatory schools, where all gracious and kindly influences shall be brought upon them. Of course the experiment is young and it has got to be demonstrated how large a percentage of the children of convicts may be brought up to respectability and usefulness. But we all know that it is more difficult for children of bad parentage to do right than for children of good parentage.

In this country we are taught by the Declaration of American Independence that all people are born equal. There never was a greater misrepresentation put in one sentence than in that sentence which implies that we are all born equal. You may as well say that flowers are born equal, or trees are born equal, or animals are born equal. Why does one horse cost $100 and another horse cost $5000? Why does one sheep cost $10 and another sheep cost $500? DIFFERENCE IN BLOOD.

We are wise enough to recognize it in horses, in cattle, in sheep, but we are not wise enough to make allowance for the difference in the human blood. Now I demand by the law of eternal fairness, that you be more lenient in your criticism of those who were born wrong, in whose ancestral line there was a hangman's knot, or who came from a tree the fruit of which for centuries has been gnarled and worm-eaten.

Dr. Harris, a reformer, gave some marvellous statistics in his story of a woman he called "Margaret, the Mother of Criminals." Ninety years ago she lived in a village in upper New York State. She was not only poor but she was vicious. She was not well provided for. There were no almshouses there. The public, however, somewhat looked after her, but chiefly scoffed at her, and derided her, and pushed her farther down in her crime. That was ninety years ago. There have been six hundred and twenty-three persons in that ancestral line, two hundred of them criminals. In one branch of that family there were twenty, and nine of them have been in State prison and nearly all of the others have turned out badly. It is estimated that that family cost the county and State $100,000, to say nothing of the property they destroyed.

Are you not willing, as sensible, fair people, to acknowledge that it is a fearful disaster to be born in such an ancestral line? Does it not make a great difference whether one descends from Margaret, the mother of criminals, or from some mother in Israel? whether you are the son of Ahab or the son of Joshua?

It is a very different thing to swim with the current, from what it is to

as some of you have no doubt found in your summer recreation. If a man find himself in an ancestral current where there is good blood flowing smoothly from generation to generation, it is not a very great credit to him if he turn out good and honest and pure and noble. He could hardly help it. But suppose he is born in an ancestral line, in an hereditary line, where the influences have been bad and there has been a coming down over a moral declivity, if the man surrender to the influences he will go down under the overmastering gravitation unless some supernatural aid be afforded him. Now, such a person deserves not your excommunication, but your pity.

Do not sit with the lip curled in scorn, and with an assumed air of angelic innocence looking down upon such moral precipitation. You had better get down on your knees and first pray Almighty God for their rescue, and next thank the Lord that you have not been thrown under the wheels of that Juggernaut.

In Great Britain and in the United States, in every generation, there are of persons who are fully developed criminals and incarcerated. I say, in every generation. Then, I suppose, there are tens of thousands of persons not found out in their criminality. In addition to these there are tens of thousands of persons who, not positively becoming criminals, nevertheless have a criminal tendency. Any one of all those thousands by the grace of God may become Christian, and resist the ancestral influence, and open a new chapter of behavior; but the vast majority of them will not, and it becomes all men, professional, unprofessional, ministers of religion, judges of courts, philanthropists and Christian workers, to recognize the fact that there are these Atlantic and Pacific surges of hereditary evil rolling on through the centuries. I say, of course, a man can just as in the ancestral line mentioned in the first chapter of Matthew. You see in the same line in which there was a wicked Rehoboam and a desperate Manasses, there afterward came a pious Joseph and a glorious Christ. But, my friends, you must recognize the fact that these influences go on from generation to generation. I am glad to know, however, that a river which has produced nothing but miasma for a hundred miles, may, after a while, turn the wheels of factories and help support industrious and virtuous populations; and there are family lines which were poisoned that are a benediction now. At the last day it will be found out that there are men who have gone clear over into all forms of iniquity and plunged into utter abandonment, who before they yielded to the first temptation resisted more evil than many a man who has been moral and upright all his life.

But, supposing now, that in this age when there are so many good people, that I come down into this audience and select the very best man in it. I do not mean the man who would style himself the best, for probably he is a hypocrite; but I mean the man who before God is really the best. I will take you out from all your Christian surroundings. I will take you back to boyhood. I will put you

IN A DEPRAVED HOME.

I will put you in a cradle of iniquity. Who is that bending over that cradle? An intoxicated mother. Who is that swearing in the next room? Your father. The neighbors come in to talk, and their jokes are unclean. There is not in the house a Bible or a moral treatise, but only a few scraps of an old pictorial.

After a while you are old enough to get out of the cradle, and you are struck across the head for naughtiness, but never in any kindly manner reprimanded. After awhile you are old enough to go abroad, and you are sent out with a basket to steal. If you come home without any spoil you are whipped until the blood comes. At fifteen years of age you go out to fight your own battles in this world, which seems to care no more for you than the dog that has died of a fit under the fence. You are kicked and cuffed and buffeted. Some day, rallying your courage, you resent some wrong. A man says: "Who are you? I know who you are. Your father had free lodgings at Sing Sing. Your mother, she was up for drunkenness at the criminal court. Get out of my way, you low-lived wretch!"

My brother, suppose that had been the history of your advent, and the history of your earlier surroundings, would you have been the Christian man you are to-day, seated in this Christian assembly? I tell you nay. You would have been a vagabond, an outlaw, a murderer on the scaffold atoning for your crime. All these considerations ought to make us merciful in our dealings with the wandering and the lost.

II. Again, I have to remark, that in our estimate of the misdoing of people who have fallen from high respectability and usefulness, we must take into consideration the

CONJUNCTION OF CIRCUMSTANCES.

In nine cases out of ten a man who goes astray does not intend any positive wrong. He has trust funds. He risks a part of these funds in investment. He says: "Now, if I should lose that investment I have of my own property five times as much, and if this investment should go wrong I could easily make it up; I could five times make it up." With that wrong reasoning he goes on and makes the investment, and it does not turn out quite as well as he expected, and he makes another investment, and strange to say at the same time all his other affairs get entangled, and all his other resources fail, and his hands are tied. Now he wants to extricate himself. He goes a little further on in the wrong investment. He takes a plunge further ahead, for he wants to save his wife and children, he wants to save his home, he wants to save his membership in the church. He takes one more plunge and all is lost.

Some morning at ten o'clock the bank-door is not opened, and there is a card on the door signed by an officer of the bank, indicating there is trouble, and the name of the defaulter or the defrauder heads the newspaper column, and hundreds of men say: "Good for him;" hundreds of other men say: "I'm glad he's found out at last;" hundreds of other men say: "Just as I told you;" hundreds of other men say: "We couldn't possibly have been tempted to do that—no conjunction of circumstances could ever have overthrown me;" and there is a superabundance of

INDIGNATION, BUT NO PITY.

The heavens full of lightning but not one drop of dew. If God treated us as society treats that man we would all have been in hell long ago!

Wait for the alleviating circumstances. Perhaps he may have been the dupe of others. Before you let all the hounds out from their kennel to maul and tear that man, find out if he has not been brought up in a commercial establishment where there was a wrong system of ethics taught; find out whether that man has not an extravagant wife who is not satisfied with his honest earnings, and in the temptation to please her he has gone into that ruin into which enough men have fallen, and by the same temptation, to make a procession of many miles. Perhaps some sudden sickness may have touched his brain, and his judgment may be unbalanced. He is wrong, he is awfully wrong, and he must be condemned, but there may be mitigating circumstances. Perhaps under the same temptation you might have fallen. The reason some men do not steal two hundred thousand dollars is because they do not get a chance! Have righteous indignation you must about that man's conduct, but temper it with mercy.

But, you say: "I am so sorry that the innocent should suffer." Yes, I am, too—sorry for the widows and orphans who lost their all by that defalcation. I am sorry also for the business men, the honest business men, who have had their affairs all crippled by that defalcation. I am sorry for the venerable bank president to whom the credit of that bank was a matter of pride. Yes, I am sorry also for that man who brought all the distress; sorry that he sacrificed body, mind, soul, reputation, heaven, and went into the blackness of darkness forever.

You defiantly say: "I could not be tempted in that way." Perhaps after awhile. God has a very good memory, and He sometimes seems to say: "This man feels so strong in his innate power and goodness he shall be tested; he is so full of bitter invective against that unfortunate it shall be shown now whether he has the power to stand." Fifteen years go by. The wheel of fortune turns several times, and you are in a crisis that you never could have anticipated. Now, all the powers of darkness come around, and they chuckle and they chatter and they say: "Aha! here is the old fellow who was so proud of his integrity, and who bragged he couldn't be overthrown by temptation, and was so uproarious in his demonstrations of indignation at the defalcation fifteen years ago. Let us see!"

God lets the man go. God, who had kept that man under His protecting care, lets the man go, and the majesty of his integrity. God letting the man go, the powers of darkness pounce upon him. I see you some day in your office in great excitement. One of two things you can do. Be honest, and be pauperized, and have your children brought home from school, your family dethroned in social influence. The other thing is, you can step a little aside from that which is right, you can only just go half an inch out of the proper path, you can only take a little risk, and then you have all your finances fair and right. You have a large property. You can leave a fortune for your children, and endow a college, and build a public library in your native town.

You halt and wait, and halt and wait until your lips get white. You decide to risk it. Only a few strokes of the pen now. But, oh, how your hand trembles, how dreadfully it trembles! The die is cast. By the strangest and most awful conjunction of circumstances any one could have imagined, you are prostrated. Bankruptcy, commercial annihilation, exposure, crime. Good men mourn and devils hold carnival, and you see your own name at the head of the newspaper column in a whole congress of exclamation points; and while you are reading the anathema in the reportorial and editorial paragraph, it occurs to you how much this story is like that of the defalcation fifteen years ago, and a clap of thunder shakes the window-sill, saying: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again!"

You look in another direction. There is nothing like to put a man to disadvantage. You, a man with calm pulses and a fine digestion and perfect health, cannot understand how anybody should be capsize in temper by an infinitesimal annoyance. You say: "I couldn't be unbalanced in that way." Perhaps you smile at a provocation that makes another man swear. You pride yourself on your imperturbability. You say with your manner, though you have too much good taste to say it with your words: "I have a great deal more sense than that man has; I have a great deal more equipoise of temper than that man has; I never could make such a puerile exhibition of myself as that man has made."

Let me see. Did you not say that you could not be tempted to an ebullition of temper? Some September you come home from your summer watering-place and you have inside, away back in your liver or spleen, what we call in our day malaria, but what the old folks called chills and fever. You take quinine until your ears are first buzzing beehives and then roaring Niagaras. You take roots and herbs, you take everything. You get well. But the next day you feel uncomfortable, and you yawn, and you stretch, and you shiver, and you consume, and you suffer.

Vexed more than you can tell, you cannot sleep, you cannot eat, you cannot bear to see anything that looks happy, you go out to kick the cat that is asleep in the sun. Your children's mirth was once music to you; now, it is deafening. You say: "Boys, stop that racket!" You turn back from June to March. In the family and in the neighborhood your popularity is ninety-five per cent off. The world says: "What is the matter with that disagreeable man? What a woebegone countenance! I can't bear the sight of him." You have got your pay at last—got your pay. You feel just as the man felt, that man for whom you had no mercy, and my text comes in with marvellous appositeness: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

In the study of society I have come to this conclusion, that the most of the

but they do not exactly know how to make it out. They make enough good resolutions to lift them into angelhood. The vast majority of people who fall are the victims of circumstances; they are captured by ambuscade. If their temptations should come out in a regiment and fight them in a fair field they would go out in the strength and the triumph of David against Goliath. But they do not see the giants and they do not see the regiment. Temptation comes and says: "Take these bitters, take this nervine, take this aid to digestion, take this night-cap." The vast majority of men and women who are destroyed by opium and by rum first take them as medicines. In making up your dish of criticism in regard to them, take from the caster the cruet of sweet oil and not the cruet of cayenne pepper.

Do you know how that physician, that lawyer, that journalist became the victim of dissipation? Why, the physician was kept up night by night on professional duty. Life and death hovered in the balance. His nervous system was exhausted. There came a time of epidemic, and whole families were prostrated and his nervous strength was gone. He was all worn out in the service of the public. Now he must brace himself up. Now he stimulates. The life of this mother, the life of this child, the life of this father, the life of this whole family must be saved, and of all these families must be saved, and he stimulates, and he does it again and again. You may criticise his judgment, but remember the process. It was by which he went down. It was magnificent generosity through which he fell.

That attorney at the bar for weeks has been standing in a poorly ventilated court-room, listening to the testimony and contesting in the dry technicalities of the law, and now the time has come for him to wind up, and he must plead for the life of his client, and his nervous system is all gone. If he fails in that speech his client perishes. If he have eloquence enough in that hour his client is saved. He stimulates.

That journalist has had exhausting midnight work. He has had to report speeches and orations that kept him up till a very late hour. He has gone with much exposure working up some case of crime in company with a detective. He sits down at midnight to write out his notes from a memorandum scrawled on a pad under unfavorable circumstances. His strength is gone. Fidelity to the public intelligence, fidelity to his own livelihood demand that he keep up. He must keep up. He stimulates. Again and again he does that, and he goes down. You may criticise his judgment in the matter, but have mercy. Remember the process. Do not be hard.

RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE.

My friends, this text will come to fulfilment in some cases in this world. The huntsman in Farmsteen was shot by some unknown person. Twenty years after the son of the huntsman was in the same forest, and he accidentally shot a man, and the man in dying said: "God is just; I shot your father just here twenty years ago." A bishop said to Louis XI. of France: "Make an iron cage for all those who do not think as we do—an iron cage in which the captive can neither lie down nor stand straight up." It was fashioned—the awful instrument of punishment. After a while the bishop offended Louis XI., and for fourteen years he was in that same cage, and could neither lie down nor stand up. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

Oh, my friends, let us be resolved to

SCOLD LESS AND PRAY MORE!

What headway will we make in the judgment if in this world we have been hard on those who have gone astray? What headway will you and I make in the last great judgment, when we must have mercy or perish? The Bible says: "They shall have judgment without mercy that showed no mercy."

I see the scribes of heaven looking up into the face of such a man, saying, "What! you plead for mercy, you, whom in all your life never had any mercy on your fellows? Don't you remember how hard you were in your opinions of those who were astray? Don't you remember when you ought to have given a helping hand you employed a hard heel? Mercy! You must mis-speak yourself when you plead for mercy here. Mercy for others but no mercy for you. "Look," say the scribes of heaven, "look at that inscription over the throne of judgment, the throne of God's judgment." See it coming out letter by letter, word by word, sentence by sentence, until your startled vision reads it and your remorseful spirit appropriates it: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Depart, ye cursed!"

LAYING THE FOUNDATION OF A FIRE-TEMPLE.

A REMARKABLE ceremony is described by the Times of India. It took place on Sunday, May 30th, when the foundation-stone of a new fire-temple of the Parsee community in India was laid by Dustoor Dr. Jamaspjee Minocherjee Jamasp Asana, M.A., Ph.D., high-priest of the Parsees, with great éclat and ceremony. There are at present three fire-temples in Bombay built by wealthy and charitably disposed members of the community. There are about thirty-three agiarées or smaller temples in Bombay, which are also built and endowed by private individuals, and the new temple accordingly will be the first institution of the kind built from general subscriptions raised by the community. About 2500 Parsees, males and females, have subscribed for the purpose of building the new temple, and more subscriptions will be forthcoming. It is not only that the building of a temple is very expensive, but that the process of the various ceremonies which last over a period of twelve months is very elaborate and costly. According to the Parsee religion no fire-temple could be founded unless 1001 pieces of fires of sixteen different denominations were obtained to form a collection of that sacred fire which has constantly to be fed with sandal-wood, frankincense, and other fragrant articles. According to Vendidad the sixteen denominations of fires required are from burning corpses of men, from mints, public baths, from the hearths of a dyer, a potter, a brick-maker, a mendicant devoted to prayers, a goldsmith, an iron-smith, a manufacturer of arms, a baker, a liquor distiller, a shepherd, a priest as well as a layman, a collection of fires from the house of a king, a nobleman, a judge, military officers and men, and pedestrians, and, lastly, fire produced by electricity. All these fires are collected after a long and elaborate ceremony, which, in itself, it is said, costs in the aggregate about Rs. 25,000 ($12,500). The stone was laid with a silver trowel and after two prayers to "Ahura-Mazda, the most opulent Majestic, Greatest, Best, Most Beautiful, the Strongest, Most Intellectual, Most Virtuous, the Highest in Holiness, Wisest, the Giver of Great Comfort." The proceedings terminated with a distribution of flowers among those present.

RESULTS OF A WIFE'S BLINDNESS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Witness thus describes the means which were blessed of God to his conversion: "I was born in this city, [Calcutta] and am now nearly fifty years old. I was left an orphan at an early age, and though kind friends undertook at my christening that I should be brought up as a child of God, I really grew up to be a servant of the devil. I never attended a Sunday-school, and received no religious instruction whatever. I was as ignorant of the Bible as any of our non-Christian brethren, and often presumed to criticise a book I had never read. I associated with evil companions, most of whom have perished in their sins, and disobeyed all God's commandments. I never prayed, and never attended at a house of worship. In fact, I lived a worldly, wicked life, and acted as if there was no God, no day of judgment; yet it pleased God to prosper me in worldly circumstances, but I made a base use of His gifts. Twice was I all but drowned, but, though rescued when at the last gasp, those escapes from death made no lasting impression on me.

"I now come to the point in my story. My wife, who had always been blessed with excellent eyesight, gradually lost the use of one eye from cataract, and the other became similarly affected. She underwent an operation, but it failed, and the eye was lost. After the lapse of several months, my wife became quite blind. In her deep affliction, she cried to me, 'Oh, put away your novels, and read the Bible to me.'

"The request was not at all agreeable to me, and I would have shirked complying with it if I could, but I could not find it in my heart to refuse my wife's appeal. I took up the Bible and read steadily through its sacred pages. The truths revealed to me penetrated to my heart, and light shone into my soul. I looked in the mirror, and saw my own filthiness. At the same time the cleansing fountain was revealed to me, and I seized upon my Saviour's promises with the trust of a child.

"In conclusion, I ought to add that God has blessed us by a restoration of my wife's eyesight. An operation was performed—with God's blessing, it proved to be quite successful—and my wife is once more enjoying the eyesight of which she had been for years deprived; while her husband, whose mental vision was once totally obscured by sin, also joyfully exclaims, 'Whereas I was blind, now I see!'

A PRACTICAL JOKER IN TROUBLE.

ONE of those nuisances to society—the practical joker—was recently cured of his propensity by an experience he is not likely to forget. As he had paid no heed to the reproof of God's Word (Prov. 26 : 18, 19), he had to be taught by sharper measures. The man thus told his own story to a representative of a Boston journal:

"I am very particular about fastening the doors and windows of my house. I do not intend to leave them open nights as an invitation to burglars to enter. You see, I was robbed once in that way, and I never mean to be again, so when I go to bed I want to be sure that every door and window is securely fastened.

"About a month ago my wife changed hired girls, and the new-comer was very careless about the doors nights. On two or three occasions I came down-stairs to find a window up or the back door unlocked. I cautioned her, but it did no good. I therefore determined to frighten her. I got some false whiskers and an old rig, and one night about ten o'clock I crept down the back stairs to the kitchen where she was. She was in her chair sound asleep, as I could tell by her breathing, but the minute I struck a match she awoke. I expected a great yelling and screaming, but nothing of the sort took place.

"She bounced out of her easy-chair with a 'You villain!' on her lips, seized a chair by the back, and before I had made a move she hit me over the head, felling me to my knees.

"I tried to get up, tried to explain who I was but in vain.

"Before I could get out of the room she struck me again, and it was only after I had tumbled down the back stairs that she gave the alarm. Then she went through to my room, rapped on the door, and coolly announced—

"'Mr. Dash, please get up—I've killed a burglar.'"

THE LIGHT SHINING.

THE Rev. Hunter Corbett, of Chefoo, writing of "Twenty-five Years of Missionary Work in the Province of Shantung, China," mentions the following striking incident in illustration of the estimation in which Christianity is held in China: "Lately a Christian was bringing his daughters from his home, several days' journey in the interior, to the school at Chefoo. A prominent merchant from the city spent the night at the same inn. After the evening meal the merchant asked the Christian if he would take charge of a parcel for him during the night, as he wished to visit some friends. In the morning, when he called for the parcel, he remarked, 'If I had not known that you were a member of the Christian Church I would not have ventured to intrust this parcel, containing many valuables, to you, hitherto a stranger to me. I have studied the Christian books and understand their teaching. I have watched closely the conduct and dealings of the missionaries and the converts, and am persuaded that the Gospel is true; but the observance of the Sabbath, and other difficulties connected with a Christian profession, make it impossible for me to be a Christian and carry on a successful business at present.' This man is undoubtedly a representative of many others. Another evidence of a change is that now landlords, instead of closing their doors when they see the missionary approaching, hasten to welcome him, and frequently rival landlords contend for us as their guests. If it is not convenient to settle at the time, they will willingly wait for the money."

THE TIME OF CONSTERNATION.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

No Misunderstanding the Rapture—Inured to Surprises—A Climax in History—The Wide-Spread Bereavement—Four Classes Left Behind—I. The Foolish Virgins—Their Sorrow—They Get Grace—Their Disappointment—Will be the Lord's Witnesses—II. The Nominal Church—The Stage in Which We are Now—III. The Mohammedans and Heathen—IV. The Jews—The Last Opportunity.

WE can scarcely imagine, much less describe, the scene of dread and consternation which will seize the minds of the people who are left behind when the waiting saints are caught up to meet their Lord in the air. When so many are taken away quietly and suddenly, there will be no room for doubt, as there was when Enoch was taken to heaven. After his mysterious removal it would appear that the people of the time did not believe he was gone. They evidently instituted a search, but it was in vain; for we read in the Epistle to the Hebrews that "he (Enoch) was not found" (Heb. 11 : 5).

At the translation of the saints of God there will be no misunderstanding upon the subject. No doubt the startling event will bring into vivid remembrance many prophetic and familiar Scriptures, which had been too fatally neglected and overlooked. Indeed, we are in the world's history. We are coming, as it were, into the rapids of a great river, nearer to the edge over which the torrent is to be precipitated. Men are getting more and more heedless, and used to marvels.

For all this, we cannot suppose that the removal of the saints of God from all parts of the world at the same instant will be an event of mere passing moment. It will surely command more than ordinary attention. In fact, it will be the beginning of the terrible end, and, as such, will stir the souls of men in one way or another.

Some men may rejoice at the removal of persons so obnoxious to themselves; but doubtless many more will quail with fear and tremble in suspense. In addition to this fear, there will be a widespread sense of bereavement, as in that dark night in Egypt when "there was not a house where there was not one dead." (See Exod. 12 : 30).

THOSE WHO ARE LEFT BEHIND.

(1) What will become of those who are represented by the "foolish virgins"? If the wise virgins with oil in their vessels represent those who had grace in their hearts and were accepted, the foolish ones without oil represent those of the same company who had no grace. To all outward appearance they were one, possessing the same outward privileges, and having the same object before them, namely, to meet the Bridegroom.

How many there are even now who profess to be looking for the Bridegroom, and not for the Judge; but they are not washed in the blood. We can well understand how these persons will be stirred up when they see their companions separated from them. Knowing about the necessity of having grace, and also how to obtain it, they will lose no time in procuring it. They do this and return in all haste to the door, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us. But He answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not" (Matt. 25 : 11, 12). Their disappointment would be bitter; and the more so now that they had oil and their lamps were trimmed and burning.

Left behind, they will nevertheless be a people separate from all others in their dispensation, just as spiritual persons are now separate from nominal professors. They will constitute the nucleus of those who are to be the Lord's witnesses, confessors and martyrs, in the days of the Son of Man.

(2) What will become of

with her various ecclesiastical organizations? Before the Reformation, when the ecclesiastical system held its sway over everything else, it made Church and priest and sacrament absolutely necessary for salvation. By this means it gained a mastery over the minds and consciences of the people; not by the Word of God, but by the traditions of the Church. The ministers and servants of God for the people became lords over God's heritage. This is what is manifestly coming on again, and this Antichristian system will have more power than before, and exercise greater control. Corrupt Christianity, with its sensuous ceremonial, will be the popular religion of the world in the days that are coming.

After this God interposed to save the Church in the time of the Reformation. Great numbers were then awakened to see the unscriptural character of the Romish superstition. They came out of her and testified against her, even to the stake; though, alas! too many afterward only retained the name to live, while they were yet dead.

Yet once again the Lord interposed, and revived His work and opened innumerable doors of usefulness all over the world in the way of missions. The Lord says of this period, "Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown" (Rev. 3: 11). This is the stage in which we are now; and after this, that is, after the rapture of the saints, the final stage of Laodicean declension will begin. It will be the last opportunity given to those who remain on earth until the Lord comes to execute judgment.

(3) What will become of the

MOHAMMEDANS AND HEATHEN?

Judging of the future by what is now taking place, we may say that those who are not drawn to God will be absorbed into the false Christianity of the day. Already we see how Mohammedans are falling away from their original zeal and fire, and that the "sword or the Koran" is no longer their dire alternative for all other men. They are now content to remain within their own limits, and there they are diminishing in their numbers. They are learning and adopting the manners and customs of the formerly hated Giaour.

The same may be said of the heathen in all parts of the world. Western civilization and education are teaching them that their religions are superstitious and wrong, without showing them what is right. Modern instruction is puffing them up with knowledge, and turning those who have been obedient believers into dangerous rationalists. Besides this, indulgences of the flesh are put in their way which are contrary to the integrity of their old faith.

(4) What will become of

THE JEWS?

We may expect that, at the time of the rapture of the saints, the Jews will have been restored to their own land; if not then, very soon after. They are, without doubt, a people ready and waiting for a land; and their land is evidently waiting for a people. It is the land of the Jews, and it refuses to yield its abundance to strangers. When the rightful owners return to it, especially with all the wealth which is in their possession, we may anticipate that the desolate wastes will be rich with cultivation. The ruined cities will be rebuilt; and, in the case of Jerusalem, this will probably be done on a scale of great magnificence. The temple also will be re-edified, and will surpass the city in grandeur. Great advancement awaits this people among the nations of the world. Their wealth will command a conspicuous position, and will stir the envy of the great ones of the earth.

Will there be no further opportunity of salvation to the millions of Jews and Gentiles who are left behind when the Church is taken up? I answer, Yes. There will be a general and widespread opportunity of salvation under the preaching of

but the salvation offered by it will not be the same which is given to us under the Gospel of grace. If the question be asked, What is the difference between "the Gospel of grace" and "the Gospel of the kingdom?" I answer, The one calls us to salvation and oneness with Christ—the other calls men to salvation only; the one calls us to be children in the family of God—the other calls men to be subjects of the kingdom; the one commands us to believe in the finished work of Christ, and to rely upon the Risen Christ to keep us to the end—the other tells men to show their faith in God by their works, and to endure to the end in order to be saved. We look for a Christ to come and take us to Himself. They will look for a Christ to come in manifest glory to deliver them in a time of extremity and trouble.

Doubtless many persons from the nominal Christian Church will come out to join the ranks of those who are proclaiming this Gospel. Multitudes also from among the Mohammedan and heathen peoples who are looking for a prophet and deliverer will give heed to this preaching. The Jews, we may be sure, will listen with interest to the proclamation of a coming Messiah. Though very many will perish in their unbelief, yet we are told a great multitude, "which no man could number," will be saved, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues (Rev. 7: 9).

DOUBLE COMPENSATION.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially Reported for the Christian Herald.)

An Absorbing Theme—Whom It Does Not Interest—A Profitable Religion—The Hardest Thing a Blessing—A Young Man's Difficulty—Resigns His Situation—His Reward.

THE all-absorbing theme of God and angels and good men is the salvation of the living—the salvation of men and women who live and walk and talk upon the earth to-day. Is it not passing strange that this great theme should thus engage the mind and heart of God and angels, and that you and you and you (pointing over the audience) are the only beings in God's moral universe that seem to be indifferent to this great question.

It is my purpose to-night to talk with you face to face. It is my purpose to get you to think and think wisely and scripturally upon this great question. Am I living so in this world that I shall live forever in the world beyond? We shall take the exhortation of the text and impress it truthfully and scripturally, and, we trust, prayerfully, upon your consciences to-night.

"Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare I will render double unto thee." (Zech. 9: 12.) I do believe, brothers, that religion is profitable unto all things, having the life that now is and everlasting life in the world to come. I am one who believes that God does not rob us of everything before He can give us heaven. I believe that if I shall do and suffer the will of God in this world, I shall have the best that this world can give, as well as the richest blessing at last that heaven can bestow. I am not one of those who believe that if we become religious, that we are shut off from all enjoyment, and that we must hang our harps on the willows, and sing no more songs of gladness and have no more hours of pleasure. Thank God for the offers which Christianity gives to man.

"I will render double—double—unto thee." I never read that expression that I do not think of an incident a preacher told me of. He said there was persistently seeking Christ for several services, and he approached the young man one morning after service, and said to him: "My young brother, you are in earnest, what is your trouble? Tell me all your trouble." "Well," said the young man, "I am in earnest; I would give all the world for peace. I have been seeking religion, as you know, since the meeting commenced, and every time I go to the altar to beg for mercy, or kneel at home to pray—you know I am a clerk in a grocery store that sells provisions, and liquor by the quart and gallon—and whenever I go down on my knees before God those quart cups, and gallon cups, and barrels come up before my eyes, and I cannot pray, and I cannot do anything, and I don't know what to do."

"Well," said the preacher, "my young brother, give up your place and come from among those things."

"Well," said he, "I have thought about that, but I have a widowed mother and two orphaned sisters that are dependent upon me for every bite they eat—they are dependent upon me and my salary, and if I quit my place my mother and sisters will starve; but I am afraid if I hold on to my place I cannot be saved."

"Well," said the preacher, "trust God. He says He will render double. Trust God. Give up your employment and give yourself to Christ."

The young man went to his employer that evening and stated the case fairly to them, as he had stated it to the preacher. He said, "Gentlemen, you have been good and kind to me, but I must give up my employment; I must do it or I lose my soul." They paid him up. They settled up with him, and they said, "We are sorry to give you up; you have been a worthy, noble young man, and have done your duty well; we hate to give you up, but we cannot give up that part of our business, for there is where the money is." And the young man went home, ate his supper and came back to church that night, and at the altar was graciously blessed and converted. He went home and spent a happy night, with the breezes of heaven playing over his soul.

The next morning before he left the house, after breakfast, he received a note from his old employers, saying, "Call at our office this morning; we want to see you." Later in the morning he walked down to the office, and walked into the counting-room. The old senior member of the firm took his hand and said to him: "I am glad to shake your hand again in my store; come and walk with me into the liquor-room." And he walked with him into the liquor-room. Every barrel was rolled out, and the floor swept up. And he said, "Young man, we have rolled out that part of our business, and we are done with it forever; and we will give you double your old salary if you will come back and take your former place."

But you say, "Oh, how incredible that is." Well, brother, I can tell you a truth infinitely more incredible than that.

THIRTEEN YEARS AGO

I left my little home in Cartersville, Ga., to go out and preach the Gospel and follow Christ, and God has given me a thousand homes for that one I left, just as good, and as good to me as if they were my own loved ones in that home. I shook hands with one mother—a stepmother, but she was kind and good, and I bid her good-by, and God has given me a thousand mothers just as good as my own mother could be to me. I left a few friends in Cartersville, but God has given me a thousand friends for every one that I bid good-by there to go out and serve Him; and I am here to-night a living monument of the blessed truth that God will give a man a hundredfold more in this life; and I trust Him, indeed, for the blessed fact that I shall have everlasting life in the world to come.

I will render double unto thee. Brother, God don't rob men. God don't take all you have here and thrust you into a dark dungeon and keep you there until you die; but God only takes that which offends Him and harms you and would damn you at last, bursts every shackle of sin from your limbs, and lets you walk the earth a free man of the Lord, and makes you feel in deed and in truth that you are His child and on your way to heaven.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Morrison Surplus Resolution has Caused general discussion in and out of Congress. The Senate Committee to which it was referred has consulted Acting Secretary Fairchild on the subject. He declined to express any opinion upon it, but in explaining its effects he indicated his disapproval of the resolution. He regarded it as a withdrawal of a discretion from the Secretary of the Treasury which he better than anyone else could exercise with benefit to the country. He said: "This resolution, if it becomes a law, will rigidly fix the amount of the bond call to be made each month, and it must be made, no matter what may be the business state of the country or the prospects of Government receipts and expenditures. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to do nothing which he may not do under existing law, if at the proper times and by the light of the information he may then have he shall deem it well for the country so to do. The fundamental idea of this resolution, so far as the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, is that his judgment is not considered worthy of trust, even if guided by the circumstances existing at the time of each call. How much less valuable must it then be, when given many months in advance?" He added: "The Secretary of the Treasury is fully in accord with this resolution so far as it is a declaration of applying the surplus revenues of the Government to the extinction of the interest-bearing debt in such amounts and at such times as this may be prudently and beneficially done." The opinion outside of Congress appears to be growing that the management of the surplus should be left in the hands of the Secretary rather than regulated in advance by Congress. It is somewhat remarkable that the embarrassment of a Democratic administration should proceed from the Democratic Party.

Efforts to Arrange the Fishery Dispute with Canada are being made by Minister Phelps. He has prepared a circular wherein no point of interest regarding the fisheries has been forgotten, and this circular has been sent to all the leading fishing merchants in the United States and to others who have taken an active part in the debate on the question. It requests that the persons receiving it should carefully study the document, write out answers to its questions, and after having made and prepared such suggestions as the parties see fit to make about the fisheries that may advance the cause of American fishermen to return the circulars to the Minister in London. Mr. Phelps will, after considering all suggestions made by the fishing merchants, prepare an argument on the fishery laws and hand it to the English Government for their consideration and action, pressing for a speedy decision. Mr. Phelps contends on behalf of the United States and will not yield the point that the three-mile limit is three marine miles from the shore to the point where the vessel may happen to be. He also claims that the fines imposed in the cases of United States vessels were excessive and not in accordance with international courtesy.

The Dynamite Clause of the New Treaty of extradition with England is, as was expected, provoking much opposition. It is alleged that the clause is superfluous because murder and arson are already extraditable offences, but obviously a dynamite outrage might occur and do grievous injury without involving the perpetrator in a charge of murder or arson. The real difficulty appears to be that, though several States have enacted laws applicable to the crime, there is no federal statute dealing with any such offence as "malicious injury to property whereby the life of any person shall be endangered." An extraditable offence must be an offence punishable in both countries. It will be unfortunate if this or any other difficulty precludes this country from recovering from Canada the defaulters who fly there with their ill-gotten booty.

The Prisoners, Paupers, and Lunatics Sup-ported by the public in the United States at the time of the last census formed the subject of an interesting report sent to the Senate last week by the Secretary of the Interior. From among the voluminous details furnished, the following are important and significant facts: The total number of prisoners confined in jails, work-houses, and penitentiaries, etc., in the United States was 58,609, of which 53,604 were males and 5005 females; 45,802 natives, and 12,807 foreigners; 41,861 whites, and 16,748 colored. The number of prisoners to each 1,000,000 of population is given as 1069. At the previous census ten years before, it was 853. The number of insane persons in the United States is given as 91,959, or 1833 for each 1,000,000 of population. At the previous census the total number was 37,432, or 971 for each 1,000,000. The number of outdoor paupers is given as—males, 10,290; females, 11,305; 17,902 are natives and 3693 foreigners; 19,328 white and 2267 colored. The number of almshouse paupers was: Males, 35,564; females, 30,639, of which 37,603 were white and 5717 colored. There were 57,423 homeless children in the country under sixteen years of age of whom 30,171 were males and 27,252 females; 55,613 were native born and 18,210 of foreign birth. The number of white homeless children is given as 54,883, and that of colored as 25,040.

The Two Hundredth Anniversary of the founding of Albany, N. Y., was celebrated on July 22d. The charter making Albany a city was granted to the Dutch settlers by Thomas Dongan, the English Colonial Governor, on July 22d, 1686. The President and his Cabinet took part in the celebration, which was of a most enthusiastic character. Military demonstrations, processions, speech-making and fireworks at night made the day a memorable one for the citizens of the capital of the Empire State.

At the Trial of the Chicago Anarchists last week the various prisoners were identified as having taken part in the meeting of May 4th, when the dynamite bombs were thrown. John E. Doyle, one of the wounded policemen, was brought into court and excited the commiseration of all who saw him. The once stalwart man was an utter wreck. His right arm hung useless at his side, he leaned upon crutches and testified that he had received thirteen different wounds. Another witness was a carpenter in whose house Lingg lived, and who helped Lingg make the bombs. He testified that he helped carry the bombs to a rendezvous where they were left open for the men to help themselves. He said that but for a ruse he adopted, Lingg would have thrown a bomb into a patrol wagon that they met on their way home. A reporter also testified that he had seen dynamite bombs in the possession of Spies and Parsons, who told him they were to be used against the police. A detective who had joined the anarchists as a spy gave important evidence, showing that Spies had advocated the assassination of certain private persons obnoxious to the society. The trial lasted the whole week and excited the most profound interest.

Mr. Gladstone's Resignation has been Tendered to and accepted by the Queen. The promptitude with which Her Majesty sent her acceptance indicates that the resignation was very welcome to her. She has requested Lord Salisbury to undertake the Government. His course is beset with difficulties which he fully realizes. An attempt to govern the country without a majority in the House of Commons involves the liability to vexatious humiliations, because at any time that House can withhold funds for Government expenses and can embarrass the Cabinet in many other ways. If Lord Salisbury could rely on the support of the Liberal deserters he might hope to escape defeat, but at present there has been no statement published of any pledge being given. On the Irish question alone there is a majority in favor of the Government, and even upon that it is doubtful whether a majority would vote for coercion. There are 317 Tories in the House, 192 Gladstonites, 87 Parnellites, and 74 Liberal malcontents. As the entire House consists of 670 members the Tories are 19 short of a majority. In order to carry any measure over Mr. Gladstone's followers and the Irish members combined Lord Salisbury must have at least 57 votes from the Liberal deserters. It is evident, therefore, that the latter will hold in this Parliament the balance of power held by Mr. Parnell in the late Parliament. If they were to vote solid they could decide the fate of any measure.

The Fall of an Eminent English Statesman is definitely announced. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, the ablest man next to Mr. Gladstone in the Liberal Party, has been convicted by a jury of gross immorality and has sold his property and quitted England. An abandoned woman, whose behavior in court was characterized by shamelessness and levity, swore that she had committed adultery with him and another man. She was the wife of a member of Parliament who, on her confession, sued for and obtained a divorce. The jury apparently believed her statement, and the reports cabled here indicate that the judge coincided with them. Sir Charles Dilke emphatically and explicitly contradicted her and maintains still that he is the victim of a conspiracy gotten up to shield another man who is really guilty. He was, however, unable to prove his innocence, and is therefore ousted from public life. If he is really guilty his punishment is not too heavy, severe as it is. His loss will be a serious one to the Liberal Party. He is an admirer of republican institutions, and openly expressed his belief that they would be better for England than a monarchy.

The Tour of the Emperor of Germany through Baden, Wurtemberg, and Bavaria has evoked an outburst of enthusiasm rarely witnessed in Germany. Everywhere his coming was welcomed with ovations, and he has been warmly received by princes and people. At Munich he was entertained by the Prince Regent. The people, who have been somewhat jealous of the predominance of Prussia, forgot their old prejudices and made spontaneous demonstrations of loyal attachment. The demented King Otto could not be made to understand what was going on. He fancies himself a bird, and was busily occupied in building an enormous nest of twigs and dried leaves, in which he sits at night. In the daytime he hops about the palace garden flapping his arms and pretending to fly. Still, he is King of Bavaria, and with a little more sense he would be allowed to govern.

Deaths from Cholera Continue to Occur in Italy. Brindisi has the most fatal record. Last week the deaths were averaged sixty a day, and the number of new cases was increasing. At Fontana, Latiano, St. Vito, Codigoro, and Venice the epidemic has shown itself, though with a smaller proportion of deaths than at Brindisi. Quarantine against all Austrian and Italian ports has been declared at many ports.

Mr. Moody's Summer School for Bible Study at Mt. Hermon is doing profitable work. There are two hundred and fifty young men there representing the College Young Men's Christian Associations in twenty-five different States. About ninety colleges and training schools have sent delegates. Among them are Germans, English, Japanese, Chinese, Siamese, and American Indians. The arrangements are: Breakfast at seven, conference with Mr. Wishard, College Secretary of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., at eight, when methods of work, duties of officers and members are discussed; at nine, a singing class conducted by Professor Towner; from ten to twelve Bible study conducted by Mr. Moody, Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, or some other eminent theologian. The afternoon is given up to excursions in the neighborhood, boating, driving, games, etc. In the evening there are meetings of praise and prayer. The month at this school will be one never to be forgotten by any young man there and we may hope that its influence will be fruitful in consecrated activity.

The Assembly of the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor recently held at Saratoga, N. Y., showed marked progress not only in numbers but in spiritual devotion and activity. Over 500 persons were present. The organization comprises now 850 societies, with a total membership of about 60,000. It originated in a Congregational church at Portland, Me., with the object of enlisting in active service for Christ young Christians on entering the church. All who join the society pledge attendance and participation in the weekly prayer-meetings, unless detained at home by absolute necessity. The work is undenominational and is found among Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, etc. Each society is connected with some local church, and is, like the Sunday-school, under the control of the pastor. At the recent conference it was announced that the movement had spread to Ceylon, Turkey, and China.

A New Mission Church in Memorial of the late Mr. William H. Vanderbilt is to be erected by the Board of Trustees of the Mission for Seamen of the City and Port of New York, with the $50,000 which he bequeathed to the Mission. The building will be in West Houston, near West Street. The Mission has now a temporary chapel that was built several years ago at this place, but it is not large enough for the congregation that attends services there. When the new building is finished the present structure will be used for a library and reading-room for sailors. The Mission has now four lots, and another will be purchased, giving frontage of seventy and fifty feet for the new structure. A rectory will also be built in connection with the church.

A Valuable and Deeply Interesting Pamphlet of two hundred pages is sent to us by Mr. Richard C. Morse, the excellent secretary of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations. It contains a well-arranged report of the progress of the work during the past year, and a statement of its present condition. From this report it appears that 17 new buildings have been completed during the year, and 20 others are in course of erection. There are now 90 Association buildings in the United States and Canada, and the net value of Association property aggregates $5,040,178; 365 Associations own libraries of 272,624 volumes, worth $293,168; 444 reading-rooms, with a total daily average attendance of 22,587, are reported; 131 Associations report gymnasiums and other means of physical culture, and 592 report Bible-classes, with an aggregate average attendance of 7340; 487 men are devoting their whole time to the work as general secretaries, librarians, and gymnasium instructors. There are 1066 Associations in this country, including the College, Railroad, German, Colored, and Indian branches. The annual current expenses of these thousand societies amount to over $80,000.

The book also contains a list of Associations in foreign countries—650 of these are in Germany, 79 in France, 570 in Great Britain, 491 in Holland, 8 in Russia, 2 in China, 3 in Japan, 6 in India, 12 in Africa, 14 in Australia, etc.

An Interesting Experiment, Described in a scientific journal, has been made with the object of discovering the effect upon plants of saturating the soil in which they grow with certain chemicals. In the case described, the soil about the roots of a vine was manured with sulphate of copper. The result was watched with intense interest, because it was expected to throw light on some important agricultural problems. It is now stated that the leaves of the plant absorbed nearly all the metal, scarcely a trace of it being found in the juice of the grapes. The roots received it from the soil, but did not make an equal distribution of it, the green coloring substance of the leaves having some affinity with the metal which attracted it, while the fruit was not impregnated. Something like this is seen in the realm of grace. Position and circumstances sometimes affect the manner and speech of a Christian, producing an unfavorable impression of him, while he is nevertheless bringing forth good fruit. Happily, it is by the fruit that the tree is to be known (Matt. 7 : 20).

Two Applications for Naturalization were rejected in New York by Judge O'Gorman on July 22d. The applicants had been in this country the prescribed time, were well-behaved, intelligent, and eager to adjure allegiance to Queen Victoria, but when they were examined by the judge it appeared that neither of them had read the Constitution of the United States. The judge, therefore, refused to give them papers, as they could not truthfully swear that they were "attached to the principles of the Constitution" if they did not know what the principles of the Constitution were. The two men left the court and made a careful study of the document. The next day they presented themselves again and renewed their application. They informed the judge that they had read the Constitution and approved of the principles it sets forth. Judge O'Gorman having satisfied himself of the fact, administered the oath, and the two men were admitted to the rights and privileges of citizenship. No one can blame the judge for being unduly cautious. The conduct of some naturalized citizens indicates that they are either ignorant of the Constitution to which they swore loyalty, or that they have broken their oaths. Unhappily the same sad fact applies to citizenship in Christ's kingdom. The Church and the world would be far other than they are if everyone who professes Christianity understood and adopted the principles laid down by its Founder (Luke 14 : 27-33).

An Attempt to Row Around the World is to be made by a man named Richard Chandler, who is a native of Northampton, Mass. Nearly two years ago a physician of Bath, Me., provided a man with a rowboat at a cost of $300 on condition that he rowed across the Atlantic. The man set out, and as nothing has been heard of him, it is supposed that he was lost. Now Chandler has applied to the same doctor for a similar boat on the same conditions. "Crossing the Atlantic is only a small part of the voyage," said the doctor. "After arriving in England you are to go by water to the Mediterranean; across the Red Sea, through the Suez Canal, across the Indian Ocean and Southern Pacific to Australia; thence to Japan and China, and from there by steamer to San Francisco, then overland to the Mississippi, where the dory will be put into the water for you to row down that river to the Gulf, and around to New York." The terms were accepted, and the boat is being built for the perilous voyage. Chandler is sanguine of success. "He is to be supplied with life-suits, plenty of food, and all that he is likely to need," says the dispatch describing the arrangement. The primary need, however—that of strength and endurance to sustain the days and nights of ceaseless labor and watchfulness—the doctor cannot supply, so the man will probably be drowned. It is so in the voyage of life. Parents may give their children wealth, education, and careful training to fit them for the voyage, but safety can be assured only by grace, which God alone can give (Jude 24).

A Personal Appeal to the President was Made at one of his recent receptions by a lady who was alarmed by the freedom with which he has recently exercised his veto power. It was near the end of the reception when an old lady in black, followed by seven children, came slowly along to shake hands with the President. When she got fairly in front of him she said, "I have come in person to see you. I am a poor widow, and my bill for a pension is before you. In the name of justice I ask you not to veto it. These are my children, and they depend on me for support." The President looked uncomfortable for a while, and said something in an undertone. The old lady gave him her card, and passed on with a happy smile on her face. It is thought the President will not veto her bill. The old lady was wise. No pension agent nor any man of influence could have done so much for her as her visit to the President himself. If Christian men would adopt the same principle in their straits they would save themselves many disappointments. Those who place no dependence on men, but go straight to God Himself for help, are sure of deliverance (Ps. 118 : 6-9).

The Groundless Terror of two Elephants afforded amusement to the visitors at the Zoological Garden, Philadelphia, on July 19th. "It is a well-known fact that elephants are afraid of small objects," says the head keeper at the garden, "and I have seen one of them almost scared into a fit at the sight of a mouse. These warm days we have been giving them a bath every afternoon. We threw half a dozen inflated bladders into the pond when they went in to swim. At first they almost scared them to death. Then Empress struck at one with her trunk, and when it bounded into the air both trumpeted and scrambled out of the pond. To-day Empress, who has the curiosity of her sex and a mind of her own, gently fished one of the bladders out of the water and then kicked at it with her hind feet. No serious results following, she continued her investigations, which ended by her putting her front foot on the bladder. It exploded with a loud report, and the two elephants scampered home in abject terror." Power and moral courage are not always united, it appears, in beasts any more than they are in men. God has the power to make the heart faint, and He has frequently used it for the protection of His people when some mighty foe threatened to crush them (Lev. 26 : 36).

A Literal Enforcement of the Levitical Law was made a few days ago in the office of a dentist at Cheyenne. A cowboy suffering from toothache consulted a practitioner who examined his mouth and informed him that a hollow tooth ought to be filled. The cowboy consented, and the dentist drilled a hole in it. He did it so clumsily that he caused the man severe pain, and eventually broke the tooth to pieces. The patient would not allow him to do any more and went to another dentist, who, on making an examination, told the cowboy that the wrong tooth had been operated upon, and that the other dentist must be an impostor. The aching tooth was extracted, and then the cowboy returned to the first man he had consulted. He upbraided him with his clumsiness, knocked him down, and, seizing the forceps, extracted one of his teeth. The dentist's cries brought in the neighbors, who rescued him just as the cowboy was preparing to draw a second tooth. The language of the cowboy proved that he was not a Bible-reader, and probably he had never heard of the law "tooth for tooth" (Ex. 21 : 24), nor of its abrogation (Matt. 5 : 38, 39). The former he would learn from his own heart and the conduct of the people around him, the latter he might learn from the Bible and, we wish we could add, from the life of any Christian man (1 Peter 2 : 19-23).

WASHED TO GREATER FOULNESS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so clean; yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me."—JOB 9: 30, 31.

A Private Message—For a Desperate Man—I. Quickened Souls Conscious of Guilt—A Lady's Contradictory Confession—The Benighted Times—Light in a Dark Basement—Horror the Way to Life—II. Use Ineffectual Means for Cleansing—The Snow Water—Hard to Get—Reputed Pure—Descends from the Clouds—III. Are Plunged in a Ditch—IV. Are Led to Look Alone to God for Cleansing.

I FEEL certain that I am sent on a special errand at this time. Before my mind's eye I see a soul whose awful reflections are hurrying him to despair. He refuses counsel, and will not listen to direction, for dread has made him desperate. I would have a word in the ear of that worried and wearied one. See ye not the man? He has battled long against a dark temptation, but at last he is beaten. He feels that he can hold out no longer. He can scarcely take breath; the air grows hot and stifling around him, as he faces the question—what next? Accustomed as I am to look down on these crowded aisles and up at these closely-packed galleries, I feel a strange curiosity as I gaze into the mass; for I know that there is one man among all of you to whom I have

A PRIVATE MESSAGE.

I carry despatches from the King of kings to one who is grievously troubled, and is become as a woman forsaken and despaired.

From my experience, as a patient myself, smitten down with soul-sickness; and from my observation as a pastor, into whose ears the woes of awakened sinners are constantly poured, I have somewhat learned to understand the imagery of Job. The sufferer is in double straits. While he is tossed about by Satan, his friends are discharging their arrows at him, and the Almighty troubleth him. To help such a sufferer we must be careful to distinguish between the causes of his sorrow, and divide between his affliction itself and the further sorrows which he has brought upon himself by his unwise efforts to escape from it.

I. At the outset, then, we observe that quickened souls are CONSCIOUS OF GUILT.

They see it; they know it; they feel it, and they blush to find that they are without excuse for it. All men are sinners; to most men, however, sin appears to be a fashion of the times, a necessity of nature, a folly of youth, or an infirmity of age, which a slight apology will suffice to remove. You will scarcely meet with a man who will not acknowledge that he is a sinner. But it is one thing to call yourself a sinner, and quite another thing to feel it.

I have heard of a lady who owned to her minister that she was a great sinner. He questioned her kindly as to which of the ten commands she had broken. Beginning with the first, he asked her, "Did you ever break this?" to which inquiry she indignantly answered, "No." In like manner he dealt with the second, and right through the whole ten. She professed in detail to have observed each one, and yet pretended to confess that she had broken them all. By such equivocations multitudes of men and women deceive themselves, and it is unhappily the custom of many a preacher to address his congregation as if they were all good people, and every one of them knew the Lord, from the least even to the greatest. This is pleasing to the flesh, and flattering to pride; but it is most pernicious. How many are being deceived by this want of marking a difference where a vital difference exists!

Not till men are quickened by divine grace do they truly know that they are sinners. How is this? Some diseases are so insidious that the sufferers fancy that they are getting better, while in very truth they are hastening to the grave. After such manner does sin deceive the sons of men; they think they are saved when they are still unrenewed. How often have I seen a poor girl, whose pale face, sunken eyes, shadowy hand, and languid step have clearly betokened that she was on the brink of death, yet she mistook the flush of consumption for the ruddiness of health. Slowly she waned; but within a day of her departure she planned cheerful projects which proved that she looked for life. Consumption is not, however, so deceitful as sin. Where it has full power over the soul, "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?" If sin were not so deceitful it would not be half so destructive as it is.

How is this? we inquire once more. To natural ignorance we may attribute much of the ordinary indifference of men to their own sinfulness. They live in

A BENIGHTED AGE.

In vain you boast the enlightenment of this nineteenth century; the nineteenth century is not one whit more enlightened as to the depravity of human nature than the first century. Men are as ignorant of the plague of their own hearts to-day as they were when Paul addressed them. I know that almost every man you meet with talks as if he were qualified to set up for a doctor of divinity; but is not this the confidence of ignorance? Many persons seem startled, and try to think that they misunderstand us when we say plainly that in the very best man in the world there is no virtue or grace that can be pleasing to God, unless he has been made a new creature in Christ Jesus. Does not this alarm you? It ought to do so.

How comes it to pass, then, that the best of saints on earth are prone to account themselves the chief of sinners? Their sincerity is unquestionable. This discovery is due to the Holy Spirit. The moment the Spirit of God comes into a man, the scales fall from his eyes, and he sees himself in quite a different light. To each saved soul it seems

A STRANGE MIRACLE.

I have heard the story from simple lips many a time. The new self talks of the old self with a kind of vacant wonderment. Yesterday our friend was on good terms with himself as a virtuous citizen, an honest trader, a sound churchman; in moral worth all that his neighbors could wish. To-day he is vile in his own sight; his hands are filthy, his heart is foul, his thoughts are loathsome. He perceives that he has been walking in a vain show, and therefore he writes himself down a hypocrite. No name too base by which to surname himself.

You may walk through a dark cellar without discerning by the eye that anything noisome is there concealed. Let the shutters be thrown open! Bid the light of day stream in! You soon perceive frogs upon the cold, clammy pavement, filthy cobwebs hanging on the walls in long festoons, foul vermin creeping about everywhere. Startled, alarmed, horrified, who would not wish to flee away, and find a healthier atmosphere? The rays of the sun are, however, but a faint image of that light divine shed by the Holy Spirit, which penetrates the thickest shades of human folly and infatuation, and exposes the treachery of the inmost heart. Then the soul cries out in agony, "Oh wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" When brought to feel this, we think our doom is sealed, and everlasting destruction is close upon us. But it is not so. This is

THE WAY OF HOPE.

Through death to life every saved soul must pass. Ask us not to paint the sensations; nor blame us if we usually describe that experience which is most distinct. Sharp conviction, fainting heart, struggling hope, fear that haunts, terror that appals—an awful fight of fiercely strange emotions! This is the extreme measure of the life-change. In milder form, with one decisive pang the true heart is born again.

The Slough of Despond lies across every pilgrim's pathway. The years or hours it takes to wade through it must be left an open question.

Sudden death is an occasional fact, but more frequently the saints are peacefully welcomed to the realms above; so, in the Church on earth, sudden conversions happen, but, as a rule, men pass gradually into the kingdom of God. Between the sensual and the spiritual there is a great gulf, and it must be passed. Of the wind or weather in which you make the passage it is not for me to speak; the voyage may be long or short; but in some sort the gulf must be traversed. Conviction of sin is of the first importance; it cannot be dispensed with.

II. We pass on to notice that it often happens that awakened souls use many to obtain cleansing. Job describes himself as washing in snow water, and making his hands never so clean. His expressions remind me of my own labor in vain. By how many experiments I tried to purify my own soul! Like all my fellows, I was always foiled in every attempt. See a squirrel in a cage; the poor thing is working away, trying to mount, yet he never rises one inch higher. In like case is the sinner who seeks to save himself by his own good works, or by any other means; he toils without result. It is astonishing what pains men will take in this useless drudgery. They prevent the dawn of day in their anxiety to attend matins or observe mass; they are austere in their fastings; they say prayers without stint and do penance to the full. The labor of the foolish in spinning a righteousness of their own, that is neither accredited by the divine law nor by the holy Gospel, is almost incredible; they would rather give their bodies to be burned and their goods to feed the poor, than submit to salvation by grace, though it is the only possible salvation.

In seeking to obtain absolution of their sins, to establish a righteousness of their own, and to secure peace of mind, men tax their ingenuity to the utmost. Job talks of washing himself with

SNOW WATER.

The imagery is, no doubt, meant to be instructive. Why is snow water selected? The reason probably was, first, because it was hard to get. Far easier, generally, to procure water from the running brooks than from melted snow. Men set a high value on that which is difficult to procure. Forms of worship which are expensive and difficult are greatly affected by many, as snow water was thought in Job's day to be a bath for kings; but, after all, it is an idle fashion, likely to mislead.

Besides, snow water enjoyed a reputation for purity. If you would have a natural filtered water gather the newly-fallen snow and melt it. The figure represents the religiousness which is of the most rigid kind—the cream of the cream. Specimens yet remain among us of piety more than possible to men, religiousness above the range of mortals; which piety is, however, not of God's grace, and consequently is a vain show. Though we should use the purest ceremonies, multiply the best of good works, and add thereto the costliest of gifts, yet we should be unable to make ourselves clean before God.

Once again, this snow water is probably extolled because it

of heaven, instead of bubbling up from the clods of earth. Religiousness which can color itself with an appearance of the supernatural is very taking with many. Some folks are fond of apostolical succession; it professes to come from heaven. No doubt the notion originated in cloudland. Others are fascinated by popery. His holiness the Pope is accounted to be a great cistern, full of grace, which is distilled in streams, and runs through capacious pipes called cardinals, and then through smaller tubes, styled bishops. At length by the still smaller pipes of the priests it comes to the people. No pretext was ever more paltry than this, and yet many are deceived by it. There is no peace in it for thoughtful minds.

If I "make my hands never so clean," is an expression peculiarly racy in the original. The Hebrew word has an allusion to soap or nitre.

Such was the ordinary and obvious method any one would take to whiten his hands when they were grimy. Tradition tells that certain stains of blood cleave to the floor. The idea is that human blood, shed in murder, can never be scrubbed or scraped off the boards. Thus it is most certainly with the dye of sin. These worthless experiments to cleanse yourselves would be ended once for all if you would have regard to the great truth of the Gospel: "Without shedding of blood there is no remission." "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." God alone can remove sin, and He does so by the blood of Jesus.

III. But as sure as ever quickened souls try to get purity in the wrong way, God will thrust them down INTO THE DITCH.

This is a terrible predicament. I find, on looking at the passage closely, that it means "head over ears in the ditch." It is not merely some filthy puddle in which a man treads till he is splashed all over, it is a slough of despond into which he sinks. His eyes, his ears, and his mouth, are filled with pollution; and his very clothes are so foul that he utterly abhors himself.

Often it happens with those who try to get better by their own good works, that their conscience is awakened by the effort, and they are more conscious of sin than ever. If a chosen man strives to save himself from his sins by his own righteousness the Lord permits him to see his own heart and he ceases from all glorying. "THOU shalt plunge me in the ditch." Is it not as though God Himself would undertake the business of causing His people to know that by their vain ablations they were making themselves yet more vile in His eyes?

Frequently our great Lord leaves a poor wayward soul to eat the fruits of its own ways, and this is the severest form of plunging in the ditch. While striving after righteousness in a wrong way, the man stumbles into the very sin against which he struggled. The young man, of whom I am now thinking, resolved, by the help of God, that he would be different henceforth from what he ever had been. His vows kept pace with his devotions. He started them at early morn—

"And felt, good, easy man, full surely His goodness was a-ripening."

To the shop he went, as was his wont; but his thoughts were no longer set on earthly things; he stood, as he supposed, on heavenly ground. Because he had taken snow water and had washed his hands, he began to think that he was singularly clean. Toward evening a temptation suddenly crossed his path. At first he resisted, but it proved a feeble fight. The argument of another young man, that it was policy to yield, availed to break the covenant he had made with his own conscience. So he was led astray to a place of amusement, where the light of God's countenance never shines. The wretchedness of his reflections on the morrow could not easily be told.

Our lives through various scenes are drawn and vexed with petty provocations. Paltry annoyances are the bane of our peace. Some of you, dear sisters, spend your years and your thoughts in a narrow circle, and I deeply sympathize with you therein. The lot of many of you is to pass much of your time in loneliness; your temptations are therefore peculiar. For many a quiet hour you have been busy with domestic employments, distracted by no acute anxiety, but cheered by much quiet meditation. At such seasons you are apt to get on good terms with yourselves. Presently the shades of evening begin to fall. Evening! of which Cowper sweetly sings:

"Come, evening, once again, season of peace, Return, sweet evening, and continue long!"

You are prepared to welcome home the husband, brother, son, who will look for his repast, and seek his well-earned repose. Possibly, my sisters, this is your season of temptation. His rough word, his needless complaint, his vacant look, when you pine for sympathy puts you about. A sense of injustice stings you. It may be very natural, but all the same to your sense of superior goodness. What more treacherous than one's temper? In a sudden gust of passion, you utter words of anger. How gladly would you recall them! but they are registered. Down into the ditch of despondency you sink. For days to come you feel that you cannot forgive yourself. Your rich mantle of righteousness after this tumble in the ditch looks mean enough to provoke your own ridicule.

Persons of sensitive disposition, and sedentary habits, are prone to seek a righteousness of inward feeling. Let me describe these good folks to you. They aim at a righteousness that renounces every fault, and they cultivate such graces as are naturally lovely, watching from moment to moment their own feelings of joy or grief. Yet these be they who get to know, with the keenest anguish, the plague of their own hearts. How it happens is sufficiently clear. One day you are all aglow, the flush of fervor is on your face; the next day you feel so dead and cold that prayer would freeze upon your lips. Your evidences are dark. You think you have none, and, seized with despondency, you lament that "there is no hope." Ah, me! the sin-sick soul, given to watch its own symptoms, is brought into perilous straits.

Let us not forget that the man who thus described his own case "was perfect and upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil." Such a case is a puzzle to those who are not enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Although Job was renowned for righteousness in his generation, a gleam from God's countenance exposed the faultiness of his soul. Does this prove him to have been a hypocrite? By no means. He appears before us at first in the vigor of health, in the height of prosperity, and in the charm of good repute. But oh, the vanity of man! At a touch of God's finger, his flesh develops a festering mass of corruption; at a glance of God's eye, which searched him through and through, the total depravity of human nature at its best estate becomes apparent. "He abhors himself in dust and ashes." What next? Utter ruin? Nay, friend, it is full redemption.

IV. By such severe training the awakened one is led to for salvation, and to find the salvation he looks for. This is my last point, and I have no time left to enlarge upon it. What I want is that the truth may flash across your mind in a moment. There sits the man who is menaced with despair because every effort to extricate himself from the tangled web of his own strange experience has left him worse than before. Did I attempt to comfort him he would repel my kindest expressions. And why? He knows that it is God who condemns him. In a British court of justice, when the judge sums up against the prisoner, small cheer can he get from the honeyed words of his counsel. But hark—"It is God that justifieth." Whom does He justify? The ungodly. He first condemns them in their own consciences; and then He justifies them according to His grace.

I want you to notice a simple fact which seems to me to have escaped your observation. When the Almighty justified Job He commended him, and pronounced a high encomium on his conduct. Whatever mistakes he made about himself or his circumstances, in one matter he was clear as a bell; He has spoken right of me, saith the Lord. (Job 42:7.) Eliphaz and his friends transgressed in this respect. Hearken unto me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek it in yourselves, you are all on the wrong track. You begin below with the whole duty of man, and try to work upward; you are sure to fail. You should begin up yonder, with the righteousness of God; and then you could work downward to righteousness of daily life. God give you knowledge of salvation by grace, to the glory of His own name, and to your own sanctification, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

"POLICEMAN WEMER arraigned before Justice O'Reilly, in the Tombs Police Court, yesterday, twelve filthy looking women. He charged them all with drunkenness. Justice O'Reilly sentenced them to the Island for one month. The janitor of the Tombs sprinkled carbolic acid about the room after the women were led off to jail."—Evening Telegram, New York.

"To-day when the car-driver, R—, arose to plead drunkenness, induced by want and overwork, in palliation of the crime for which he was to be sentenced, a baby voice cried out from down in the dirty crowd: 'Oh, mamma, dar's poor papa! Papa, tome and tiss baby.' But 'poor papa' was sent away from 'baby' fifteen years for his drunken crime. And we stop here to wonder where and what 'baby' will be when he comes back from State's prison."

But let us not multiply these daily reports. These are given merely as an example of the life here, the death here—the death of soul; the death of body and soul. These two examples are both from the lowly walks of life—the lowest, perhaps.

Let us now take two from the higher walks of life—the highest, perhaps—and then you can guess fairly well what lies between. By striking the highest possible average you can see clearly that a city lies here in the shadow of its doom; that its destruction is not far off if this condition of things long prevails. But here are the two examples of life from the higher walks. We quote from private letters:

"You should have come to the great dinner. It was the greatest affair that has ever been. Rome, in her palmy days was surpassed in every particular. It was a great mistake for you to have said what you did; for, beside the honor and the remembrance of the gorgeous event, we had at least fifty kinds of wines, to say nothing of the brandies, the Benedictines, the liquors of all names, nations, and cellars. I am told the dinner cost $80,000. The Herald puts it at a round hundred thousand. Read its ten-column account of it. My head aches too much to write more now."

"You are entirely in the wrong about your great-little man 'Stone' of Wall Street. His habits are most exemplary. And if he has got hold of your money in Wall Street, why he has done no more than you or any other man would have done with his money if you only could have beaten him. No, my friend, the fact is that the little giant of Wall Street has more money-brains than you and his other enemies, so be manly enough to admit it and let him alone; for he has his load in life to bear as well as you and the others. Do you think it any easy thing to take care of fifty railroads and fifty millions of dollars?"

Dear and indulgent reader, from the foregoing notes you can gather the argument of this story, I think; motive enough surely to make a sketch of; a condition of things surely to challenge the pity and the help of every brave heart, and strong, clear head in this wondrous new land of ours.

The great city lies trembling, panting, quivering in her wild, white heat of intoxication, excitement, madness—drunken and devilish pursuits of power, pleasure, and gold.

It is the old story of the destruction of one whom the gods love. Never grew a city so great, so suddenly great. And her glory, her greatness, her sudden power and splendor have made her mad. She is drunk; not drunk entirely with drink, but she is drunk with riches and with the love of pleasure. Altogether, she is madly, desperately drunk.

* From "The Destruction of Gotham," by Joaquim Miller, a lurid description of the goal to which a city must be tending, which is made up of two classes widely separated in social condition. Pp. 214. Price, $1; Published by Funk & Wagnalls, Dey St., New York.

Miss Journaux, the Jersey Castaway—Her Forty Hours' Drift and Rescue.

And where will it end? Where have such things always ended? Nay, do not turn back too hastily into history for the thousand examples there. You remember Paris? her twenty-five years of glory, recklessness, irreligion, ill-gotten riches? and then the conflagration!

In conversation with Gambetta soon after the murder of the bishops, the battles in the graveyards, where Parisians, slain by Parisians, lay as thick on top of the ground as under it, the great dictator told me that the new Paris had been built in madness, and so was burned in madness.

"Belleville," he cried, with energy, "should never have been left out there to herself! Champs Elysees should never have been permitted to exist apart from the people! The two should have been mixed up together, so that the poor could have shared the cares of the rich, and the rich the cares of the poor."

No; the people will not go out of the cities now; for it is the people who build the cities; and the people will possess them. If either class is compelled to retire, it will not be the poor—the people. Here in this wonderful city you have all the wealth at one end. You have all the poverty at the other. The poor are in the majority—"we, the people!" The distance between the rich and the poor is not great.

Hunger, oppression, drunkenness; a hundred drunken men; a puff of smoke! The end! In this story, as you follow poor "Dot" in her flight up Broadway and up on Fifth Avenue, pursued by the red-faced monster, you must keep in mind this condition of things; also this madness, this wild fever-heat, and this excitement, this drunkenness, where men, women—all things are strung up to a tension that is terrible to bear.

This desperate pursuit of wealth, this constant and prevailing resort to stimulants, even by the most "exemplary," has made an order of life that is new upon earth. The blood in men's veins is at fever-heat. This drives them on to the consummation of deeds that have no parallel, that have had no historian.

But I have kept back this ugly and offensive beast in the dark places as far as possible. We catch a breath of the fumes of alcohol only as we hastily pass up and down Fifth Avenue now and then, and that is about all. More than that might offend just now, and mar the force of the story. But I am willing that you shall understand very clearly, and from the first, and all the time, that the paragraph at the head of this prologue is the argument and excuse for this work.

A TURKISH BEY AND A COLPORTEUR.

MR. COLE, of the Eastern Turkey Mission, who is laboring at Bitlis, writing under the date of April 5th to the Missionary Herald, mentions a remarkable instance of the failure of an attempt to stop the sale of God's Word. He says: "Certain Armenians complained to the Bey that a Protestant bookseller was in the village, selling books, turning people away from their religion, etc. He at once summoned the man with his books into his presence. The poor man trembled at such an ordeal, not knowing what might be done. Judge of his surprise when, after fumbling over the books, the Bey eagerly selected a Turkish Testament, and holding it up said: 'This is just what I have been seeking for a long time.' Gladly paying the price of it, he showed it to the Armenians, saying, 'This is just what I have been wanting; now you see if I do not meet your priests in argument!' True to his word, we heard of him as practising polemics with parties here and there; and, when they essayed to touch his new-found Testament, he would ask them if they had washed their hands that they should touch the Holy Book. Turks are thus very particular as to their Koran. When the Kourds saw that their chief had purchased a Testament, they, too, began to see/ one; but no more were at hand. Thus it was that the betrayers unintentionally became hawkers of God's Word, and helped on the man's work they hoped to get punished.

MISS JOURNAUX, THE JERSEY CAST-AWAY.

(See Illustration.)

THE incident depicted in the above illustration was briefly described in our news columns (May 27th, p. 329), at the time of its occurrence. Fuller details are given in the European newspapers now received. It appears that on Sunday evening, April 18th, after attending divine worship, Miss Louise Journaux, a young lady residing in Jersey, an island near the coast of France, left the Victoria Pier at St. Helier's with a young man named Jules Farne, in a rowing-boat. They were accompanied by another boat, in which were two friends—a young lady and gentleman. Farne rowed out some distance farther from the shore than the others, and when lying off the coast at a point between the Victoria and Albert Piers, he let one of his oars fall overboard. In attempting to recover it he lost the other. Being a good swimmer, he at once sprang into the water and swam after the oars. Before he had secured them, however, the boat drifted seaward, leaving Farne some distance behind (see Illustration No. 2).

The terrified young lady heard his shouts but was unable to do anything. The boat was carried out to sea, and the young man was left behind. Seeing that it was impossible to overtake the boat, Farne swam to the shore, and related the circumstances. The story seemed so improbable that Farne was arrested on the charge of murdering Miss Journaux, and was held for trial.

The boat in which Miss Journaux was continued its helpless course with the tide all that Sunday night. Happily for her the sea was calm, or the boat would have been swamped. The breaking of day brought her a gleam of hope. She thought that in the crowded channel she must surely be seen from some ship. Once she did see a ship which she supposed to be the mail steamer from Southampton to Jersey. She waved her handkerchief (see Illustration No. 3), but failed to gain attention. During the long hours of Monday and Monday night she saw no other vessels, and began to despair, believing that her boat must have drifted out of the track of the steamers.

Tuesday morning broke with no prospect of deliverance, but before noon her hopes were again raised by the sight of a sail. Her anxiety may be imagined. She felt that if that ship left her she must die of starvation, if she were not drowned. Moments passed that seemed like hours, while she waved her handkerchief and shouted. At last to her intense joy her ears caught the answering shout that told her she was observed. She saw that they were lowering a boat to come to her assistance (see Illustration No. 4). The vessel proved to be the Tombola, of St. Malo, Captain Landgren, bound for Canada. Miss Journaux was hospitably received on board, and after her forty hours of drifting ate and slept once more in peace. Twenty-six days afterward she was transferred to a passing steamer, and on May 19th was safely landed at St. George's Bay, Newfoundland (see Illustration No. 5).

The news of her strange experience and safe arrival was cabled to Europe, and none of her friends could have received it with more joy than Mr. Farne, to whose carelessness her peril and suffering were due. It vindicated him, and he was immediately released from custody. Miss Journaux returned to Europe by the next steamer, and it may be hoped that, led to serious reflection by her almost miraculous escape, she will in future be too much occupied with Christian service on the Lord's day to go on boating excursions.

A KING'S SLUMBER DISTURBED.

(See Illustration.)

THE Irishman who, being asked on his arrival in a new country what his politics were, replied, "I don't know, but I'm agin the Government," may be a fictitious personage, but, if not, he gave a characteristic answer. The Irish, as a rule, are opposed to the Government, and they have often done good work in many lands resisting tyranny and oppression. The Christian clergy are, as a rule, the very reverse of this disposition, as is their duty (1 Peter 2:13, 14). They would rather suffer oppression than resist it, and they have apostolic authority for that course (Rom. 13:1, 2). It has happened, however, at least once in history, that they have been placed in a dilemma, and while sincerely desiring to do right were in doubt as to what was right.

The instance referred to was in Great Britain in the seventeenth century. King James II., the most despicable of all the Stuarts, had, by his intolerance and disregard of right, driven his subjects into rebellion. They declared his deposition, invited the next heir to the throne, his daughter Mary and her husband, William Prince of Orange, to take his place. James ran away like the craven that he was, and William and Mary were crowned king and queen. Then came the difficulty. The clergy were commanded in the Bible to honor the king—but which king? The old king, who was king by right, or King William who had been made king by the Parliament? This difficulty was felt most severely in Scotland.

The prudent course of the king would have been to let matters alone, and content himself with the allegiance of the clergy without requiring them to pronounce his title to the crown a just one. William being one of the wisest men who ever wore a crown would have taken this course had he possessed sufficient accurate information, but he knew little of Scotch affairs, and was busily engaged with Continental politics which he did understand. He was, however, an excellent judge of men, and placed implicit reliance in Scotch matters on William Carstairs, a Presbyterian clergyman of remarkable ability, whose influence with the king was so potent that his enemies nicknamed him "The Cardinal." At the supreme crisis of affairs, Carstairs was absent on the king's business, and the meddlesome bigots who swarm about a court took advantage of his absence to persuade the king to an act foreign to his nature. They knew the dilemma in which the clergy were placed, and desiring their destruction urged William to require them to take the oath of allegiance. William consented, and the oath was so worded as to pledge the person taking it to the assertion that William was king by right. The king was tricked by selfish intriguers, as Ahasuerus was tricked by Haman.

The letters were signed by William and sent to Scotland. In a few days the country would have been in a turmoil, and numbers of good, inoffensive men would have been expelled from their pulpits and parsonages. God interposed as He did at Shushan the palace. Carstairs returned to London late on the night when the king's messengers were starting to Scotland. He heard what had been done, and knew there was no time to be lost. If the messengers once left London the facilities of travel they enjoyed would prevent their being overtaken. There was no time to consult the king. Carstairs, therefore, took a course full of danger to himself. He went to the messengers, and, in the king's name, required them to give him the packet for Scotland. They knew his intimacy with the king, and supposing that William had sent him they obeyed.

With the precious packet in his hands, Carstairs went to the royal palace, and heard that the king had retired. He begged for an audience, and William admitted him to his bed-chamber. Throwing himself on his knees by the bedside (see illustration), he told the king what he had done, and besought pardon. The king listened, understood his motives, and not only pardoned him but told him to throw the dispatches into the fire. The heroic courage that prompted a man to commit a capital offence that he might save his brethren has made the name of William Carstairs glorious in history.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.*

College Life.

LEROY was not disappointed in his hopes of the point at which he would commence his studies in the N. S. College. His examination proved that he was sufficiently advanced to take his place with the students who were in the third term of the Junior year. Charles Kingsley makes the immortal Sandy Mackaye observe, "A man kens just as much as he's taught himself' and na mair," and there is truth in the saying, whether it is applied to a man in college or out. "You may take a horse to the water," says the old adage, "but you cannot make him drink." Leroy was thirsty, and had been looking for the water of knowledge by himself; he was now to have guidance. That was what he wanted. Self-education is a toilsome process and slow withal. He was conscious that time had been lost in solving difficulties which an experienced professor would have explained in a few words. He lamented the loss of the precious time but he gloried in the strength he had gained. It was certainly a triumph that alone and unaided he had climbed as far as the young men with whom he was now to study.

His room-mate was congenial. That was an important matter. Leroy rejoiced in it beyond measure. True, it might have been better had there been less congeniality. Intelligent opposition is a strengthening discipline, unpleasant at times but invigorating. As it was, Leroy found no occasion in his room to stand to his defences or to ascertain whether his opinions were true or not. Henry S. Burt, his new friend, was, like himself, a sceptic, and like himself was thoroughly in earnest in his scepticism. They encouraged each other in that attitude of hostility to religion, and both made rapid progress in the sad road of unbelief.

Some weeks passed, when one Sunday evening our two young sceptics went to church chiefly for the purpose of criticism. As they sat waiting for the services to begin, a young lady entered, and walked up the opposite aisle about half-way to the front. Leroy watched her until she was seated, and then he mentally ejaculated, "What a singular looking girl! I never saw a young woman like her. Whom can she be?"

As the services proceeded he grew interested in them, and, what with criticising the sermon and arguing on the way home with his chum, he forgot all about the mysterious lady.

One evening a few days later, he crossed the street to a store to make a purchase, when, to his surprise, the young lady whom he had noticed in church entered with a friend. Leroy eyed her as intently as courtesy would allow, and thought she certainly was different from any creature, of whatever species, he had ever seen. She laughed and talked gaily, though not unbecomingly, made a few purchases, and departed. Leroy went to his room and said to his chum:

"Henry, I've seen a strange creature!"

"Why, what? A mediæval fiend or a modern bigot?"

"Oh, hush, you miserable scoffer!" scolded Leroy. "No, it was neither, but a girl, a real live girl; and yet she didn't seem real. There's something un-understandable about her—what a Scotchman would call uncanny. She must be a foreigner, or, if such a thing were possible, a wanderer from another world. I couldn't help but think of Plato's Atlantis, the lost continent, and my opinion is she has escaped from that country at the bottom of the sea."

"Why, what an extraordinary being she must be!" laughed Burt. "But, come, let the feminine gender go now, and let's get at something more masculine."

The subject was dismissed and soon passed from the minds of both.

Leroy Ransom had, of course, joined the Franklin Literary Society connected with the college. It was a social association which gave a public entertainment every alternate week in Literary Hall. This hall was generally filled by the students and people of the village. The students of both sexes prepared elaborately for these public exercises. It was an institution adapted to prepare young men and women for public duties in after life, and it is a pity that all our colleges do not have these literary facilities. How many secluded, even anchorite, educational institutions go along in a dull routine of recitation, while the outside world knows as little about their life and work as if they were actual monasteries. How often, too, a young man who can really interest a little gathering of students, is perfectly helpless through lack of practice when before a public audience. Let college workers all understand that literary facilities, especially of a public character, are a great magnet to draw students of bright talents and high ambition. In this respect the N. S. College was a model institution.

Come with us, then, to this literary society on a pleasant Friday evening. As Leroy's roommate is otherwise engaged, our hero-doubter goes to the meeting to-night with another young man whose acquaintance he has formed since he came to Clayville, and toward whom he entertains strong feelings of friendship. As they walk up the campus, arms locked, Leroy says,

"Train, are you on performance to-night?"

"Yes," replied Francis Train, "I'm on debate, and what a half-witted question we have: 'Resolved, That the Government should have a special fund for the benefit of struggling genius.' Who cares for struggling geniuses? Let them struggle their way through as we do who are not geniuses. I'm glad I am on the negative side of that question."

By this time they have reached the building and are going up the long flights of stairs. They enter the hall. How many voices were wont to resound there that are now heard in the great struggle of active life, while some are hushed forever. There is a bust of the great statesman and philosopher after whom the society was named, Franklin. The hall was about full of people; students were hurrying to and fro as if on the most urgent business. Some of them walked as if the welfare of the state depended on their speed; and, doubtless, some of them took on airs of business, while they actually had no business but in their own imagination.

At length the president and secretary took their seats on the platform. A small bell was rung and the audience became quiet. Dr. Lester, president of the college, opened with prayer. Leroy sneered at the prayer, and wondered what religion had to do with the exercises that evening. We wish to observe here that there was one good thing that characterized the N. S. College, and that was, the members of the faculty took a deep interest in the literary exercises. They were nearly always present at these public meetings and frequently participated.

Business was despatched in a hurry, and then the declaimers were called to the stage. There were usually four—two of each sex. One declaimed the latter part of Webster's reply to Hayne, which had perhaps been rehearsed a hundred times in that very hall. A young woman recited "Over the Hill to the Poorhouse." Then, perhaps, came "Tom's Come Home," or "Bridge of Sighs." Trowbridge's "Peewee" was recited by a young lady who gave such a perfect imitation of the favorite spring warbler that, as she closed, the audience shouted and clapped their hands.

Then the debaters were called to the stage. The president announced the question. The first speaker, being a novice, caused some fun by his blunders. He was utterly overcome by nervous agitation. He had to put his hand in his coat-tail pocket, then feel his necktie, then adjust the lapel of his coat, then get his handkerchief and wipe his nose, and at last he commenced driving with a runaway ox-cart through all grammatical and rhetorical proprieties, dashing a rule of syntax to pieces here, breaking a sentence to flinders there, putting Webster's rules of pronunciation to shame by misrules that were perfectly original as well as accidental, "playing hob" with the rules of gesticulation, until at last, with a face as red as a beet, he came to his peroration. It was something like this:

"As I—I didn't study much on—on—this subject, and I never debated little. We don't need to say much on our side—the subject—the judges knows which is—is—the best—bes—tside of it. I leave the floor to my worthy deponent—expo—opponent; but, judges—honorable judges—don't let yourselves be hoodwinked by them on this great and important—portant question. Therefore, I think my colleges—my colleagues—will give this great question—will give it—well—consideration. And consequently, I will leave the more worthy floor—or the floor—to a more worthy speaker."

Which brilliant effort was punctuated by a very large exclamation point of applause, while the speaker wiped the perspiration from his brow.

We will not stop to describe the success or failure of the next two speakers, but will come at once to the chief debater, Frank Train. He was not very eloquent, but was a general favorite with the audience notwithstanding; for he was full of jollity. We must give a few sentences from his pointed speech.

"Struggling geniuses! let them struggle. It will do them good. Let them bind wheat on a hot harvest day until they're as limber as mother's dish-rag. It would be a splendid conceit-exterminator. Struggling genius want help! Shame on the man who calls himself a genius and yet wants his government to carry him on a palanquin to the lap of fame. Ah, sirs, a genius parodies the name he would bear, who has not genius enough to work his way up with dauntless purpose to honorable fame and nobleness of soul. Oh, these poor, would-be protégés of the Government!

"The best way to decide this question, as well as all such questions, is to suppose we had such an institution as a Struggling Genius Government Fund, and to follow out the supposition. I suppose if there were such a fund, my opponents would discover immediately that they were struggling geniuses, especially those who have dignified the very name of grammar and spelling-book this evening. Why, if there were such a fund, struggling geniuses would swarm in our country as thick as grasshoppers in Kansas. Shame on men," he exclaimed, turning to his opponents, "who have vigorous minds and strong limbs asking Uncle Sam to lift them to fame."

He sat down and was cheered three times. After the debaters were dismissed Train came back to his seat beside Leroy.

Then the essayists were called. They stepped upon the stage. Leroy almost bounded to his feet with astonishment, for there on the seat on the platform sat the identical girl—the girl who had made him think of lost Atlantis.

"Who can she be?" he said to himself. "I didn't know she belonged to the college. I'm more than ever convinced that she must have been sent from Atlantis and come up from the bottom of the sea. I wish I knew where she is from, for I suppose she is a denizen of this mundane sphere. But she hasn't a mundane look at all."

As he watched her and soliloquized, the essays were being read; but Leroy's ears were stopped with flitting thoughts, and he did not hear them. At length the president arose to announce the name of the being who interested him.

"My Reverie," by Miss—. Just then some confusion caused Leroy to lose the name. The girl stepped forward brightly, but modestly. There was a smile of conscious mastery on her face. Leroy thought she was beautiful. She was lithe and tall and majestic, had an inclination to the brunette type of beauty, her features were regular, her nose just slightly curved, her hair black, and she was dressed—who cares how except that her form was set off to perfection? Leroy thought he had never seen anything like that living personation of gracefulness standing before him.

"Frank," he whispered, "do you see that dream of womanhood standing there? Why, she's a perfect poem. Isn't she noble," he said, pressing his friend's arm, unconscious of the manner in which he mixed his metaphors.

But Francis answered not a word. He leaned forward and gazed toward the platform, his eyes a-glitter with admiration. Then there rang over the room a sweet, womanly voice, reminding one of a mellow sunset and it held captive every ear. The room was hushed. The reading proceeded. Here was a diamond of delicate thought; there several pearls of wit would flash and jingle a moment, bringing loud applause from the audience; and then a pathetic, passage cadenced softly through the hall like a memory of childhood days.

"But what is she at now? She's sailing all over the world in that canoe of a reverie. I declare, she's locating some of the boys. She's getting personal."

Leroy sat entranced as the voice floated through the room. The essayist located some of the most prominent students in various and almost unimaginable parts of the universe at the most ridiculous occupations. On she went until at last she said, "And flying across the sky-kissing Himalayas, I see vast audiences of the 'heathen Chinese' held enraptured by the eloquence of some of the orators of the Franklin Society, E. T. Rose, C. H. Denver, Francis Train"—our hero held his breath—"and L. T. Ransom, discoursing on the æsthetic qualities of the sunflower and the onion, holding a specimen in each hand." And she took her seat.

The two boys leaned back and joined loudly in the thunder of applause. When they drew the picture vividly of themselves addressing a Chinese audience with pig-tails, and having those two æsthetic specimens in their own hands, gesturing away, they laughed and laughed again.

"In the name of Minerva, Francis, who is she?" asked Leroy, impetuously.

"I wish you'd tell me, Ransom; I'm sure I don't know. I never saw her before. She is not in our class, and must have just come at the beginning of this term, and that accounts for our not seeing her before."

"But how did she ever find out our names?"

"Oh, that's easily accounted for. You know, both of us have been on debate and oration several times since the term began, and, of course, she saw us and heard our names."

"But what's her name? Oh, of course, you don't know, and I'm glad of it. I do hope nobody else knows her name. But I wish I did. Say, Francis, were you ever in love? I never felt as much like going in ear-deep, of my own free will in liberty, as I do now. How do you feel about it?"

The two friends looked at each other, and they read each other's feelings in each other's eyes, and each knew that an intense desire was in the other's heart.

GENTILES SEEKING JESUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 8, John 12: 20-36. Golden Text, ver. 32.

The Request of the Greeks—The Desire to See God—Death Necessary to Sight—The Test Applied—Goodness Not a Title—Badness does Not Exclude—The Fruit from the Dead Seed—The Divine Superseding the Human—Spiritual Valetudinarians—The Appointed Hours—Satan Trying to Recover Lost Dominion.

THE news of the raising of Lazarus spread all over the city. There were few, even of the strangers in Jerusalem, who were not discussing this miracle and Him who wrought it. It was therefore quite natural that certain Greeks, who came up to worship at the feast—coming of a people who "spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing" (Acts 17: 21)—should desire to see Jesus. They came to Philip, one of the most sociable of the disciples, and said, "Sir, we would see Jesus." They did not know they were ASKING TO SEE GOD.

Many had seen Jesus who saw in Him "no form nor comeliness" (Isa. 53: 2). That which made Jesus different from other men was invisible at first sight. "The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." He was "the image of the invisible God," and they who could not see God could not see His image in His Son. One man "endured, as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11: 27), "and there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. 34: 10). Of old God said unto this same Moses, "Thou canst not see My face: for there shall no man see Me, and live" (Ex. 33: 20).

Philip tells the request of the Greeks to Andrew, and together they tell Jesus. But, oh how different is His answer from anything which they have anticipated! "The hour is come that the Son of Man shall be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." Oh, how Jesus longed for those Greeks to see Him, and to see Him as their own Saviour; but this they could not do except He should die! And must see ourselves crucified with Christ, and take this position in reality, if we would continually see Jesus. It is self which hinders our seeing Jesus. While a sinner is considering how good he is, and is calculating his chance of salvation from that, he is not seeing Jesus. When an awakened sinner is occupied with how bad he is, he is not seeing Jesus. Self, good or bad, clouds Jesus from our horizon. It is not our goodness which obtains our salvation; it is not our badness which makes it impossible; "by grace are ye saved." Man's goodness fades into nothingness in the light of God; man's badness is overcome and conquered by His grace.

What was the fruit which should be brought forth by Jesus when, as a corn of wheat, He should die? Was it not the souls of those very Gentiles who sought to see Him, as well as of Jews and Gentiles all over the world, until He comes again? And "it is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master" (Matt. 10: 25); "As he is, so are we in this world" (1 John 4: 17.) If the Master must lay down His life, the disciple must lay down his life, too. "If any man serve Me, let him follow Me." The whole principle of Christianity is death and resurrection, the divine on the ruin of the human. Jesus was not a specimen of perfect humanity, of a good human nature developed to the very utmost, to proving what human nature is capable of; He was "God . . . manifest in the flesh." It does not belong to human nature, even human nature of the highest type, to love its enemies, to "do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again"—not even for credit for such generosity; it does not belong to human nature to flee from honor, to seek not its own, to rejoice in being persecuted for righteousness' sake.

ALL THIS IS DIVINE,

all this comes of "God manifest in the flesh." And it is only as the human in us gives place, that the divine can take its room. "He that loveth his life shall lose it." The instinct to do the best thing possible for our own souls and for our own bodies, is in every one of us by nature; but do our efforts to do it answer? Take the man who, of all others, spends the greatest amount of time and thought over his bodily health. Is he the healthiest man you know? Is he not, on the contrary, conscious of every little trifling thing which may affect his health, so that he is a veritable slave to his own body? Take the man who, of all others, is most anxious for his own spiritual advancement. There he is in every meeting, trying to get good; there he is, trying to force his soul into the experience of some one else, imitating some one's prayerfulness, fasting as some one else does, reading all the books which every one gives him, but not lifting one note of praise to God. Is his soul healthy? Look at the rich fool (Luke 12) who cares for his own interests, and, instead of giving away his goods, pulls down his barns and builds greater. Is he, in the end, better off than others? Jesus says, "He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." While we are caring for our own interests, we are keeping them who will care for them with all the resources of His Almighty love, if we will let Him. Our souls are dearer to Him than to us, for they are blood-bought; our bodies are dearer to Him than to us, for they are members of Christ's body. If we truly believe this, we cannot but trust ourselves fully over to Him, and He cannot but do for us "according to His riches in glory" (Phil. 4: 19). Free from ourselves, we are at liberty to serve Him, and He says, "If any man serve Me, him will My Father honor." While we honor ourselves, and take credit to ourselves, we do not get honor from God; but many an unknown Christian on earth will doubtless be among the most honored in the kingdom of Christ.

OUT OF THE HANDS OF GOD,

"Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say?" What is it natural to say in trouble? "Father, save me from this hour?" That is also the prayer of the most unconsecrated, and even the unconverted. "But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify Thy name." Here was the divine coming in and superseding the human. Jesus' own life was a life laid down, a real, perpetual sacrifice, and it was His joy to do His Father's will. Nothing happens by chance. There is a cause why we come to each hour, and meet each circumstance in our lives. Christ in us will always say, "Father, in this glorify Thy name." Jesus was speaking thus in the presence of the people, and they thus had proof that He held communion with His Father. A voice from heaven said: "I have glorified it, and will glorify it again." The people could not but hear the voice. Some attempted to explain the phenomenon by natural causes, and said that it thundered; others, who half-believed, said: "An angel spake to Him!" "Jesus answered and said: This voice came, not because of Me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out."

We hear of Satan as "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2: 2). Jesus overcame the world (John 16: 33), of Satan, and as we claim the victory He gained over Satan as the prince of this world, we have it. Satan is always trying to make us believe that he has things his own way, but he can only hold his power where sin and unbelief in any of God's children give him a foothold. Satan with his powerful magnifying-glass of unbelief made Peter see the winds and waves on the sea of Galilee as more powerful than Jesus. He always assumes the power which Jesus has taken from him. Through the curse which followed sin, he got his power in the world; but "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us" (Gal. 3: 13). Through death He destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil (Heb. 2: 14), so that we may count Satan to be a conquered foe, shorn of all his power and all his strength. It would seem as though, through the impending crucifixion of Jesus, Satan would have his greatest triumph, but it was exactly the contrary. Through death He destroyed him that hath the power of death. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me."

The people were perplexed. If this was the Christ, if this Man who had power over disease and death, over the elements and powers of nature, was indeed the promised Messiah, how then could He die? "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth forever." They were quoting from Ps. 72: 17, "His name shall endure forever; His name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in Him; all nations shall call Him blessed." Having read the Scriptures onesidedly, they naturally ask, "How sayest thou, The Son of Man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of Man?" Jesus' answer was characteristic: "Yet a little while is the Light with you. Walk while ye have the Light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have Light, believe in the Light, that ye may be the children of light." It seems to us strange that they should have had a doubt as to His Messiahship. Yet how often we have on a clear statement of God's Word which warranted our reckoning upon Him, just because there were some other Scriptures on which we had not light as yet. "Walk while ye have the light" is the Lord's command, i.e., make use of and act upon at once all the light God gives, "lest darkness come upon you."

"WHAT CAN I DO FOR JESUS?"

WHAT can I do for Him who has shown such love to me?
How can I prove that I feel His mercy full and free?
Fain would I give Him all my soul and its ransomed powers,
Life and its joyous hopes, Time and its fleeting hours.

I will give Him a loyal heart, beating only true to Him;
I will ask Him to make it white, and to keep it forever clean.
I know He will fill it with love—a deepening, widening sea,
Which shall utterly burst its bounds at His feet in eternity!

I will give Him the years of my life, if they many be or few,
And will seek each day of those years His pleasure to know and do.
Like the flower that turns her face each morn to the rising sun,
So will I look to my Lord, to see what He would have done.

I will give Him my good right hand to be foremost in the fight,
To hold His colors aloft on the side of truth and right;
And, should He call me to prove my loyalty with my life,
He shall surely find me fallen in the thickest of the strife.

So will I cleave to Him—His only in life or death,
Blessing His glorious name with my last long, earth-drawn breath;
Wing my way to Him when my soul has taken flight,
Loving Him, praising Him THERE without weariness day or night.

SAVE THE LITTLE ONES.—During the hot summer months thousands of little ones will be carried off because of their inability to digest the food given them. Undigested food causes irritation of the bowels, which speedily produces the dreaded Cholera Infantum. The best food to use at this season in order to avoid this great danger is the celebrated Lactated Food. It is easily digested, readily assimilated, and agrees with the weakest stomach. Physicians endorse it. Sold by druggists.

Conquest of Mexico

The HISTORY of, by WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT. With a Preliminary View of the Ancient Mexican Civilization, and the Life of the Conqueror, Hernando Cortés. Illustrated Library Edition, in two volumes, small octavo. Price, $2.25. Vol. I. ready July 10, Vol. II. ready Aug. 15, 1886.

The expiration of copyright enables me now to present this great work to American readers at a popular price, yet in form worthy of the author, and worthy of the finest library. Its mechanical qualities are fairly equal to those of my best edition of "Guizot's History of France."

"A history possessing the unity, variety, and interest of a magnificent poem. It deals with a series of facts and exhibits a gallery of characters, which to have invented would place its creator by the side of Homer; and which to realize and represent in the mode Mr. Prescott has done, required a rare degree of historical imagination."—EDWIN P. WHIFFLE.

"It is a noble work; judiciously planned and admirably executed; rich with the spoils of learning easily and gracefully worn; imbued everywhere with a conscientious love of the truth, and controlled by that unerring good sense without which genius leads astray with its false lights, and learning encumbers with its heavy panoply. It will win the literary voluptuary to its pages by the attractiveness of its subject and the flow of ease of its style; and the historical student will do honor to the extent of the research which it displays; and to the thoroughness of which its investigations have been conducted. We can confidently predict for it an extensive and permanent popularity. . . . It will take its place among those enduring productions of the human mind which age cannot stale and custom cannot wither."—GEORGE S. HILLARD.

WHAT is the chief good in life? Every thinking man has to decide that in his own case. How the majority decide we may see by the eager competition for wealth, or fame, or power, that is going on all around us. A few, divinely guided, decide otherwise. As Moses when he came to years of discretion quitted the royal palace, resigned his brilliant prospects, and cast in his lot with an enslaved people (Heb. 11 : 25), so others, following his example, have chosen the better part. One such is he whose portrait appears on the first page this week. Wealth to a fabulous extent was within his grasp; but he quitted the life of ease and luxury open to him for a life of self-sacrificing labor, and chose, instead of worldly riches and honor, the reproach of the cross.

EARLY YEARS.

Frederick Nicholas Charrington was born in Bow Road, London, on February 4th, 1850, and is now, therefore, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. He is the son of Mr. Charrington, of the famous firm of Charrington, Head, & Co., whose brewery covers an immense space of ground. At an early age he was placed at a school in Brighton. From there he went to the famous school of Marlborough, where he was for a time laid low by a fever which broke out among the pupils. On his recovery he went to Brighton College and there finished his education.

IN THE BREWERY.

After leaving school Mr. Charrington went in company with Mr. J. H. Buxton, a young friend, also a brewer, for a tour through Europe, under the care of the Rev. Thomas Scott, a clergyman. They visited the Paris Exhibition of 1867, and travelled through Switzerland and Italy. His father now offered to send him to either Oxford or Cambridge University, but this he declined, and commenced learning the business at once by becoming a pupil of Neville, Reed & Co., brewers to the Queen, at Windsor.

After remaining at Windsor for twelve months Mr. Charrington entered his father's brewery in the East End of London. Soon after this he accompanied his parents on another tour on the Continent, and on this occasion he met with Rev. W. S. Rainsford, now of St. George's church, New York. They travelled in company on the return journey, during which Mr. Charrington invited his young friend to visit him at his father's house at Wimbledon.

A MOMENTOUS QUESTION.

During this visit Mr. Rainsford spoke to Mr. Charrington about his soul, and plainly asked him if he knew whether he was saved. Mr. Charrington protested against such a subject being brought up, especially after such a pleasant time spent on the Continent. Mr. Rainsford, however, pressed home the question, and made Mr. Charrington promise he would read John 3 when alone. Mr. Charrington had hitherto rested all his hopes of salvation on attendance at church on Sundays, and especially on the statement in the Prayer-Book on Baptism, "Wherein I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven."

The next night Mr. Charrington fulfilled his promise and read John 3, and, while thinking over the passage, and as he read, he was startled by a reminiscence. Some months before he had casually met Mr. Canning, an old friend, who informed him that he had been converted under the preaching of Lord Radstock. "Converted," said Mr. Charrington, "what do you mean?" Mr. Canning told him, and advised him to read the third chapter of John. Now Mr. Rainsford had directed him to the same passage. The coincidence, he thought, was remarkable. His two friends must surely think the chapter important. Mr. Charrington read it carefully, and as he read the Holy Spirit entered his heart, and from that hour he was a new man.

Mr. Charrington now became anxious to engage in Christian work. He waited upon the Rector of Stepney, who, while encouraging his application for work, could think of nothing more effective than a night-school.

FIRST SERVICES FOR CHRIST

The young convert was glad to make a beginning. His days were occupied in the great brewery, while his evenings were spent in the night-school. It was rough, difficult, up-hill work, but, full of Christian love, he persevered. At this time he became acquainted with Mr. Campbell, and his friend Mr. Kerwin, and under their influence he entered upon more direct religious work. They were carrying on in the immediate neighborhood a regular meeting among rough boys in a hay-loft. Mr. Charrington was present at their service one night. On arriving, he found himself in a long room, lighted with paraffin-lamps hanging from the rafters. The room was fitted with rude forms, with a platform at one end. Despite the odor of the stable below, it seemed a house of God. The rough lads sang with a will and listened intently to the sermon. Mr. Charrington saw that this was a better work than his own of teaching boys to read and write, and he at once proposed that they should join forces. The next night he took his boys to the loft and helped in the service. It was to his former life. As he stood in the loft over the stable, urging the boys to seek the Lord it occurred to him that only a year ago that very night he was the gayest of the gay in a ball-room.

The progress was encouraging, but not without its difficulties. The neighbors were not in sympathy, and even the man from whom they rented the loft often tried to annoy them. On one occasion he came up into the room and declared, with oaths and cursing, that his poor horse, who had to work hard for his living all day long, could not sleep on account of the noise made by the lads singing hymns. (See illustration No. 1.) On another occasion the meeting was exceptionally small, and the Christian workers could not understand the reason until they went down and found the man standing below the staircase guarding the entrance with a ferocious-looking bull-dog.

Eventually they were driven out and a capacious workshop was rented, and fitted up at a cost of over $1500 as

A MISSION HALL FOR BOYS.

Another was rented for girls. In both places religious services were held nightly by Mr. Charrington and his friends.

Up to this time Mr. Charrington had remained in the brewery, but his conscience was not at rest. Wherever he went he saw his father's name printed on large signboards and posts over the various grog-shops at every miserable street corner. He began to witness sights that touched his heart. He saw drunken fathers, gin-drinking mothers, ill-used children, whose worst enemies were those whom God designed to be their natural protectors. There might seem to be light, warmth, and cordials within, but brawls and fights spoiled the glitter; and then above all he read

"CHARRINGTON, HEAD & CO.'S ENTIRE."

In addition to this, the boys and lads were continually asking him questions about the drink that were not at all likely to make his conscience more at ease, and he began to feel that he was pulling down with one hand what he was building up with the other.

The crisis came. Mr. Charrington told his father that he could have nothing more to do with the business of the brewery. This decision came so unexpectedly that it was a great blow to the family, but he was resolute and not knowing whether he would be penniless or not he forever. It is gratifying to know that his father, bitterly as he resented his son's conduct at the time, saw things in a new light later. On his death-bed he expressed his approval of the course his son had taken, although his will, prepared before his change of view, was an expression of the old man's resentment at his son's renunciation of the brewery.

Thus delivered from entanglements Mr. Charrington gave himself up unreservedly to Christian work among the million and a half of the poor in the East End of London. Day and night, seven days in the week, he worked with all his might from house to house and in the mission hall. One gang after another was broken up, an achievement which greatly contributed to the relief of the police and the quietude of the neighborhood. Mr. Charrington tells how on one Sunday evening all of whom had been convicted of crime, and were called the "forty thieves," came down with sticks secreted up the sleeves of their coats to take vengeance on the boys who had deserted them under Mr. Charrington's influence. Some of the boys came in fear and trembling to tell Mr. Charrington that the gang were just outside waiting for them under the shadow of a wall across the road. (See illustration.) He went out, and speaking kindly to the roughs induced them to give up their idea of fighting, and eventually prevailed upon them to come in and shake hands with their late comrades and join in the service, which was the first time that they had been at such a meeting. Often, after a service, boys would come and plead for their companions who were without home or shelter for the night. This led Mr. Charrington to take a large warehouse which had previously been used as a beer-bottling establishment, and converted it into a Boys' Home. The Home has been the means, in God's hands, of rescuing hundreds of outcast boys.

STREET-PREACHING

was a means greatly used from the outset. Mr. Charrington would take the boys into the slums and hold open-air services. One Sunday afternoon a large number of people collected in one of the by-streets. A milkman had left his cart by the curb-stone near by. Mr. Charrington drew the cart out, and stepping on it, began to preach, to the great astonishment of the people. After awhile the milkman returned, and seeing Mr. Charrington addressing the crowd (see illustration No. 2), was at first inclined to be angry, but after a little talk, and Mr. Charrington offering to pay for any damage done, the man good-naturedly said, "Go ahead, governor; when you've done, I'll go on," and Mr. Charrington went ahead.

SERVICES IN THE THEATRES.

Among other special efforts that Mr. Charrington made to reach the lapsed masses of the East End was to hire the variety theatres in the neighborhood for Sunday-evening services. The largest of these, known as Lusby's, held three thousand people; this was crowded Sunday after Sunday, but the conduct of the place on the intervening week-nights was so disreputable that it became necessary to give up the meetings there, lest those who went on Sunday should go in the week also. Mr. Charrington denounced the place in no measured terms at the last service, and earnestly besought his hearers never to enter it again.

This attack was resented by the unscrupulous proprietors as an attempt to injure their business, and they showed their resentment by inciting their heelers to mob Mr. Charrington. Accordingly, passing the place a few days later, he was set upon and pelted with decayed vegetables and bags of flour. He made his escape without serious injury and redoubled his efforts to counteract the baneful influence of Lusby's Theatre. He even undertook midnight work and succeeded in rescuing a number of abandoned women, whose initiation in a vicious course was made there.

A NIGHT IN JAIL

was a painful experience resulting from his crusade against "Lusby's." On September 27th, 1880, Mr. Charrington was distributing tracts to the people as they passed in to the theatre, when at a signal from the proprietor a band of roughs left the bar and spread themselves around the tract-distributor blocking the way. A policeman was then induced to arrest Mr. Charrington for "obstructing traffic," and he was hustled to the nearest station-house. He was confined there all night, but by reading aloud, singing and prayer (see illustration), he was able to testify to the motley crowd which each hour increased as cell after cell was filled. The next morning Mr. Charrington was discharged by the judge who reprimanded the policeman for making the arrest.

On November 10th, 1883, the foundation stone was laid of a structure which was the outcome of these years of work. Aided by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, the late Earl of Shaftesbury, and other eminent men, Mr. Charrington purchased a plot of ground in the heart of the slums at a cost of $40,000, and commenced the erection of an enormous mission hall, which is now filled every night and three times on Sunday with an eager, attentive congregation. Mr. Charrington modestly keeps himself in the background, and invites any earnest Gospel preacher to speak to the people, but he is the life and soul of the undertaking. By God's grace the name of Charrington is now famous among the poor of London for something else beside beer.

Muscular Christianity was Usefully Employed recently by a well-known clergyman. The Brooklyn Union, referring to a visit paid to this city by the Rev. James L. Hodge, D.D., relates an incident in which this eminent clergyman, now over seventy years old, figured prominently. Dr. Hodge heard that a man in whom he felt a deep interest was in a liquor saloon and indulging much too freely; he sent a messenger to try and persuade the man to leave. The messenger met with abuse only, and came back and reported the failure of his mission. "Very well," said the doctor. "I'll see what I can do," and seizing his cane, he marched boldly across to the liquor store, and there found his man standing at the bar. "C—, I want you to come along with me," said the doctor, in his bland and kindly way. The man, who was drunk enough to be ugly, and, withal, a powerful fellow, refused. "Then, as I came here to fetch you," said the doctor, "I've got to do it," and seizing him rapidly by the back of the neck he had him in the middle of the street in a trice. When the man recovered his breath he looked in helpless astonishment at the great form of the old and muscular minister towering over him. "Now, will you come along?" inquired the doctor. "I will," was the reply; and he went, and was cared for until he was himself again.

The Accounts of the Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections in New York now published show some suggestive facts. It appears that the dry-goods trade contributed $4350, while the subscription from the brewers, the most profitable trade in existence, was $283. The entire amount received was $46,085, the largest sum raised since the system was organized seven years ago. It was nearly $10,000 larger than that of the previous year. The increase came largely from the extremes of society, the rich and the poor, the former giving through church collections, and many of the contributions of the poor coming from sewing-women and wage-workers who had experienced the beneficence of the hospitals. The most liberal denominations last year were the Episcopal, whose collections amounted to $16,185, and the Presbyterian, to $6898, both much larger than in 1884. During last year the Protestant and Jewish hospitals of the city gave relief to more than 9000 poor patients in their wards.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Girl Terminates a Battle.—At a recent meeting Mr. Stuart remarked: "I was at a missionary meeting the other night, when a missionary told this story. He said: 'Two boys were fighting one Sabbath evening, when a little girl on her way to school interfered and tried to separate them. She succeeded, and after they were pacified she invited them to Sunday-school with her. They willingly consented, and the three walked off together the best of friends. That Sunday-school proved to be the great turning point in the lives of both those boys. I am one of them, and that little girl has since become my wife.'"

An Officer's Search.—"I Was Once Looking after my luggage in a foreign railway station, when a military officer of high rank came up to me, and said: 'Excuse me, but were you in Malta last year?' I told him that I had been. He then said, 'I am searching for peace, but cannot find it, and they tell me there that you have got this peace; if that is so, tell me how I am to obtain it.' 'Yes,' I said, 'I have got the peace of God through the blood of Christ's cross, and you may have it now where you stand; for Christ has said: "My peace I give unto you." All you have to do is to accept this perfect peace that flows wide and deep as a river.' 'Is that the way of it,' he said, 'I have found it now.' He convulsively clasped my hand, and was gone, and I saw him no more, but he had found that peace which so many are searching after to-day."

A Poor Job Better than None.—An Aged Christian friend said: "I know an elder of a Presbyterian church who told me that when he was a young man, after he and a companion had given themselves to the Lord, they attended a Bible-class, and when there he often led in prayer. His companion one day remarked, with a sneer: 'He is making a poor job of it; if I could not do better than that, I would hold my tongue.' So he did hold his tongue, and the result was that he fell out of the Christian life altogether. The other went bravely on, surmounting all difficulties and failures, until he was asked to speak at Gospel meetings, and thus added two talents to the two which he had. Now he stands on a high platform in the Christian life, because he was willing to do what he could. Oh, friends, if you will but let your light shine, God will brighten it as you go on your way!"

Grief Turned into Gladness.—Mrs. Osburn said: "I remember once being in a meeting, and saw a young lad kneeling at a form as a penitent. A number of Christian friends spoke to him, but they did not seem to have the right word; the poor fellow was deeply anxious; I never saw anyone more so. The meeting dispersed, but the young man still knelt at the form, his head bent as if in great grief. I prayed that the Lord would give me a word for him, and laying my hand on his shoulder, I said: 'Christ made peace through the blood of His cross.' 'Such peace, such peace,' said the young man, raising himself, 'I have found it now.' He gave a sigh as if some heavy load had been lifted from him, and he was now at rest. Yes, he had, in a moment, received that wonderful peace 'that passeth all understanding.' He is now a bright young Christian, and is working for his divine Master in Edinburgh."

A Life Saved Through a Broken Leg.—Capt. Hatfield related: "In the days of Queen Mary there lived a man who did not fear to worship the living God according to his conscience. He had a favorite text, which he often quoted to his friends: 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' The Queen heard of this man, and gave orders that he was to be brought to London for trial as a heretic. On the way up to the metropolis an accident happened, and he was thrown from the coach and got his leg broken. He could go no farther, and had to return home until he should recover. His friends now said to him, 'How will this work together for God?' He replied, 'I do not know God's ways, for they are not our ways; but I know that His promise is true, and it will work in some way for my good.' After he recovered, he again set out on the journey to London, but before he reached the place Queen Mary had died, and Protestant Queen Elizabeth reigned in her stead. The consequence was that this man, with many others, was set at liberty, and was sent back to his home and his friends; and it proved that 'All things did work together for good to him.'"

A Fatal Fall from a Scaffold.—Mr. Campbell observed: "I was once at an evangelistic meeting where I saw a number of young men deeply interested in the conversion of another. I watched them as they pressed him to decide for the Lord that night. He rose from among them, and stood with his hat in his hand, leaning against the lintel of the hall-door, moving slowly from side to side as if his body were keeping time to his mind as it wavered between two opinions. He walked out of the hall into the church, and leaned against the porch as if unwilling to venture outside. I knew by his face that he was pondering something in his mind. Would he or would he not settle this great matter now? Suddenly, with a defiant look upon his face, he put his hat on his head, and quickly walked out. I afterward learned the sad fate of that young man. He was standing on a scaffolding not long afterward working at the front of a building, when by a false step he fell to the ground, was instantly killed, and went to meet his God."

From a Hospital to Heaven.—"A Young Man lay stricken down by fever in the military hospital at Alexandria. A lady went in to visit the sick there, and she heard this lad moaning piteously, 'Mother, oh, mother.' Her heart was touched as she thought of that mother so far away, who would have given much to be with her darling boy. The lady gently placed her hand on his burning forehead, and he said in a grateful voice: 'Thank you, lady; thank you.' As she looked out upon the setting sun as it shone on the yellow waters of the Nile, she began to sing softly the hymn beginning with—

'Shall we gather at the river,
Where bright angels' feet have trod.'

As she sang, one weary head after another was raised from the pillows in a listening attitude. When she had finished the hymn, she bent over the young man, and said: 'Will you be there?' A bright gleam came into his eyes as he cheerily replied, 'Yes, I shall soon be there.' The next day he had crossed the river, and was standing on the bright and shining shore beyond the grave."

Won From the Casino.—Mr. McFarlane said: "I was returning home from a meeting last night with one of the workers, and he told me that he was brought in a very strange way to the Lord. When he first came to this place he was quite a stranger, and did not know any one. He was not a Christian, although he was not opposed to Christianity. He was very lonely, and often did not know how to spend his evenings, and by and by he began to go to the casino and such places. One evening he was just entering a variety theatre, when a gentleman put his hand on his shoulder, and said: 'My friend, the theatre will never save you, but the Lord Jesus Christ will.' The young man, rather surprised, turned and looked at the gentleman who had made the remark, when the gentleman asked him if he would come for a walk. The young man consented. 'And,' he said, 'he never once talked to me personally about my soul, but kindly pointed out to me the buildings and places of interest in the city. We came to a band of open-air singers, and we stood then listening to them, and then passed on to a meeting in a tent. There I was deeply impressed with what I heard, and at the close of that meeting I left it and entered another, where I met with Christ Himself, and have been doing what I can for Him since that time.'"

THE KING OF BOOKS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Aug. 1, 1886, at Lakeside, O.

"The statutes of the Lord are right."—Ps. 19: 8.

Obsolete Books—Buried in National Libraries—An Old Book in Vigorous Life—Its Mission Not Yet Accomplished—The Book Right in Four Aspects—I. Right in Authentication—The Test of Acceptance—Books of Impostors Rejected—The Test of Exploration—Petra the City of Rock—Other Cities Discovered—Vineyards in Egypt—II. Right in Style—Not Fairly Read—The Inexhaustible Quarry—Its Poetic Treasures—Endless Variety—Suits all Classes—III. Right in Doctrine—IV. Right in Effect.

OLD books go out of date. When they were written they discussed questions which were being discussed; they struck at wrongs which had long ago ceased, or advocated institutions which excite not our interest. Were they books of history, the facts have been gathered from the imperfect mass, better classified and more lucidly presented. Were they books of poetry, they were interlocked with wild mythologies which have gone up from the face of the earth like mists at sunrise. Were they books of morals, civilization will not sit at the feet of barbarism; neither do we want Sappho, Pythagoras and Tully to teach us morals. What do the masses of the people care now for the pathos of Simonides, or the sarcasm of Menander, or the gracefulness of Philemon, or the wit of Aristophanes? Even the old books we have left, with a few exceptions, have but very little effect upon our times. Books are human; they have a time to be born, they are fondled, they grow in strength, they have a middle life of usefulness; then comes old age—they totter and they die. Many of the national libraries are merely

THE CEMETERIES OF DEAD BOOKS

Some of them lived flagitious lives and died deaths of ignominy. Some were virtuous and accomplished a glorious mission. Some went into the ashes through inquisitorial fires. Some found their funeral pile in sacked and plundered cities. Some were neglected and died as foundlings at the door of science. Some expired in the author's study, others in the publisher's hands. Ever and anon there comes into your possession an old book, its author forgotten and its usefulness done, and with leathern lips it seems to say: "I wish I were dead." Monuments have been raised over poets and philanthropists. Would that some tall shaft might be erected in honor of the world's buried books! The world's authors would make pilgrimage thereto, and poetry, and literature, and science, and religion would consecrate it with their tears.

NOT SO WITH ONE OLD BOOK.

It started in the world's infancy. It grew under theocracy and monarchy. It withstood storms of fire. It grew under prophet's mantle and under the fisherman's coat of the apostles; in Rome and Ephesus and Jerusalem and Patmos. Tyranny issued edicts against it, and infidelity put out the tongue, and Mohammedanism from its mosques hurled its anathemas, but the old Bible still lived. It crossed the British Channel and was greeted by Wickcliffe and James I. It crossed the Atlantic and struck Plymouth Rock, until, like that of Horeb it gushed with blessedness. Churches and asylums have gathered all along its way, ringing their bells and stretching out their hands of blessing; and every Sabbath there are ten thousand heralds of the cross with their hands on this open, grand, free, old English Bible.

It will not have accomplished its mission until it has climbed the icy mountains of Greenland; until it has gone over the granite cliffs of China; until it has thrown its glow amid the Australian mines; until it has scattered its gems among the diamond districts of Brazil; and all thrones shall be gathered into one throne, and all crowns by the fires of revolution shall be melted into one crown, and this Book shall, at the very gate of heaven have waved in the ransomed empires. Not until then will this glorious Bible have accomplished its mission.

In carrying out, then, the idea of my text—"The statutes of the Lord are right"—I shall show you that the Bible is that it is right in style, that it is right in doctrine, that it is right in its effects.

I. Can you doubt the authenticity of the Scriptures? There is not so much evidence that Walter Scott wrote "The Lady of the Lake;" not so much evidence that Shakespeare wrote "Hamlet;" not so much evidence that John Milton wrote "Paradise Lost," as there is evidence that the Lord God Almighty, by the hands of the prophets, evangelists and apostles, wrote this Book.

Suppose a book now to be written which came in conflict with a great many things, and was written by bad men or impostors, how long would such a book stand? It would be scouted by everybody. And I say if that Bible had been an imposition; or if it had not been written by the men who said they wrote it; if it had been a mere collection of falsehoods, do you not suppose that it would have been immediately rejected by the people? If Job and Isaiah and Jeremiah and Paul and Peter and John were impostors, they would have been scouted by generations and nations. If that Book has come down through fires of centuries without a scar, it is because there is nothing in it destructible.

How near have they come to destroying the Bible? When they began their opposition there were two or three thousand copies of it. Now there are two hundred millions, as far as I can calculate. These Bible truths, notwithstanding all the opposition, have gone into all languages—into the philosophic Greek, the flowing Italian, the rugged German, the passionate French, the picturesque Indian, and the exhaustless Anglo-Saxon. Now, do you not suppose, if that Book had been an imposition and a falsehood, it would have gone down under these ceaseless fires of opposition?

Further, suppose that there was a great pestilence going over the earth, and hundreds of thousands of men were dying of that pestilence, and some one should find ten thousand people, would not everybody acknowledge that that must be a good medicine? Why, some one would say: "Do you deny it? There have been ten thousand people cured by it." I simply state the fact that there have been hundreds of thousands of Christian men and women who say they have felt the truthfulness of that Book and its power in their souls. It has cured them of the worst leprosy that ever came down on our earth, namely, the leprosy of sin; and if I can point you to multitudes who say they have felt the power of that cure, are you not reasonable enough to acknowledge the fact that there must be some power in the medicine? Will you take the evidence of millions of patients who have been cured, or will you take the evidence of the sceptic who stands aloof and confesses that he never took the medicine?

The Bible intimates that there was a city called Petra, built out of solid rock.

at it. "Where is your city of Petra?" Buckhardt and Laborde went forth in their explorations and they came upon that very city. The mountains stand around like giants guarding the tomb where the city is buried. They find a street in that city six miles long, where once flashed imperial pomp and which echoed with the laughter of light-hearted mirth on its way to the theatre. On temples fashioned out of colored stones—some of which have blushed into the crimson of the rose, and some of which have paled into the whiteness of the lily—aye, on column and pediment and entablature and statuary, God writes the truth of that Bible.

The Bible says that Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by fire and brimstone. "Absurd," infidels year after year said; "it is positively absurd that they could have been destroyed by brimstone. There is nothing in the elements to cause such a shower of death as that." Lieutenant Lynch—I think he was the first man who went out on the discovery, but he has been followed by many others—Lieutenant Lynch went out in exploration and came to the Dead Sea, which, by a convulsion of nature, has overflowed the place where the cities once stood. He sank his fathoming line and brought up from the bottom of the Dead Sea great masses of sulphur, remnants of that very tempest that swept Sodom and Gomorrah to ruin.

WHO WAS RIGHT?

the Bible that announced the destruction of those cities or the sceptics who for ages scoffed at it?

The Bible says there was a city called Nineveh, and that it was three days' journey around it, and that it should be destroyed by fire and water. "Absurd," cried out hundreds of voices for many years; "no such city was ever built that it would take three days' journey to go around. Besides, it could not be destroyed by fire and water; they are antagonistic elements." But Layard, Botta and Keith go out, and by their explorations they find that city of Nineveh, and they tell us that by their own experiment it is three days' journey around, according to the old estimate of a day's journey, and that it was literally destroyed by fire and water—two antagonistic elements—a part of the city having been inundated by the River Tigris, the brick material in those times being dried clay instead of burned, while in other parts they find the remains of the fire in heaps of charcoal that have been excavated and in the calcined slabs of gypsum. Who was right, the Bible or infidelity?

Moses intimated that they had vineyards in Egypt. "Absurd," cried hundreds of voices; "you can't raise grapes in Egypt; or, if you can, it is a very great exception that you can raise them." But the traveller goes down, and in the underground vaults of Elithya he finds painted on the wall all the process of tending the vines and treading out the grapes. It is all there, familiarly sketched by people who evidently knew all about it, and saw it all about them every day; and in those underground vaults there are vases still encrusted with the settlings of the wine. You see the vine did grow in Egypt, whether it grows there now or not.

Thus you see that while God wrote the Bible, at the same time He wrote this commentary, that "the statutes of the Lord are right," on leaves of rock and shell, bound in clasps of metal, and lying on mountain tables and in the jewelled vase of the sea. In authenticity and in genuineness the statutes of the Lord are right.

II. Again, the Bible is RIGHT IN STYLE.

I know there are a great many people who think it is merely a collection of genealogical tables and dry facts. That is because they do not know how to read the Book. You take up the most interesting novel that was ever written, and if you commence at the four hundredth page to-day, and to-morrow at the three hundredth, and the next day at the first page, how much sense or interest would you get from it? Yet that is the very process to which the Bible is subjected every day. An angel from heaven, reading the Bible in that way, could not understand it. The Bible, like all other palaces, has a door by which to enter and a door by which to go out. Genesis is the door to go in and Revelation the door to go out.

These epistles of Paul the Apostle are merely letters written, folded up and sent by couriers to the different churches. Do you read other letters the way you read Paul's letters? Suppose you get a business letter, and you know that in it there are important financial propositions, do you read the last page first and then one line of the third page, and another of the second, and another of the first? No. You begin with "Dear Sir" and end with "Yours truly." Now, here is of God written to our lost world; it is full of magnificent hopes and propositions, and we dip in here and there, and we know nothing about it. Besides that, people read the Bible when they cannot do anything else. It is a dark day, and they do not feel well, and they do not go to business, and after lounging about a bit they pick up the Bible—their mind refuses to enjoy the truth. Or they come home weary from the store or shop, and they feel, if they do not say, it is a dull book. While the Bible is to be read on stormy days and while your head aches, it is also to be read in the sunshine and when your nerves like harp-strings thrum the song of health. While your vision is clear, walk in this paradise of truth, and while your mental appetite is good, pluck these clusters of grace.

I am fascinated with the conciseness of this Book. Every word is packed full of truth. Every sentence is double-barrelled. Every paragraph is like an old banyan-tree with a hundred roots and a hundred branches. It is a great arch; pull out one stone and it all comes down. There has never been a pearl diver who could gather up one half of the treasures in any verse. John Halsebach, of Vienna, for twenty-one years every Sabbath expounded to his congregation the first chapter of the Book of Isaiah, and yet did not get through with it. Nine tenths of all the good literature of this age is merely

THE BIBLE DILUTED.

Goethe, the admired of all sceptics, had the wall of his house at Weimar covered with religious maps and pictures. Milton's "Paradise Lost" is part of the Bible in blank verse. Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" is borrowed from the Bible. Spenser's writings are imitations of the parables. John Bunyan saw in a dream only what St. John had seen before in Apocalyptic vision. Macaulay crowns his most thrilling sentences with Scripture quotations. Thomas Carlyle is only a splendid distortion of Ezekiel; and wandering through the lanes and parks of this imperial domain of Bible truth, I find all the great American, English, German, Spanish, Italian poets, painters, orators and rhetoricians.

Where is there in the world of anything like Job's champing, neighing, pawing, lightning-footed, thunder-necked war horse? Dryden's, Milton's, Cowper's tempests are very tame compared with David's storm that wrecks the mountains of Lebanon and shivers the wilderness of Kadish. Why, it seems as if to the feet of these Bible writers mountains brought all their gems, and the seas all their pearls, and the gardens all their frankincense, and the spring all its blossoms, and the harvests all their wealth, and heaven all its grandeur, and eternity all its stupendous realities; and that since then poets, and orators, and rhetoricians have been drinking from exhausted fountains, and searching for diamonds in a realm utterly rifed and ransacked.

This Book is the hive of all sweetness. It is the armory of all well-tempered weapons. It is the tower containing the crown jewels of the universe. It is the lamp that kindles all other lights. It is the home of all majesties and splendors. It is the marriage ring that unites the celestial and the terrestrial, while all the clustering white-robed denizens of the sky hovering around rejoice at the nuptials. This Book—it is the wreath into which are twisted all garlands; it is the song into which are struck all harmonies; it is the river into which are poured all the great tides of hallelujah; it is the firmament in which suns and moons and stars and constellations and universes and eternities wheel and blaze and triumph. Where is the young man's soul with any music in it that is not stirred with Jacob's lament, or Nahum's dirge, or Habakkuk's dithyrambic, or Paul's march of the resurrection?

I am also amazed at

of this Book. Mind you, not contradiction or collision, but variety. Just as in the song you have the basso and alto and soprano and tenor—they are not in collision with each other but come in to make up the harmony—so it is in this Book; there are different parts of this great song of redemption. The prophet comes and takes one part, and the patriarch another part, and the evangelist another part, and the apostles another part, and yet they all come into the grand harmony—"the song of Moses and the Lamb." God prepared

of people. For instance, little children would read the Bible, and God knew that; so He allows Matthew and Luke to write sweet stories about Christ with the doctors of the law, and Christ at the well, and Christ at the cross, so that any little child can understand them. Then God knew that the aged people would want to read the Book, so He allows Solomon to compact a world of wisdom in that Book of Proverbs. God knew that the historian would want to read it, and so he allows Moses to give the plain statement of the Pentateuch. God knew that the poet would want to read it, and so He allows Job to picture the heavens as a curtain, and Isaiah the mountains as weighed in a balance, and the waters as held in the hollow of the Omnipotent hand; and God touched David until in the latter part of the Psalms, he gathers standing in galleries above each other—beasts and men in the first gallery; above them, hills and mountains; above them, fire and hail and tempest; above them, sun and moon and stars of light; and on the highest gallery arrays the hosts of angels; and then standing before this great choir, reaching from the depths of earth to the heights of heaven, like the leader of a great orchestra, he lifts his hands crying: "Praise the Lord. Let everything that hath breath, praise the Lord;" and all earthly creatures in their song, and mountains with their waving cedars, and tempests in their thunder, and rattling hail, and stars on all their trembling harps of light, and angels on their thrones, respond in magnificent acclaim: "Praise ye the Lord. Let everything that hath breath, praise the Lord."

III. I remark again, the Bible is RIGHT IN ITS DOCTRINES.

Man, a sinner, Christ a Saviour—the two doctrines. Man must come down—his pride, his self-righteousness, his worldliness; Christ, the Anointed, must go up. If it had not been for the setting forth of the Atonement, Moses would never have described the Creation; prophets would not have predicted; apostles would not have preached. It seems to me as if Jesus in the Bible were standing on a platform in a great amphitheatre, as if the prophets were behind Him, throwing light forward on His sacred person, and as if the apostles and evangelists stood before Him, like footlights throwing up their light into His blessed countenance, and then as if all the earth and heaven were the applauding auditory.

The Bible speaks of Pisgah and Carmel and Sinai, but makes all mountains bow down to Calvary. The flocks led over the Judean hills were emblems of "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world;" and the lion leaping out of its lair, was an emblem of "the lion of Judah's tribe." I will in my next breath recite to you the most wonderful sentence ever written: "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." No wonder that when Jesus was born in Bethlehem heaven sympathized with earth, and a wave of joy dashed clear over the battlements and dripped upon the shepherds in the words: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will toward men." In my next sentence every word weighs a ton: "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Show me any other book with such a doctrine, so high, so deep, so vast.

IV. Again, the Bible is RIGHT IN ITS EFFECTS.

I do not care where you put the Bible, it just suits the place. You put it in the hand of a man seriously concerned about his soul. I see people often giving to the serious soul this and that book. It may be very well, but there is no book like the Bible. He reads the commandments and pleads to the indictment, "Guilty." He takes up the Psalms of David and says: "They just describe my feelings." He flies to good works; Paul starts him out of that by the announcement: "A man is not justified by works." He falls back in his discouragement; the Bible starts him up with the sentences: "Remember Lot's wife," "Grieve not the Spirit," "Flee the wrath to come." Then the man in despair begins to cry out: "What shall I do? where shall I go?" and a voice reaches him saying: "Come unto Me all ye who are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest."

Take this Bible and place it in the hands of men in trouble? Is there anybody here in trouble? Ah, I might better ask are there any here who have never been in trouble. Put this Bible in the hands of the troubled. You find that as some of the best berries grow on the sharpest thorns, so some of the sweetest consolations of the Gospel grow on the most stinging affliction. You thought that Death had grasped your child. Oh, no! It was only the heavenly Shepherd taking a lamb out of the cold. Christ bent over you as you held the child in your lap, and putting His arms gently around the little one, said: "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Put

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOL.

Palsied be the hand that would take the Bible from the college and the school. Educate only a man's head and you make him an infidel. Educate only a man's heart and you make him a fanatic. Educate them both together, and you have the noblest work of God. An educated mind without moral principle is a ship without a helm, a rushing rail train without brakes or reversing rod to control the speed. Put the Bible in the family. There it lies on the table, an unlimited power. Polygamy and unscriptural divorce are prohibited. Parents are kind and faithful, children polite and obedient. Domestic sorrows lessened by being divided, joys increased by being multiplied. Oh, father, oh, mother, take down that long-neglected Bible, and read it yourselves and let your children read it!

Put the Bible on the rail train and on ship-board, till all parts of this land and all other lands, shall have its illumination. This hour there rises the yell of heathen worship, and in the face of this day's sun smokes the blood of human sacrifice. Give them the Bible. Unbind that wife from the funeral pyre, for no other sacrifice is needed since the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.

I am preaching this sermon because there are so many who would have you believe that the Bible is an outlandish book, and obsolete. It is fresher and more intense than any book that yesterday came out of the great publishing houses. Make it your guide in life and your pillow in death.

After the battle of Richmond

was found with his hand lying on the open Bible. The summer insects had eaten the flesh from the hand, but the skeleton finger lay on these words: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me." Yes, this Book will become in your last days, when you turn away from all other books, a solace for your soul. Perhaps it was your mother's Bible; perhaps the one given you on your wedding-day, its cover now worn out and its leaf faded with age; but its bright promises will flash upon the opening gates of heaven.

"How precious is the Book divine,
By inspiration given;
Bright as a lamp its doctrines shine,
To guide our souls to heaven."

"This lamp, through all the tedious night
Of life, shall guide our way,
Till we behold the clearer light
Of an eternal day."

WORK AMONG GERMAN BARGEMEN.

AN impression has prevailed for some time that the bargemen who were associated with the coal mines on the River Ruhr, in Germany, were ignorant, uncivilized and wicked beyond reclamation; but a religious awakening broke out among them which astonished all who beheld its varied and striking phenomena. There was one man particularly whose nickname of Wolf suggested only a few of the traits of his character; for a savage beast of the forest would have used its offspring better than this man used his household. To crown all, he was a drunkard, and no wolf could ever be charged with that abomination. Though too illiterate to read, the man came under the influence which was abroad, and conscience smote him on account of past iniquities, until life was almost unendurable. In a state of despondency he went to a relative who was a Christian man, who after listening a while remarked, "I know a Physician who can cure you." "Where does he live?" cried Wolf, in extreme eagerness, "I would gladly walk ten miles this night to find him." The only reply to this was to preach Christ as the Great Physician. When the penitent returned home he prayed long and earnestly, until his agony of mind was relieved and he found peace. Instead of beating his wife, he became instrumental in her conversion, while the power with which he preached Christ among the workers on coal barges was viewed with astonishment. Dr. Pinkerton, who relates the particulars, remarks, "The Holy Spirit confirmed his testimony. The holy fire spread from boat to boat; drunkards, thieves, and abandoned characters were made penitent." Hundreds were converted, and houses which had been given up to riot and squalor became clean and attractive—the abodes of peace and love."

AN INDIAN WRONG.

An act of national injustice to the Indians was exposed by Bishop Whipple in an address he delivered at St. Paul, Minn. He stated that the reservoirs built at the headwaters of the Mississippi by the Government in 1880 were erected in spite of the declaration of the Attorney-General that the Government had no right to the lands or material. The result has been that the Indians have seen their crops of wild rice and sugar, and their supply of fish, completely destroyed, and they have no means of subsistence left them. Congress had offered them $1500 for the overflow of their lands and the destruction of the crops. The Indians are in want now and growing desperate. Through the efforts of their friends they have been so far peaceable, but during the coming winter no one need be surprised if the costly Government works are ruined by men made desperate by hunger and want. These are the same Indians with whom Senator Rice and General Sibley lived for twenty years, and who were always friendly to the white man.

A PREACHER STONED.

AN incident showing that persecution patiently endured becomes, in these days, as in ancient times, a seed certain to bear fruit, is related in this month's Foreign Missionary by the Rev. Donald C. McLaran, who writes from Campanha, where there is now a flourishing mission station. He says:

Thirteen years ago, Rev. José Manoel Conceição, a converted priest, and member of our Presbytery, now dead, was in Campanha. It was his custom to journey from place to place, preaching as he had opportunity. He had not preached in Campanha, nor had even announced his intention of doing so. Some Jesuit missionaries were in the town, and the people had been stirred up by them. In some way, perhaps through his conversation with some one at the hotel, the people learned that he was a Protestant, and became greatly excited. On his return to the house after a brief absence, he was refused admittance by the landlord, and turned out into the street, where an angry mob was collecting. He made his way to the outskirts of the town. Seeing his pursuers gaining on him, he turned to the last house in the town asking for protection, but the door was shut in his face. The crowd came near enough now to hit him with the stones which they had gathered on the way. He bore their cruelty meekly and in silence. Finally, however, he turned, lifted the hat from his head, from which the blood was streaming, and said: "Jesus suffered much more than this." Soon a large stone struck him on the temple, and he fell senseless. The crowd left him for dead; but, happily, he had strength enough left, when he came to himself, to drag himself to a place of safety. Such was Campanha thirteen years ago!

CHILDREN AND PUG DOGS.

THE intense heat of last week occasioned much suffering in New York, but there were some startling variations in the condition of the sufferers. A newspaper reporter met with two instances in a journey up-town. At the corner of Twenty-third Street two fashionably dressed ladies were bemoaning the heat, and one of them, pointing to the fat pug dog with her, said: "Poor Nan suffers dreadfully this weather. She felt yesterday's heat more than any day yet. I had her in the coolest room in the house, and then fanned her most of the day." Here the reporter's car bore him away. A half hour later his way took him in a different quarter, where he saw mothers bearing in their arms the sick babies whose little lives were weakly gasping out under the accumulated burdens of stifling heat, scant nourishment, and the polluted air of crowded tenements. The sight was pitiful—the weary, hopeless expression of the women, and the pale, sodden faces of the babies, who lay, most of them, with closed eyes and hanging, nerveless hands. In forcible contrast rose the spectacle of an enervated pug lolling on its cushions in a cool, airy room, while its devoted mistress tirelessly waved the refreshing palm-leaf before its bloated countenance. Whatever we may think, these things do not escape the notice of Him who said: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these" (Matt. 25 : 45).

INDIAN DELICACY.

THERE is a certain sense of politeness and consideration for the feelings of others sometimes manifested by the Indians, which proves that there is material in them to work upon, as also that they possess a disposition which it would be well if white men and women would emulate. Several illustrations are given in the American Missionary, among them the following: "Some Indian schoolboys found their teacher had a very great aversion to frogs. To them it was a continual source of amusement to see her run away from them. One day a boy caught one and shut it up in the table drawer. The teacher entered the room. All were in order, but when she opened the drawer the frog, glad to gain its liberty, leaped out upon the table and the teacher made a great ado. One of the boys, in a gentlemanly way, took up the frog, carried it to the door, and threw it out. No sign of enjoyment could be discerned in their faces. They remained through school hours retaining their solemn dignity. Afterward as they told of it they laughed until the tears came, laughed over and over again as they remembered the dismay of the teacher. Why did they not laugh at first? They had not yet come into the ways of white men enough to realize that we would excuse rudeness in our pupils, even under these circumstances, and they consider it rude to laugh aloud or to laugh at all at the expense of another in the other's presence.

"When one of the young lady missionaries asked an Indian woman for her 'Wakan sica tanka,' instead of her 'Waksica tanka,' no one laughed till the teacher was gone. When I inquired why the dish-pan was not given, the reply was, she did not ask for the dish-pan; she asked for 'the great evil spirit,' (the devil), and I assure you no Indian woman hears that story without laughing heartily. Another teacher, meaning to ask for a tub, asked for a young man, and, though to her face they did not laugh, I have seen a whole sewing-school convulsed with laughter over the mistake several times since."

THE SEALED BOOK.

A SCENE IN HEAVEN.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

Seen by Daniel and John—No One to Open the Book—The Lion as the Lamb—The Song of Rejoicing—A New Era Begun in Heaven—A New Dispensation on Earth—The Lord's Title-Deeds—His New Work.

THE fifth chapter of the Apocalypse contains the account of the investiture of the Lord Jesus as the Son of Man. In this character He is to execute the judgment of God upon the world of the ungodly.

This vision is evidently the same as that seen by the prophet Daniel (Daniel 7 : 13, 14). The Apostle John's representation of the scene is more full, opening to us a view of majesty and glory in heaven. He shows us the Ancient of Days enthroned in celestial state and attended by thousands and thousands of bright and intelligent beings. They evidently understand the scene and its occasion, and seem to know what is to be done, and what eventually is to be the result.

"I saw," continues the apostle, "in the right hand of Him that sat on the throne a book written within and on the back, close sealed with seven seals."* Much interest is centred in that mysterious book, and large expectation fills the minds of the surrounding hosts on account of it.

Next, the apostle says: "I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof?" All was still and silent after the proclamation of this herald, and the heavenly throng remained in expectancy. The narrative continues, "No man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon" (Rev. 5 : 2, 3). And John says of himself, "I wept much, because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon" (Rev. 5 : 4).

While he was thus absorbed in his sorrow, one of the elders said unto him: "Weep not; behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof. And I beheld, and, lo" (instead of the lion), "in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth. And He came, and took the book out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the throne" (Rev. 5 : 5-7).

The Person who is thus brought before the Ancient of Days is the same of whom we read in the fifth chapter of Revelation. He is surrounded with the same beings—namely, the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders. He comes forward now, and takes the book into His hand as One who has the right to do so. Into His hand it is given, as the One who alone is worthy to open "and to loose the seven seals thereof." Immediately upon His taking the book, the heavenly throng break out into songs of glorious adoration and thanksgiving.

It was such a song as had never been sung before. The apostle in the first chapter of Revelation gives us a hymn of praise; but it does not reach as far as this one. It goes to the extent of saying, "Thou hast made us kings and priests unto God;" but now that the Lamb has taken the book into His hands, the new song adds, "and we shall reign on the earth." Partakers and sharers with the Lord in His humiliation and sacrifice, they are now to be sharers of the glory which is to be put upon Him.

* The prophet Daniel was commanded to "shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end."—Dan. 12 : 4.

On hearing the song of the angels, "the four beasts said, Amen; and the four-and-twenty elders fell down and worshipped Him that liveth for ever and ever" (Rev. 5:14). While this grand chorus of praise and glory is ascending, the four living creatures are not unmindful of the orphans left upon the earth, and who are suffering, or about to suffer, in the great tribulation which is coming. Therefore they appear before the throne, "having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints" (Rev. 5:8). They praise the Lord for taking His glorious office, and they plead for the persecuted ones He is about to deliver.

From these songs and triumphs we can easily understand that a new era is begun in heaven, and that is to be ushered in upon the earth. God is about to change His action toward the sons of men. Hitherto He has been beseeching sinners through Christ to be reconciled to Him, and to accept His salvation (see II Cor. 5:20); now He deposes Him who was the Saviour to be the Judge; or, rather, as Ruler and King, to demand submission. Formerly He besought men to accept His grace; now He will require and compel obedience in His kingdom.

Let us next ascertain who is this Person thus brought before the Ancient of Days and welcomed by the heavenly host. We understand in a general way that it is none other than the Lord Jesus Christ. It is needless to say that He is not there as the Son of God who came to seek and to save sinners, or as the One who had saved that rejoicing multitude around Him. Nor is He there as the Bridegroom of His Church, which has been taken up to be with Him where He is. He appears rather as the Son of Man, who is invested with all power.

One of the elders (they belonged to the Old Testament dispensation) pointed Him out to John as the Lion; and when John (who belongs to the Christian Church) looks up, he sees "a Lamb as it had been slain." From these two indications or figures it is easy to identify in this Person the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now we may understand what is the meaning and import

OF THE SEALED BOOK.

It is the title-deed of the Lord's inheritance as the Son of Adam and the Son of David. The book throws light on the Goel, and the Goel on the sealed book. (See Lev. 23:25; Jer. 32:7-15.)

The sealed book in Revelation is the antitype of those title-deeds which were made and kept in Jewish times. It is, as I have already said, the title-deed of the Lord's inheritance, which, however, cannot be redeemed or possessed until the Jews have returned to their own land, or until the time of the Gentiles is fulfilled.

It is, then, as the Great Kinsman or Goel of Adam, and of Abraham, and of David, that the Lord Jesus Christ is adored and worshipped before that glorious and triumphant throng. They rejoice in anticipation, for they are sure that the great work will be accomplished which is now, and here, thus solemnly and mightily undertaken.

Much, very much, is to be done before the Lord will rest in peace as the Second Adam, or in peace sit upon His throne as the antitype of Solomon. When He was here upon earth He only paid the price of redemption; but now He is taking upon Himself to accomplish the redemption of His purchased possession. It has belonged to Him all these two thousand years. In taking the sealed book, He is but taking up His rightful position, that He might go forth to punish the rebellious; that He might restore the earth from that curse which was brought upon it by the fall, and that He might overcome and bind Satan, who has been so long deceiving souls. This is the work in which henceforth He is to be engaged until it is accomplished, and then He will take to Himself His kingdom and reign over the whole earth.

He will open the seals of the mysterious book, and as they are opened one by one in the presence of the heavenly throng, there will be corresponding action and events upon the earth. Not until all the seals are finally opened shall we see the Lord come in majesty and power to take actual possession of the kingdoms of the world.

PRISONERS OF HOPE.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam. Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

Three Classes—I. Consecrated Christians—II. The Inquirers—III. The Listless—Prisoners Without Hope—The Fallen Angels—The Impenitent Dead—Sudden Death of a Hearer—A Preacher's Dream in the War.

"We are bid to come as prisoners of hope" (Zech. 9:12). I turn over the pages of my Book, and I find there are three classes of prisoners with hope.

"I. The first class I find mentioned here are the consecrated Christian men and women of this world—men who have left all to follow Christ. We are prisoners of hope. We are prisoners hemmed in by the environments of earth, temptation, and of life. We are prisoners, but, thank God, prisoners of hope. 'Brother, I have laid down at night and gone to sleep, and dreamed of heaven. I have sat down and read of heaven. I have listened to the minister as he told me of heaven. I have thought of heaven; but oh, how inspiring the blessed thought, some day I will get there. Thank God for the city. And, brother, when we get there we will be free men!'"

"II. There is another class of prisoners with hope. That is those men and women who are attending these meetings, and they say: 'I have got a personal interest; I want to be saved.' Brother, you are penitent to-night; you are sorry you are a sinner; you are sorry you have done bad. I want to tell you another thing, that there are just thousands of people all over America that are tired of a life of sin. I know what my life was. Whenever I sat down and began to think over my own case, I got miserable, that, with all the lights and privileges I had, oh what a bad man I was. I am sorry for it."

I WISH I WAS GOOD, and I have said it a thousand times as a sinner—"I wish I was a good man; I would give anything in the world if I was a good man." My life for three or four years before I was converted was turbulent indeed. If I would sit down an hour and think of my life, think of myself, I would almost be insane. If you feel in your heart to-night like you want to be a good man, God touched your heart and now you feel it; the same good Spirit that roused that feeling in your nature stands ready to carry it on now unto the feet of Jesus Christ. Foster your good feelings. Yield to your impressions, and then above everything else, say to-night: 'I resolve here and now to give my heart to God, and to cease a life of sin.'

"III. There is another class of prisoners with hope. That is that man that came here to-night; came through curiosity maybe. He has not thought about his soul maybe for five years; but now, as he sits and looks at me in the face, he says: 'Well, after all, there is something in religion for me; I wish I was a good man; this is the first sermon I have heard for five years; I don't know hardly how I ever came to be sitting under the sound of this sermon.' But, my brother, if down in the chambers of your soul to-night the Gospel reaches out in peace and love yield to the good impression and be a prisoner of hope all the rest of your days. Be a freeman of God in the sweet by and by. Oh, my brother, God is ready and willing to save you to-night."

LISTLESS AND CARELESS

"Now to the other side of the question a moment. There are prisoners without hope. The first class we read of in this Book are the angels who kept not their first estate. They sinned against God and were cast down in chains of everlasting darkness. Another class of prisoners without hope is the men and women in our Gospel-enlightened land who have lived and died rejecting offers of God's mercy, and died impenitent at last. There is one place where I never have preached, and where I never shall preach, and that is out there in the cemetery. I will never go among the tombstones and dead bodies of men to preach the Gospel of the Son of God. No, sir. I preach to the living. No, sir. I preach to men with mind and muscle and nerve and blood and bone. I preach to men who walk and talk among the children of men; and I beg you, brother, I beg you to-night, prepare to meet your God before your body is prepared for that graveyard."

"I stopped in St. Joseph, Mo., last summer, and there said: 'Brother, God has put this meeting between you and an eternal hell. You kick it to one side and rush to hell. Oh, stop, consider, and give your heart to God!' Sitting in that congregation was a young man in the bloom and vigor of health. Before I had left that town that young man who heard the faithful warning staggered, fell upon the sidewalk, and died almost within a minute. Oh, God, prepare the man in this house who shall die first. Maybe before next Sunday's sun shall rise some of us shall have breathed the last."

DURING THE WAR

an incident occurred that illustrates most vividly the point I am making. In the Army of Virginia, the brother of a Georgia preacher was fatally wounded. The preacher brother was telegraphed for to go to the front. He hurried, and when he got there, he found his brother was in a country home, and thought to be mortally wounded. He went out to see him, and walked into the room of the wounded brother, and looked into his wasted face, and took his hand, and said: 'Brother, I am so glad to see you. I am so glad to be able to come here and wait on you. But, brother, the first question is, how about your soul?'

"Ah," said the wounded brother, 'don't talk to me about my soul. With six mortal wounds in my body, how can I talk about my soul. I have neglected my soul all my life. Don't trouble me about that. Don't ask me that question again.'

"The next day he tried to talk with him, but he waved him off, and said: 'Brother, I begged of you yesterday not to trouble me with that question.' This preacher brother sat by him six days and nights but he would not let him mention the subject any more. On the sixth night he could see that his brother was very low but perfectly quiet. About two o'clock in the morning he thought he would lie down on the lounge in the room and rest a little. He did not think he would go to sleep, but he had lost so much rest that he soon fell asleep."

HE DREAMED

his brother had died, and died with his mouth wide open. He dreamed that as soon as his brother was dead the devil came tripping into the room in bodily shape and walked to the side of the bed, and looked down his brother's mouth to see if his soul was gone. The preacher said he dreamed the soul of his brother had hidden behind a pile of wood that had been placed in the room to keep up the fire. He thought the devil scented the soul, and started toward the pile of wood. As the devil started, the brother's soul flew out of the window, crying: 'Lost! lost!' He dreamed he heard the cries in the distance, and the screams of his brother's soul, as it hurried in its flight, the devil in pursuit."

"He said he awoke in a fright, and the light had gone out. He lighted the lamp, and walked up to his brother's side. He was dead, with his mouth wide open. The preacher said he believed God had closed his eyes in sleep that he might see the very thing that took place."

"God deliver me from a guilty sinner's dying bed. I know but one hope, and that is to call upon God, and He says He will hear your voice and deliver your soul."

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Disaster Befell the River and Harbor Bill last week in the House. When the Conference Committee presented its report, it was apparent to the members that the instructions of the House had been disregarded, and it was therefore decided, by a vote of 135 to 102, to reject the report. Two of the three conferees only had yielded to the Senate's terms; Mr. Willis, the third conferee, would not surrender, and he opposed the report in the House. He warned the House that in accepting the bill in its present shape not only that bill but all future bills of the same character would be doomed. He might have added with perfect safety that members who voted for it would be doomed, too. There are few districts in which intelligence is at so low an ebb that the voters do not know the object of the bill, and perceive the motives of members who vote for it. Honest members, and wary members who want to be re-elected by the vote of honest men, are wisely keeping their record clean on this measure.

A Much-Needed Check on the Rapacious British capitalists who are absorbing the public domain was administered last week in the House by the passage of the Alien Landlord bill. It provides that no non-resident alien or foreigner, nor any resident alien or foreigner who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, nor any corporation nor association where at most one tenth of its stock or right of property is owned or controlled by aliens or foreigners shall acquire or own, hold or possess by right, title, or descent, accruing hereafter, any real estate in any of the Territories of the United States: Provided, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to the real estate necessary for the construction and operation of any railroad. It passed the House by a vote of 209 to 6. Some such measure was urgently needed. The greedy crew of dukes, lords, and millionaires who have monopolized the land in their own country until the laborers starve, and the farmer sinks into poverty, will do the like here if they can.

The Senate Passed the Morrison Resolution on Friday with an important amendment which strips it of its most dangerous element. It permits the President to suspend the operation of the resolution whenever an emergency arises which in his discretion justifies his doing so, and he is to report the fact to Congress with his reasons. Whether the House will agree to the resolution so emasculated is doubtful. The Senate also added a clause providing that, for a period of six months, United States trade dollars, if not defaced, mutilated, or stamped, shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States and shall not be again paid out. That the holder of any United States trade dollars may present them at the Treasury and receive in exchange therefor a like amount and value, dollar for dollar, in standard silver dollars or in subsidiary coins. It is a curious fact that the trade dollar is intrinsically worth more than the Bland dollar.

Prohibition Made its Appearance in the Senate on July 26th in the form of a joint resolution favorably reported by the Committee on Education and Labor. It recommended that an amendment to the Constitution be submitted to the Legislature of the States for ratification. The amendment provides that from and after the year 1900 the manufacture and sale and importation of distilled alcoholic intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, and scientific purposes, and for use in the arts, shall cease. The proposal has caused some amusement in and out of Congress, but those who laugh are perhaps unaware what proportion the Prohibitionists already bear to the population, and the proportion increases daily.

The Difficulty with Mexico about the Arrest of Mr. A. K. Cutting seems to be a puzzle difficult to understand. The State Department is reported to be in possession of Mr. Cutting's version of the affair, which must be different from that given by the Mexican papers or Mr. Bayard would not have interfered. The Mexican report, which at the time of writing is the only one published, represents Mr. Cutting as having libelled a Mexican citizen in his newspaper, which is published in Mexico, at El Paso del Norte. Brought into court he retracted the libel and was released. But the same day he crossed the Rio Grande and repeated the libel in an American journal, whereupon he was again arrested and held for trial. He was charged with contempt of court. He demurred on the ground that, as the alleged contempt was committed on American soil, the Mexican courts had no jurisdiction. The court offered to release him on bail, but he declined to take advantage of the offer, and appealed to the United States Government, and Mr. Bayard has demanded his release. The affair has caused much excitement on both sides the frontier.

The Trial of the Chicago Anarchists was Continued through last week. Important evidence was given on Tuesday by a clerk who, on the night when the bomb was thrown, saw Spies and Schwab on their way to the meeting. He followed them, and heard one ask the other if "one would be enough." They were joined by a man named Schnaubelt, who has not been captured, and the clerk testified that he saw Spies hand him something which Schnaubelt placed in his coat pocket, and Schwab then said to him, "Now, if they come, give it to them." Several witnesses aver that it was Schnaubelt who threw the bomb, and this evidence would make it appear that Spies armed him with it. Another witness swore that he saw Spies apply a match to the fuse in the bomb a moment before it was thrown. The defence for some of the prisoners will be an alibi, and for others that they knew nothing of the intention of the miscreant who threw the bomb.

A Large Increase in Drinking and Smoking is shown by the Internal Revenue records for the past year. The beer consumed was six hundred and forty-two million gallons, or more than ten gallons for every man, woman, and child in the country. This is a million and a half of barrels more than the consumption of the previous year. The increase in the whiskey was one million six hundred thousand gallons, and the total was over a gallon for every inhabitant. Tobacco for smoking and chewing shows an increase of eleven million pounds over the previous year. The total was one hundred and ninety million pounds. The consumption of cigars also increased. Thirty-five hundred millions were sold last year, or about sixty for every inhabitant. In 1866 the average was ten to every inhabitant. Thirteen hundred million cigarettes were also consumed, an increase of one fourth over the previous year. Reckoning the cost of these luxuries at the lowest figure, which is, of course, much below the actual amount paid, the total sum spent in them last year must have been eleven hundred and eighty-nine million dollars.

The New British Cabinet was Constituted last week, though several minor offices were not filled. The leading members of the Cabinet are well known by reputation in America. The Premier is Lord Salisbury, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on January 28th. The Foreign Secretary is the Earl of Iddesleigh, better known by his former name of Sir Stafford Northcote. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, or Secretary of the Treasury, is Lord Randolph Churchill, who is also to be leader of his party in the House of Commons. The Secretary for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who was formerly the leader in the House. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is the Marquis of Londonderry, a grand-nephew of the notorious Castlereagh. The Secretary for Home Affairs is almost the only new man among them, Mr. Henry Matthews, a barrister. The President of the Board of Trade is an aristocrat, the Rt. Hon. Edward Stanhope, whose ignorance of commercial affairs must be conspicuous. The Secretary for War is the Rt. Hon. W. H. Smith, whose ridiculous behavior as Secretary for the Navy, some years ago, made him the laughing-stock of every English-speaking nation. He achieved prominence and wealth by organizing a gigantic monopoly for the sale of newspapers at railroad stations.

The Cabinet Appointments have Caused Considerable surprise and some disappointment in England. The men chosen are regarded as reactionary and unfit for their new offices. Lord Randolph Churchill's impetuosity and lack of tact are expected to render his leadership of the House a failure, while he has never displayed any of the financial ability requisite for his other office. Mr. Matthews, it is announced, was appointed to his office at the request of the Queen, who was "charmed by the castigation he administered" the other day to Sir Charles Dilke, and "by his vindication of the sanctities of English home life." She seems to have had no one near her to tell her that not long ago Mr. Matthews was himself disgraced by being made a co-respondent in a divorce case, and that he only said in the Crawford-Dilke case what he was paid to say. The greatest mistake, however, appears to be in sending the Marquis of Londonderry to govern Ireland. The Irish know him only as the representative of Castlereagh, whose name is hated by every patriotic Irishman. The meanest and most ignorant peasant has heard of Castlereagh, the briber and betrayer of the Irish Parliament, and he loathes his name and loads it with curses. Of all the living Englishmen who were eligible for the office, Castlereagh's young nephew is precisely the one man who will enter upon his duties with the strongest prejudice against him. Lord Salisbury cannot be suspected of plotting to provoke rebellion in Ireland, but he has taken the most promising road to that end.

A Sensational Article in a Parisian Journal was published last week in which the writer warned France that a military dictatorship was being planned to overthrow the Republic. The article plainly asserted that General Boulanger, who is Minister of War, was plotting for the supreme command in France, and pointed out several of his speeches and acts as confirmation of the suspicion. The leaders of the Legislature, and prominent statesmen, ridiculed the idea, but it clearly produced a profound sensation throughout France and in European Cabinets. General Boulanger is forty-nine years of age, has a reputation for bravery, and is known to be ambitious. In the present unsettled condition of France, when Radicalism appears to be increasing, and the Monarchists are excited by the expulsion of the princes, an opportunity is presented for a bold, unscrupulous man to grasp the supreme power, if, like Napoleon I. he has the confidence of the army. This General Boulanger is said to possess in a marked degree, and that fact may have led to the suspicion.

The Census of the Sunday-Schools of New York City has just been completed by the New York Sunday-school Association. The following are the results: The total number of Sunday-schools of all evangelical denominations in New York, is 370. Of this number, Protestant Episcopal churches support 83, Presbyterian churches are next, with 66 schools, Methodists 59, and Baptists 41. Chinese missions number 26. The remaining 95 schools are scattered among churches of various denominations. The scholars in all the schools number 103,823, over whom there are 10,152 teachers. Five thousand and fifty-six children united with the churches during the year, and $57,861.28 was taken up in collections in the Sunday-schools.

A Dynamite Outrage on a Church was Perpetrated at St. Clair, Pa., on Friday night last. During the past two years a vigorous crusade against the saloons has been waged by the Law and Order Society, led by Rev. William Owens, the pastor of the English Baptist Church. Soon after midnight, on July 30th, persons residing near the church were startled by an explosion accompanied by a severe shock. An investigation showed that the church was the scene of the explosion. Dynamite had been placed on the highest of the three steps to the vestibule and exploded by a fuse. The greatest force was exerted in the direction of the cellar. The vestibule was wrecked. The windows were shattered, those on the south side being the worst wrecked. The front doors were splintered, and the frames shattered into match-wood. The act is believed to have been prompted by malice against the pastor, on account of the liquor prosecutions. Eight months ago the house and store-front of a prominent member of the society were similarly blown up with dynamite.

The Baptist Publication Society has Suffered a severe loss by the dishonesty of its head book-keeper. It is stated that the total defalcation amounts to thirty thousand dollars. Mr. Peirson, the book-keeper, was thrown from his carriage in May last, and his leg was broken. As he was unable to attend to business, and it was necessary to prepare a statement for the forthcoming annual meeting, an accountant was called in to do the work. He speedily discovered that something was wrong with the accounts, and, as his investigation proceeded, the whole startling deficit was found. Mr. Peirson has been arrested, and admitted to bail. He admits that he took the money for stock speculations in which he lost heavily. He has turned over to the Baptist Publication Society the whole of his property toward the loss. It is only a short time since the Baptist Home Mission Society was robbed of a still larger sum by their counsel.

A National Charitable Organization has Resulted from the reunion of the chaplains of the Sanitary and Christian Commission at Valley Camp. The organization will include not only the Christian and Sanitary Commissions, the Red and White Cross societies, but also all benevolent societies in the United States. One of the delegates, in detailing the object of the organization, said: "Our working members will be ready at a moment's notice to go to any part of the United States should a pestilence break out. If, for instance, the yellow fever should again rage in the South hundreds of our soldiers would at once be sent to the field of suffering. Our aim will be to minister to the sick and suffering in every part of our country. I consider the formation of such a society one of the greatest triumphs for humanity and civilization. The brotherhood of man is our motto, and 'Do unto others as you would have others do unto you' is our watchword." The committee having the matter in charge consists of the Rev. John O. Foster, Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer, Joseph D. Weeks and President G. H. Stewart. The plan also embraces missionary work in the Far West, and one of the objects of the society will be to send religious and secular reading matter to all parts of the country. The poor, the sick and the suffering are our Lord's representatives on earth, by His special appointment. It is a hopeful sign that the Church is recognizing its duty toward them, and not forgetting that they have bodies as well as souls.

A Knotty Question for the State Department was submitted last week by our minister at Constantinople. The Sultan of Turkey has issued a circular to the governors of the various provinces instructing them to enforce the law which stipulates that the naturalization of Turkish subjects abroad shall not be recognized. The governors are requested, in the event of the return to Turkey of the class referred to, to continue to treat them as Turkish subjects, and not permit consular intervention in their cases. The circular is mainly directed against American naturalized citizens, as it is seldom that a Turk is so enamored with any other country he may visit as to desire to become a citizen of it. The American courts have at various times naturalized a large number of Armenians, who are the persons concerned. Until this matter is arranged between the two governments they will do well to stay here; it certainly will not be safe in the face of this circular to be found in Turkish territory. Young Christians who have abjured allegiance to the devil should exercise similar discretion. In visiting their old haunts they render themselves liable to spiritual disaster, from which, though Christ may deliver them, they must suffer shame and sorrow (II Peter 2:20).

A Deplorable Mistake in a Thunderstorm was made in Pittsburg, Pa., on July 26th. There lives in that city a lady who is terrified at thunder and lightning. When the memorable storm of Monday week broke on the city in its fury she was almost paralyzed with fright. She rushed up to her bed-chamber for a vase of holy water with which to sprinkle herself in the hope that in that way she might ward off the impending danger. In the excitement of the moment and in the semi-darkness of the room she missed the bottle in which the water was kept and seized one filled with sulphuric acid. She was not sparing with the terrible fluid, but dashed it in her face and over her head in considerable quantity. The first intimation she had of her mistake was the terrible pain which the acid inflicted. She cried out almost instantly in her anguish, and the neighbors, hearing her cries, ran into the house to see what was the matter. They found the woman on the floor almost crazed with pain. Physicians were called, who say that she will in all probability lose her eyesight, and that her face will be much disfigured. The acid had eaten into the flesh before its course was stayed. Every one must be sorry for the poor lady's suffering, and regret that she was so imprudent as to keep the bottles where a mistake could be made. She will do well to keep the holy water in a place by itself in future, or, better still, throw the useless stuff away and seek the real holy water which is efficacious for the salvation of body and soul (John 4:14).

A Large Steamship on Fire in the Narrows of New York Harbor caused some excitement on July 28th. The sound of a fog-horn shortly after sunrise attracted the attention of persons along shore to a steamer which was recognized as the Labrador from Havre. Two tugs immediately went out to where she was anchored opposite Quarantine station. A thick volume of smoke with thin tongues of flame enveloped the ship, and it needed some courage to go on board. Nearly an hour before, the pilot, who had brought the ship in, noticed smoke coming from a ventilator amidships, but supposed it came from the cook's fire. He mentioned it to the captain, however, who knew at once that the ship must be on fire, and was aware that the wood-work, being old and often painted, would burn like tinder. Then the captain had the fog-horn sounded and assistance came. "It was a pleasure to see those Yankees," said an officer afterward. "They rushed down below regardless of fire or smoke; they broke in dead-lights, and poured in such a flood of water that the fire was checked. They saved the ship." Meanwhile men were sent to the cabins and steerage, in which nearly two hundred passengers were sleeping. In clearing the steerage some of the passengers had to be dragged from their bunks. They could not understand why they were aroused until they reached the next deck. There the smell of smoke hastened their movements. Happily no lives were lost. The vessel was run aground and the passengers and crew were safely landed. Christian workers have the same difficulty in arousing sinners to a sense of their danger, which is far more terrible (Jude 23).

A Coffin Purchased, but not Claimed, is in an undertaker's shop at St. Paul, Minn. The Globe of that city says that several years ago an invalid gentleman from New York arrived there and put up at the International Hotel. He was seriously ill, and neither he nor his friends had any hope of his recovery. So certain was he that he would soon die that he sent for an undertaker and ordered his coffin. He insisted on being measured for it, and gave minute instructions about its material and style. The undertaker did not hurry it, the man being still alive; but at last it was completed, and remained in his shop awaiting orders. There it is still, the man having recovered and returned to New York. We can but hope that a man whose thoughts were so fixed on his death as to give a premature order of this kind, also made other preparations for the event still more important. If so, he has found that in preparing for a Christian death-bed he made the best preparation for a useful and happy life (I Tim. 4:8).

A Wedding was Solemnized on a Bridge in Maine recently. During the heavy storm that passed over the State on July 24th a judge was driving from Winslow to Waterville. As the rain became almost a torrent he turned aside for shelter under the covered bridge which spans the Sebasticook. There was another carriage already on the bridge when the judge drove in, and the inmates, two couples, recognized him at once. Presently one of the gentlemen alighted from the carriage and came over to the judge with the request that he would make one of the couples husband and wife. As they had the requisite papers in proper form the judge complied. The parties stood up in their carriages, and there with the accompaniment of the pattering of the rain on the bridge roof and the roar of the Sebasticook below, the words were pronounced which united two lives. It may be hoped that the commencement of their married life will be an augury of their future, and that in the storms of life they may find a shelter far above the boisterous tides of the world's strife. Such a sure refuge is offered them in Christ (Prov. 18:10).

A Treasure Cost a Life in New York on July 28th. About a year ago, a Bavarian immigrant who was married and settled here and was doing well, sent to Bavaria for his mother, who was about sixty years old. She came, and resided with her son and daughter-in-law in their flat on the third story of a house on One Hundredth and Eleventh Street. She brought with her Bavarian bonds worth $2400, and had beside American money to the amount of $200. She kept it concealed between the mattresses of her bed. On Wednesday, while sitting in the parlor with her daughter-in-law, the two ladies smelled fire. The younger one ran to the head of the stairs and saw that the house was on fire. She ran back, snatched up her sleeping babe, and calling to the old lady to follow her, made her way through the smoke to the street. But the old lady did not follow. She stayed to get her money from between the mattresses, and by the time a fireman made his way to her she was suffocated with smoke and dreadfully burned. He found her lying dead, with the bag that contained her treasure tightly clutched in her hand. She had sacrificed her life to save her money. It was a foolish thing to do, but she probably did not realize her danger. A still more foolish thing is that many persons are doing who are deliberately risking their souls in the mad race for wealth (Matt. 6:25).

A SEASONABLE EXHORTATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ."

-1 PETER I: 13.

Peter's Absorption in his Master—Ardently Expecting His Second Advent—Its Nearness—An Event to be Hoped For—Urged as a Motive—I. The Argument—II. The Exhortation—The Girding Implies Earnestness—Determination—The Command to be Sober—A Changeable Christian—The Preacher Reproved—III. Expectation—Of Perfection—Of Vindication—Colonel Davenport's Composure.

To read the whole chapter is most helpful to the understanding of our text. If we have studied it carefully we must have said to ourselves: "How full of their Lord were the minds of these holy writers!" Peter can scarcely write a verse without an allusion to the Lord Jesus Christ. A second thought will have occurred to you: How ardently these men expected

Jesus Christ! Peter was continually speaking of it; and so was his beloved brother Paul. They hoped that Christ might come while they were yet alive: they evidently looked upon His advent as very near. They were not mistaken in this last belief. It is very near. A long time has passed, say you? I answer, By no manner of means; two thousand years is not a long time in the count of God, nor in reference to so grand a business. We are dealing with eternal things, and what are ages? Let us patiently wait. "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise as some men count slackness;" let us persevere in the same belief which filled the minds of the early believers, that Jesus will come, that He may come at any time, and that He will surely come quickly.

It is equally noticeable that while apostolic men looked for the coming of Christ, they looked for it with no idea of dread, but, on the contrary, with the utmost joy. It was to him not a day of terror, and of thunders, and of overwhelming confusion; but the of the work of grace, a period in which glory should crown the grace received through the first manifestation of the Lord. It was all joy to the early believers to think of the Lord's appearing. The falling stars, the darkened sun, the blood-red moon, the quivering earth, the skies rolled up like an outworn vesture—all these things had no horror for them since Jesus was thus coming. Though all creation should be on a blaze, and the elements should melt with fervent heat, yet Jesus was coming, and that was enough for them; the Bridegroom of their souls was on His way, and this was rapture to their expectant spirits.

Observe also, once more: How constantly they were urging this as a motive! Peter never holds it out as a mere matter of speculation, nor exclusively as a ground of comfort; but he is constantly using the Lord's glorious appearing as the grand motive for action, for holiness, for watchfulness. Our text is a case in point: "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." My brethren, let us not set aside a truth which is evidently meant for our stimulus, our strength, and our sanctification; but let us receive it into our hearts, and pray that God may bless it to our practical profiting in all time to come.

I intend to handle the text with special view to the present time. It seems to me that there never was text more appropriate for any day than this one for the time now passing. These are days of great looseness; everywhere I see great laxity of doctrinal belief, and gross carelessness in religious practice. Christian people are doing to-day what their forefathers would have loathed. Multitudes of professors are but very little different from worldlings. Men's religion seems to hang loosely about them, as if it did not fit them: the wonder is that it does not drop off from them. Men are so little braced up as to conscientious conviction and vigorous resolve, that they easily go to pieces if assailed by error or temptation. The teaching necessary for to-day is this: "Gird up the loins of your mind," brace yourselves up; pull yourselves together; be firm, compact, consistent, determined. Do not be like quicksilver, which keeps on dissolving and running into fractions; do not fritter away life upon trifles, but live to purpose, with undivided heart, and decided resolution.

I. First, then, here is

indicated by "wherefore." True religion is not unreasonable; it is common sense set to heavenly music. Albeit that true religion may be above reason, it is never contrary to reason; but if we had the reason of God, our reason would teach us what His Holy Spirit has revealed. Pure religion is pure truth; God help us to be sure of this! Holiness is also a direct logical inference from revelation. Peter might seem to be too impetuous to be argumentative; but it is clear that to him godliness was a matter of argument, that he saw a distinct connection between the doctrine of grace and a holy life. Here in our text He saith, "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind."

Will you kindly follow me while I run over His argument? I shall have to give you only an outline of it. Here it is. He begins by saying, "Elect according to the fore-knowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." There is an argument, then, in the first and second verses, forcibly supporting the precepts of the text. If we had time to elaborate it, we should see that it well behoves the elect of God to choose His service resolutely, to abide in it steadfastly, and hope for its reward with supreme confidence. But next, Peter declares that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has "begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." Oh, ye begotten of God, see that ye live as such! You are live not the low life of the merely natural man. Your election and your regeneration call you to holy living. Then he goes on to say that you are "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." God Himself surrounds you as with a wall of fire. If the power of God keeps me, shall I be hopeless? Shall I speak like one that has no hereafter to rejoice in? It cannot be so; if God doth keep us we will keep our hope even to the end.

Further, the apostle goes on to say that we may be passing through needful trial, but it is only for a little while. That your religion may be really solid metal, and not an imitation of it, or a mere gilded bauble, you must be tried. Come, then, brethren, if this fire is to be passed through, let us gird up our loins to dash through it. Let us not fear, for the Lord hath said: "When thou passest through the fire I will be with thee, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." My brethren, if for a little time we must be tried, let us set our faces like flints to bear the trial. Let us not be intoxicated with sorrow or fear. Since God hath a grand design in it, let us bow ourselves to His divine will, and only ask that His holy design may be fully answered.

Once more: the apostle goes on to say that the Gospel which we believe, and which we teach, and for which we are ready to suffer, and even to die, is a Gospel that comes to us with the sanction of the prophets. Be sober and steadfast in the belief of the old faith; never be moved by anything that modern rationalism or ancient unbelief may have to say. Standing side by side with prophets, looking with intent gaze to the same object which fixes the attention of angels, we are not abashed by ridicule, nor disquieted by opposition. We stand fast, as upon a rock, girding up the loins of our mind, and hoping to the end. There again is right good argument. Is it not so?

II. I beg you, dear friends, to follow me to the next head of discourse—namely,

THE EXHORTATION.

The exhortation is a triplet: "Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end." The exact meaning of the metaphor, "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind," is to be found in the form of Oriental dress, which requires the use of a girdle, and the girding of it tightly, lest the garments should entangle the feet of the traveller, or otherwise hinder his action. "Gird up the loins of your mind." My brethren, that certainly teaches us, in the first place, earnestness. A man going to work and tightens his robes. He has something to do which demands all his strength, and, therefore, he cannot afford to have anything hanging loosely about him, to hinder him. We brace ourselves for a supreme effort; and the Christian life is always such. We must always be in earnest if we would be disciples of our earnest Lord.

But the figure means more than this, does it not? It means determination, and hearty resolution. The man who girds himself up for a work means that he is resolved to do it at once. He has made up his mind; no shilly-shallying remains with him, no hesitancy, no questioning, no holding back; he is set upon his course and is not to be moved from it. You will never get to heaven, any of you, by playing at religion. There will be no climbing the hill of the Lord without effort; no going to glory without the violence of faith. I believe that the ascent to heaven is still a staircase, every step of which will have to be fought for. He heard sweet singers on the roof of the palace, singing:

"Come in! come in!

Eternal glory thou shalt win."

Many had a mind to enter the palace and win that eternal glory; but then at the doorway stood a band of warlike men, with drawn swords, to wound and kill every man that ventured to enter. Therefore many who would have liked to have walked on the top of the palace did not care for so dangerous an enterprise; they desired the end but not the way to it. At last there came one with a determined countenance, and he said to the writer with the ink-horn by his side: "Set down my name, sir;" and when his name was duly recorded, he drew his sword and rushed upon the armed men with all his might. It was a fierce conflict, but he meant to conquer or die, and he did conquer; he cut a lane through his enemies, and by and by he, too, was heard singing with the rest,

"Come in! come in!

Eternal glory thou shalt win."

By conflict throughout a whole life we come to our rest; and there is no other way. You cannot go round to a back-door, and enter into heaven by stealth. You must fight if you would reign. Wherefore, gird up the loins of your mind.

I cannot stay long upon one point, though there is so much to be said. The second exhortation is—"Be sober." And does not that mean, first, moderation in all things? Do not be so excited with joy as to become childish. Do not grow intoxicated and delirious with worldly gain or honor. On the other hand, do not be too much depressed with passing troubles. There are some who are so far from sobriety that, if a little goes wrong with them, they are ready to cry: "Let me die." No, no. "Be sober." Keep the middle way; hold to the golden mean.

There are many persons to whom this exhortation is most needful. Are there not men around us who blow hot to-day and cold to-morrow?—their heat is torrid, their cold arctic. You would think they were angels from the way they talk one day; but you might think them angels of another sort from the manner in which they act at other times. They are so high up, or so low down, that in each case they are extreme. To-day they are carried away with this, and the next carried away with that. I knew a Christian man right well to whom I was accustomed to use one salutation whenever I saw him. He was

A GOOD MAN, BUT CHANGEABLE.

I said to him, "Good-morning, friend! what are you now?" He was once a valiant Arminian, setting young people right as to the errors of my Calvinistic teaching. A short time after, he became exceedingly Calvinistic himself, and wanted to screw me up several degrees; but I declined to yield. Anon he became a Baptist, and agreed with me on all points, so far as I know. This was not good enough, and therefore he became a Plymouth Brother; and after that he went to the Church from which he originally set out. When I next met him, I said: "Good-morning, brother, what are you now?" He replied, "That is too bad, Mr. Spurgeon; you asked me the same question last time." I replied, "Did I? But what are you now? Will the same answer do?" I knew it would not. I would earnestly say to all such brethren, "Be sober. Be sober." It cannot be wise to stagger all over the road in this fashion. Make sure of your footing when you stand; make doubly sure of it before you shift.

"Be sober," that is, be clear-headed. The man who drinks, and thus destroys the sobriety of his body, is befogged and muddled, and has lost his way. Ceasing to be sober, he makes a fool of himself. Do not commit this sin spiritually. Be specially clear-headed and calm as to the things of God. Ask that the grace of God may so rule in your heart that you may be peaceful and serene, and not troubled with idle fear on one side or with foolish hope on the other.

Finally, let us "hope to the end." Never despair; never even doubt. Hope when things look hopeless. A sick and suffering brother rebuked me the other day for being cast down. He said to me, "We ought never to show the white feather; but I think you do sometimes." I asked him what he meant, and he replied: "You sometimes seem to grow desponding and low. Now I am near to die, but I have no clouds and no fears." I rejoiced to see him so joyous, and I answered: "That is right, my brother, blame me as much as you please for my unbelief, I richly deserve it." "Why," he said, "you are the father of many of us. Did you not bring me and my friend over yonder to Christ? If you get low in spirit after so much blessing, you ought to be ashamed of yourself." I could say no other than, "I am ashamed of myself, and I desire to be more confident in the future." Brethren, we must hope, and not fear. Be strong in holy confidence in God's Word, and be sure that His cause will live and prosper. Hope as much as ever a man can hope; for when your hope is in God you cannot hope too much.

III. This has brought me to my last head, in which there is much of sweetness. I ask your patience while I dwell upon it. The third point is

EXPECTATION:

"Hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." What you have got to hope for, brethren, is more grace. God will always give you grace. He will never deal with you upon the ground of merit; that door is shut; He has begun with you in grace, and He will go on with you in grace, therefore "hope to the end for the grace."

The grace you are to look for is grace linked with your Lord Jesus Christ; you never did receive any grace apart from Him, and you never will. The grace you are to hope for is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ. He has been revealed once, at His first advent; hence the grace you have. He is to be revealed very soon in His second advent; hence the grace that is a-coming to you. Think of the grace that is a-coming. "My ship is coming home," says the child. So also is mine; Jesus is coming, and that means all things to me.

But what can this grace be that will be received at His coming? Justification? No; we have that already, by His resurrection. Sanctification? No; we have that already, by being made partakers of His life. What is the grace that is to be revealed at His coming? Just look at the chapter, and you will read in the fifth verse: "Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."

is one part of the grace which is to be brought in the last time when Christ comes. When He comes there will be perfection for our souls and salvation for our bodies. Peradventure, we may be alive when He comes; if so, we shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye into perfection; for "this corruption must put on incorruption." Peradventure, we may die before He comes; if so, it does not matter; though corruption, earth, and worms may have devoured this flesh, yet at His coming our body shall rise in the image of Christ's glorious body.

And that is not all. The second grace that Christ will bring with Him when He comes is the perfect vindication of our faith. Those who believe in Jesus may be called fools to-day, but men will think otherwise when they see them shine forth as the sun in the Father's kingdom. Wait a wee bit:

ALL WILL BE CLEARED

soon. Copernicus declared the truth that the earth and the planets revolve around the sun. His opponents replied that this could not be true, for if the planet Venus revolved around the sun, she must present the same phases as the moon. This was very true. Copernicus looked up to Venus, but he could not see those phases. nor could any one else, nevertheless he stuck to his statement, and said: "I have no reply to give, but in due time God will be so good that an answer will be found." Copernicus died, and his teaching had not yet been justified; but soon after Galileo came forward with his telescope, and on looking at Venus he saw that she did pass through exactly the same changes as the moon. Thus wisdom is justified of her children. Truth may not prevail to-day or to-morrow, but her ultimate victory is sure. The mysteries which now perplex us will be solved when the mists are rolled away. Wherefore hope on for the grace that is to be revealed.

Once more: when Christ comes there will be a revelation of perfect glory. Now this is the grace which is to come to us when Christ appears. "Grace!" say you, "You mean glory." I do. Yet what is glory but grace come to perfection?

I have brought you back to the second coming of Christ. I told you it was a practical doctrine. I want to leave that impression upon your minds, that you may go back to your daily work and constant struggle with the world. I should like you to act as an American—Colonel Davenport—did upon a certain occasion. One day, many years back, a thick darkness came over the United States. So exceedingly black was it that the barn-door fowls went to roost in the middle of the day. The darkness grew worse, and people trembled in their houses, declaring that the end of the world was coming. They were all excited and alarmed. One of the Houses of Legislature adjourned under the belief that the day of judgment was come. The other House was sitting, and the blackness was so intense that everybody was awed. A motion was made that they should break up, as the end of the world had certainly arrived. Colonel Davenport objected, saying: "The judgment is either approaching, or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for adjourning; and if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I move, therefore, that candles may be brought." Brethren, it is dark; but whatever is going to happen, or whatever is not going to happen, let us be found girded, sober, and hopeful. In these dark political times, these dark religious times, I call for candles, for we mean to go on working. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

LET us now enter the refectory of the ancient convent of Santa Maria delle Grazie, at Milan. There we may admire the remains, the relics, we might say, of the celebrated "Last Supper" (il Cenacolo), which Leonardo painted toward the close of the fifteenth century, by order of the prince whose service he had chosen, that Duke Ludovico Sforza, who, having been made prisoner by the French, died miserably at the castle of Loches, in Touraine, after ten years' captivity. Francis I. wished to carry this picture back with him to France, that it might form the finest trophy of his victory at Marignano, which had given him possession of Lombardy. It could not, however, be detached from the wall. This enormous fresco, the masterpiece of its author, and, perhaps, even of all modern painting, has been for a long time in the most deplorable state of decay. In the sixteenth century, the cardinal Federigo Borromeo reproached the Dominicans who, in 1652, to enlarge the door of the refectory, cut off the legs of the figure of Christ and of the disciples nearest to Him.

When, at the end of the last century, during the wars of Italy, the convent of Santa Maria was converted into cavalry barracks, and the refectory into a store for fodder, we can well imagine that the hussars were not more scrupulous than the monks. General Bonaparte, in 1796, had, indeed, written, using his knee as a desk, an order that this place, consecrated by the genius of Leonardo da Vinci, should be spared from having soldiers quartered in it; but the necessities of war were stronger than his respect for the arts. It was long afterward that Prince Eugene, Viceroy of Italy, had the refectory of the Dominicans cleaned, and also raised a scaffolding before the picture, which allowed it to be examined nearer, but which also allowed it to be injured by curious and ignorant tourists, desirous of carrying away souvenirs.

It is thought that Leonardo da Vinci did not paint this wonderful composition in fresco, that is to say, in distemper, on and in the damp wall, but in oil; or, that, at all events, he covered his fresco with an oil varnish. From this arose its rapid decay. Everything has assisted in the destruction of this great work. It is not merely time, the infiltration of water, the carelessness of the monks, and the insults of the soldiers that have caused the ruin of this picture. More than anything else it has been produced by unskilful restorations, which changed what they touched, and rendered what they respected more fragile. However, the outline of the composition, the attitudes of the figures, and even the general effect of color, can still be vaguely seen. This is sufficient to make the coldest and most superficial spectator, and even one ignorant in the arts, bow with respect, as did Francis I., before this sublime work.

The "Last Supper" is too well-known for it to be necessary that I should give a detailed account of it. One remarkable thing is the enormous number of copies made of it by the brush, the pencil, and the burin or engraver's tool, without counting the innumerable studies of detached parts which, since the time of Leonardo da Vinci, artists and amateurs have continually been making before this fresco. At Milan I saw the copy of Vespino (Andrea Bianchi), which the Ambrosian Gallery possesses, and that of Bossi, at the Brera, both incorrect, and both unworthy of the original. Two recent mosaics, one made in 1809, which is at Vienna, the other made more recently by the Roman Rafaelli, have reproduced the "Last Supper" in unchangeable enamel. Engraving has been employed not less than painting or mosaic in perpetuating the remembrance of this celebrated work.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

A VERY sagacious utterance especially appropriate to this time when the question of capital and labor is so prominent comes from one of the wealthiest men in the country—Senator Stanford, of California, who was asked to assist in excluding the Chinese from this country. He said in the course of a long and able letter: "The unemployed in California are numerous, but I do not think they are unemployed because of the Chinese or anything other than their own improvident nature. I have fed tramps at a direct expense of over two hundred dollars a month during the past season on one farm, although there was never a day during that time that we were not short-handed of good men and wanted them. There is room in California for fifteen million of people, and it will then not be more densely populated than the New England and Middle States of the East. Whether the owner of property shall give to those in distress or not is a question for him to determine, settling with his own conscience and with his God to what extent the products of his labor, care, thrift, industry, and economy shall be given to the unfortunate or to the idle, shiftless, and improvident. I trust I am not unduly egotistical in believing that my sympathies in the welfare of my kind are as strong as those of most men, particularly for the poor; and I have a strong faith that the time will come when the comforts of life, at least, will be the common belongings of the poorer people of our country. The wealth of individuals makes up the commonwealth. The most interesting question in regard to it is not who owns, but what use is made of it. Wealth, actively and wisely in use, gives employment and spreads prosperity."

KING LUDWIG'S VAGARIES.

(See Illustration.)

EUROPEAN journals continue to recount the mad vagaries of the late King of Bavaria. Lips that were sealed during his lifetime are now open, and the wildest stories are told of his strange eccentricities. Peasants living outside Munich say that they frequently witnessed such a weird spectacle during the last two years. The demented king shut himself up in his palace during the day, but at midnight, drawn by the finest blooded horses in Europe, he drove about Munich or from town to town in a sort of steeplechase on wheels. He stopped for nothing, and his travelling was like the rushing of a whirlwind, often leaving destruction and even death in his track.

Winter, however, was his grand time. Then when the snow lay crisp on the ground he drove about in a magnificently carved and gilded sleigh, drawn by four Orloff stallions, beautiful, high-strung, and tireless. The death-like stillness of the midnight hour would be broken by the jingle of the sleigh-bells, and the peasant rising and looking out in the moonlight would see the splendid steeds rushing at the top of their speed through the forest to the mountains. Behind them was King Ludwig, seated in the famous sleigh, a miracle of art on which the most renowned carvers in Europe had exercised their skill. It passed like a flash, and had not the staring peasants known that it was their demented king, they would have thought it was some unearthly visitant careering in majestic grandeur through the world.

Many other vagaries did the poor afflicted king indulge in, and it was seen in that palace, as it was seen in the king's palace in Babylon twenty-four hundred years before, that the king who rules is subject to the King of kings, whose will not the mightiest on earth can resist, but must fall helpless and weak when He touches them. "None can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou?" (Dan. 4:35).

THE ORDEAL ON THE PILGRIM.

SUNDAY on board the Pilgrim. The first Sunday of a two years' cruise. Two long years before the eyes of the men would be gladdened by the sight of the stars and stripes waving anywhere but on their own mizzen-peak or on some other ship. They might grumble about their native land a week ago, and would say hard things of her again, but now, and for two years to come, she would be to them the land of the free and the home of the brave—their dear native land.

Two of the men were at a port-hole below, not being on the starboard watch then on duty. They had on their best shirts and trousers in honor of the Sunday, and were enjoying the brief rest before their watch was called. Jem, who was known as "the calico sailor" from his foppish ways, and the care with which he cultivated his whiskers, had disposed himself comfortably with his back to the ship's side in an attitude denoting his elegant ways. Joe, an older man, with clear-cut strongly marked features, was at the same port-hole, his gaze intently fixed on the fast-receding land.

"Bill, come here," he called, as a sailor passed below deck. Bill came, and resting his hand on Joe's shoulder, looked through the port-hole. The resemblance between the two was so striking that it was easy to recognize that Joe and Bill were brothers. "Just going in, ain't they Bill," Joe observed, laconically.

"That's so," said Bill, "wish you and I were there, don't you, Joe? First voyage I've ever sailed when I wished I was in a church instead of on a ship. Curis, ain't it? Well, it's a sight better."

"I guess you'll both throw that church-going nonsense overboard afore we're home again," Jem observed, fondling his whiskers. "It's only fit for land-lubbers."

"It's fit for anybody," said Bill. "I'd sooner fling myself overboard than religion. I guess it'll be a stiffish breeze in this ship with fellows like you around, but we'll stick, won't we, Joe?"

"No doubt o' that," Joe answered, keeping his eyes all the time on the people moving into the little mariner's church in the distance. "It was pretty hard to get, but it's a good thing to tie to, and, God helping us, we'll hold on, come what come may."

"It's the grog as'll beat you," Jem predicted, "you won't get through your work without it, specially when you see it served out to the hull of us. You'll make up your mind to a sup with the rest, I bet. And when you're called up again just as you're going to turn in, you'll swear same as usual, you'll see. Who ever heard of a sailor worth a rope's end ever being religious? Get out, I don't hold with it."

The two men knew that Jem had ground for his predictions. It would be a severe ordeal, for they would have to contend with the habits of thirty years, as well as the gibes and ridicule of their messmates. Jem was present at the mariner's church three weeks ago when the two brothers were converted. He had witnessed their agony of anxiety, and their joy when light dawned upon them. He was sceptical of their staying power then, and now that he saw the character of the crew, he was sure they would have to drop their religion. But he had miscalculated the moral courage of the two men, and more than all he knew nothing of the Omnipotent help on which they relied, and which was able to keep them to the end.

The weeks and months of the voyage passed on with the monotony of sea life, and still the two "holy brothers," as they were nick-named, held on their way. Afloat or ashore there was no inconsistency detected by the men who watched them closely. They were both excellent sailors, and their work was done with their usual energy and ability. Religion had not deteriorated their powers. There was a change in them in another direction. They had good voices, but the lewd songs which they had been accustomed to sing were discarded. Instead, the sailors, who insisted on their singing as usual, heard Gospel hymns, sung with sweetness and power. Every man on board turned to them instinctively in a difficulty and were sure of sympathy and kindness. One was helped with the mending of his clothes; another, who could not write, had a letter written for him, to be mailed in the first port touched at; a third, who hurt his hand early in the voyage, was relieved now and again by some work done for him that would have caused him suffering. Though the "holy brothers" were laughed at they were liked.

But it was in a storm off the Horn that the tide really turned. Not a man on board thought the Pilgrim would live through it. Darkness like night prevailed at mid-day, and for thirty-six hours there was not light enough to see their course. Hope was completely abandoned. The starboard watch went below for a short rest, being utterly worn out. Bill knelt down as usual before flinging himself in his bunk. "Say it out loud, Bill," said a voice close to him. "We'll all be at the bottom afore morning." So Bill said it out loud, and he prayed very earnestly for the souls of his messmates, and there were several Amens when he ended. When they went on deck again Bill told his brother about it, and when the port watch went down Joe volunteered to say a prayer, and his proposal was welcomed.

The Pilgrim lived through the storm, but the jeering was never renewed. The two brothers were the most popular men on the ship, and many who had not the courage to declare themselves on their side, secretly wished they had the same hope in them as had their godly messmates.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.*

Napoleonic Tactics.

THE young men scarcely listened to the closing exercises of the society. Both were watching intently the young lady who had so strangely interested them. That was not the time for analyzing their emotion, and neither of them attempted it, but they were profoundly conscious of the feeling, and the time had not come for them to regard each other as rivals. They were rather drawn together by a common interest.

"Come, hurry," said Leroy, "we may learn something of her by the companions she has.

Let us see who goes home with her."

They hastened to the door and lingered among the groups there until the mysterious lady passed out. But there was no clue. Two ladies were with her, and both were strangers to the young men. No one whom they knew spoke to her, so that they saw no way to an introduction.

"It is very provoking," said Train. "I hate to be baffled, and I hate a mystery. I shall not rest till I find her out and make her acquaintance."

"Nor I," said our hero. "It would be an education to know her. I never saw so bright an intelligence in so fair a form. I suspect neither you nor I would agree with her, for she seems to stand in the old ways; but we should have to stand to our guns. She would prove a formidable antagonist. However we might fare in a conflict of words with her we should not have to complain that her conversation was insipid. She wields her rapier pretty skilfully."

"You are right; I fancy compliments and pretty speeches are not much in her line. We both had a touch of her steel to-night. I do not like her any the less for that. It is the inane colorless women that I despise. They tire me. This girl has a masculine understanding. She knows her own mind, and has the courage to utter it. I shall certainly try to get an introduction."

"And then you will introduce me?"

"I don't know," said Train, gaily. "Is that the code of honor? You would be a rival, you know. I think if all is fair in love and war I am entitled to any advantage that may accrue from prior acquaintanceship, if by superior strategy I can get acquainted first."

"That is a little selfish, I think," said Ransom. "I have had no experience in Cupid's campaigns, so I am not able to say whether you are right. But there is a bargain, I think, we should make. We are good friends now, and we should agree to remain so. After all, while we act honorably we ought to retain our mutual respect. If we become rivals each must feel that the other's effort is natural. As I hope to make the lady my friend I can understand your having the same wish, and for myself I can promise that I will not think the worse of you if I fail and you succeed."

"Yes, that is fair," said Train. "I agree. The unsuccessful man is to take his failure good-humoredly and without resentment. Here is my hand upon it."

The young men shook hands cordially, said good-night, and parted.

Ransom went to his room, and met his chum there.

"I say, Burt, you ought to have been at the Franklin Society to-night. We had one of the most seraphic performances I ever witnessed, and by a girl, too, and, to cap it all, it was that same lost Atlantis girl I told you of before—the one that we saw in church."

Then he gave an enthusiastic account of the event, and with some power of graphic portrayal, Leroy, as he paced the floor, lauded the performance and performer.

"And what do you think, Burt? she had my name in her essay, and that shows that at least she must have heard of me."

"Why, you conceited booby! Didn't she mention the name of anybody else? You said she had turned the joke on a number of the boys and girls, and I think you said your name came last. How do you know she thought more of you than of the rest? It looks to me as if she had given you the last thought, and had tacked on your name when she was about exhausted for material."

"Oh, pshaw, Burt, you frigid-hearted blighter of hopes, what makes you so cold and heartless?"

"Because I don't want you to fall in love and get into trouble."

"Thank you for your motherly care," replied Leroy, half-irritated. "Why, it would be a pleasure to get into trouble, as you call it, with that girl. It would be a benison even to hear her say 'No.' But how shall I get acquainted with her before some other fellow runs off with her?"

"I don't know," said the other; "but it's time for bed."

And Burt retired; but Leroy sat and meditated. The fact is, he was in love; not altogether with a pretty face, but rather with brilliance of mind. He paid homage to strength of intellect; he could have almost worshipped a real genius, and now to see a woman of real mental power, and yet so truly a woman, in manner and play of wit, was too much for his equanimity. He would kneel and worship at that shrine, and he would be a true devotee, although he would not do homage to his God.

Was it really mental power, the mind of a beautiful and cultured woman, that had attracted the young sceptic? He thought so, but a more acute observer would have given a different explanation. Leroy Ransom had eliminated the soul from his idea of the human system. The anatomist had never found it; physicians and surgeons had seen no trace of it. Every power that man exercises can be traced to some material part of the human organism, and with the impetuosity of the young reasoner Leroy had drawn the inference that what could not be found, and did not show itself in some result, could not exist. Yet it was the soul in this mysterious young lady that had really attracted him, though he knew it not.

The Apostle Paul speaks (II Cor. 3:18) of some who "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory." The phenomenon is not a vain imagination; it is a fact. The soul that gives itself up to God, that delights in Him, that longs for holiness and earnestly seeks it, prints its impression on the countenance. When Moses descended from the mount, his face was so dazzling that the people could not look upon it (Ex. 34:29, 30), and so it is in a less degree with those who go near to God and habitually commune much with Him. There is a spiritual expression, an elevation higher than any the intellect can impart, that transforms the face and makes the commonest features bright. It was this reflection which made the girl seem to Leroy different from others, and suggested the idea that the lost Atlantis must have given up one of its citizens.

Of this secret key to the mystery Leroy had no conception. He recognized the superiority, the purity, and the power, but whence they were derived he knew not. As he ruminated, his thoughts turned to the practical problem of overcoming the obstacles in his way as a stranger. He was piqued by the selfishness of Train, and ardently wished that in this friendly competition he could surpass him.

"It will be difficult," he said to himself. "Train is far better acquainted here than I am, and he will be sure to get a friend to introduce him before Sunday is passed."

He took his face in his hands and meditated.

At last he jumped up, clapped his hands, and exclaimed:

"Eureka! eureka!"

"Found what?" yelled Burt; "you'd better dismiss that girl and come to bed," and he turned around and set a good example by going to sleep.

But Leroy did not go to bed. He got paper and pen and ink, and sat down to his writing-stand and thought.

"It's mighty bold, but emergency is the word; emergency is the palliating circumstance. One can do almost anything in an emergency. I suppose she'll resent it as an impertinence, but I must know whether she will or not. Perhaps the very boldness of the act will arouse her curiosity, and that may prove the 'open sesame' to success. You can't tell what a woman will do. She may be taken by storm more easily than by a long siege. I will try Napoleonic tactics for once. He stormed the fortifications and conquered before the enemy knew he was upon them."

The Napoleonic tactics involved, as Leroy saw, an approach that might be fatal to his success. On the other hand it might achieve it at a stroke. His impulsive nature had no sympathy with him who fears to put his fate "to the touch and win or lose it all." He resolved to act boldly and make a direct personal appeal to the lady herself. He would write to her. If she were the woman of sense he took her to be, she would feel no resentment, but would see that in mentioning his name publicly she had herself thrown down the barriers that social politeness raises around a woman, and had invited an approach.

He sat down at his desk and wrote. Referring lightly to the reproof she had administered to him at the Franklin Society, he thanked her with playful humility for the interest she had displayed in his welfare. Then pointing out that their being fellow-students at the college proved that they had a common desire for intellectual progress, he said sincerely that he believed an acquaintance would be mutually beneficial in promoting that object, as the remarkable essay of that evening proved that each possessed qualities lacking in the other. If his view commended itself to her judgment she would see no impropriety in his addressing her, but would rather avail herself of an opportunity for doing good and getting good. And lastly, as a practical conclusion, he had noticed her at church and thought that their acquaintance might commence, if she desired it, by his calling upon her next Sunday and accompanying her to the service.

It was an honest, manly letter, and reading it over when he had finished it, Leroy saw no reason to alter a single sentence. He folded it, and placed it in an envelope. That brought him face to face with his initiatory difficulty. He could not address it for he did not know the name of the lady to whom he had been writing. That, however, must surely be attainable to-morrow. Some one would know it. Meanwhile he put the letter with its blank cover in his pocket, and retired to rest with the mental quietude which follows a decisive step, and was soon fast asleep.

The next morning Leroy having finished his breakfast at the club, strolled away with one of the older students, who was a member of the Franklin Society, and had been present at the meeting of the night before. With an air of indifference, he remarked: "We had pretty good society last night."

"One of the best we ever had," was the rejoinder.

"By the way, that young lady's essay was real clever, wasn't it? Do you know her?"

"No, I do not; she is a new-comer—just came this term, and is, I think, a member of the Sophomore class. She is unusually bright."

"Do you know her name?" inquired Leroy, with far less appearance of interest than he felt.

"Her name was announced last night as West. Her Christian name I did not hear."

Leroy made an inquiry or two of others, but could not find out her given name, as she was a stranger, and he did not dare to push his questioning too far for fear of arousing suspicion. He felt that everybody he questioned looked right into his heart and divined the secret hidden there. He therefore made no further effort to discover her Christian name. When he reached his room, he took his letter out of his pocket, and addressing it simply "Miss West, City," carried it to the post-office. "Clayville," he thought, "is not so large a place, but that will find her."

That was a day of suspense. He tried to study, but could not. He tried to read, but those scientific authors, who once could hold him spellbound, had no magnetism that day. He tried to read Dickens, but even the great master's creations failed to hold his attention.

The image of the girl he associated with lost Atlantis would come between him and the book, and he read whole pages without comprehending a word. He thought and thought about the girl until he could not imagine at all how she looked. Her real features were lost to him, and yet he knew he would recognize her the moment he saw her.

About noon he went to the post-office. No letter in his box. He ate dinner absent-mindedly. About two o'clock he went again to the post-office. No letter. He went to his room and wrote a letter to his brother Allan. About four o'clock he went to the post-office. No letter. He took a stroll into the woods near the village, and picked up a few fossils, although in his present mood he was as indifferent to them as they were to him. At six o'clock he went to the post-office. No letter. He began to feel sick. This was a gloomy world. How inconsistent was the Christian philosophy! He wondered that even the simplest Christian did not detect the contradiction. How could he believe in a God of love and of unlimited power who nevertheless saw the world full of vexation, misery, suffering, and sin, and did nothing to relieve it?

He ate a few wretched mouthfuls of supper, and turned away with nausea. He waited until eight o'clock, lighted a lamp, talked a while with his room mate, and then went to the post-office. He looked into the box. A letter! He tapped the glass impatiently. The young postmaster smiled a little as he handed Leroy a tinted envelope. There, written in a neat, feminine hand, was his own name.

His heart beat high, but he could not open and read the letter with the lynx-eyed postmaster looking at him. He hastened to his room, sat down, tore open the envelope. He saw with dismay that it had taken but a few words to reply to his lengthy epistle. But they were decisive. Miss Carrie West had received his letter, and would be pleased to make his acquaintance in the manner proposed. This with the address, 19 Cliff Street, was all the sheet contained.

He jumped up, and shouted: "Accepted! accepted!"

"What's accepted, you loon?" said Burt. "There's something wrong with you, Ransom; I've noticed it all day."

"I'm all right now. It's I that is accepted—me—the identical me; and I'm accepted by the lost Atlantis girl. Hurrah for St. Ignatius!"

"Why, how did you get acquainted with her?"

"I wrote to her, and here is her letter, accepting my escort to church to-morrow night."

Burt looked at the letter musingly, and then said:

"It's a fact, but, Leroy, be careful. I'm not satisfied about this. It don't seem quite in tune for her to accept you before she knows you."

"Now, Burt, do hush. Don't throw cold water on everything I do, and don't be too motherly. I'll risk myself with any girl who can write as she can. Carrie West! Carrie West! Bless that name. West! Ah, the place of the sunset with clouds of purple fringed with gold! I shall never look toward the west without thinking of the West."

Did he sleep that night? Very little. He tossed in bed, and imagined himself in every conceivable relation to the girl. At one time they were together at church or society; at another he was wandering with her through the grove while the birds sang; then they were reading together, or discussing scientific problems. At last he fell into a fitful slumber, filled with dreams. He imagined that it was Sunday evening and he was on his way to the girl's abode, and when he was almost at No. 19, he had no hat or coat on. He rushed headlong to his room, wondering whether she had seen him, when he had procured these habiliments, he went again, and was just entering the church with her, when he discovered that he was barefooted and had put on an old ragged dressing-gown instead of his Sunday coat. The audience had just burst into uproarious laughter, when he awoke with the great beads of perspiration upon his forehead. The gentle wooing of Morpheus could not lure him to sleep any more that night.

Leroy rose early; he would gladly have hurried time along had he been able, so eager was he for the evening's appointment. The longest day must come to an end at last, and so did this day, slowly as the hours seemed to pass with him. The evening found him with carefully arranged toilet entering the trim little garden in front of 19 Cliff Street, a full hour before that at which the church service commenced.

JESUS TEACHING HUMILITY.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 15, John 13: 1-17. Golden Text, ver. 15.

The Last Days of Jesus—Given to the Disciples—His Majestic Composure—The Uses of Interruption—The Discouraged Christian Merchant—The Necessary Cleansing—A Slave's Work—A Comforting Word—The Promise of Light—Peter's Impetuosity—What the Washing Involved—The Application of the Act.

WE turn from the last public teachings of Jesus to His last days and hours among His disciples. He "knew that His hour was come, that He should depart out of this world unto the Father." There was no uncertainty about Jesus: uncertainty and indecision come from a want of settled purpose. Jesus was yielded to His Father; His Father always had made known to Him His will, and He did always those things that pleased Him (John 8: 29). "His hour was come," the time when He would offer Himself as the one great sin offering for a lost world. Would not He be too absorbed in His coming suffering to pay any particular attention to His disciples? No; "having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end."

Never was there a life in which there was greater leisure than in the life of Jesus. Everything was in perfect proportion, because all was arranged by a Master-hand. There was no lapping of one duty or occupation over another; there was no hurry; no fear that the time taken up in the present service would make the next one run short of time; the time and strength given fitted the work exactly. Jesus did not do all that man expected of Him, but His yielded will fitted faultlessly into His Father's plan, so that He always had leisure to do what the Father called Him to do. Oh, how we need this close walk with God, which leaves room for the will of God, and waits in loving reverence and confidence for the unfolding of His plan, in order to work into it.

WITHOUT A DISSENTIENT THOUGHT!

"I hate interruptions," says a busy worker, who is much engaged in writing for the Master. But those interruptions are part of the very plan of the training by which the life of Jesus may come to be manifested in that mortal body, and the precious truths which are taught of God and written for the help of others become part and parcel of the life. "I am so hindered at home," says a busy mother, whose children and servants find her endless occupation, and yet whose heart is in the mothers' meeting—the temperance gathering, the mission service. But in the broken crockery, the spoiled dinner, the torn frock, the wilful boy, there is a wide field for the manifestation of God's victory in herself and in her family, and that in things so practical that, when she gets to the meeting, her words are more blessed, because she can tell the people from deeper experience how real God is in daily life.

"I cannot go on with my business," says a brother, "there is so much competition and selfish grasping in trade, and unprincipled people do so get it into their own hands, that I stand no chance if I follow God closely; I must give it up, and take to evangelizing." But, brother, think of the tens of thousands of men of business on whose behalf God needs one who shall be able to witness to them from experience that God does enter into business matters, and does deliver His children in business, as well as in other trials, when they really count on Him to do it. God has for each life given up to Him,

AN EXACT PLAN

into which He wills that that life shall exactly fit, even to its smallest details. So Jesus was at leisure from the overwhelming load which was coming upon Him—at leisure to teach His disciples. The passover feast had just been celebrated by them, that feast which meant more to Him who was "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" than any of the disciples could know. He "loved His own which were in the world," although they had just been striving among themselves "which of them should be accounted the greatest" and have the first place (Luke 22: 24); although He knew that in a few hours' time, every one of them would forsake Him and flee. Supper was ended, but one thing had been left undone: they had not, as was customary among the Jews, washed before eating. Oh, how many there are who want to sit down with Jesus in sweet communion without being first fully cleansed! But only One can remedy this evil—it is Himself. The vessels for cleansing were there, but it was to wash the feet, and they who had just been striving as to which was greatest among them, were in no mood to offer themselves for the slave's work. Only One was sufficiently at leisure from Himself to undertake this service—it was Jesus Himself. He rose from supper, put aside His outer garments, took a towel, girded Himself, poured out water, and began to do the slave's work—to wash His disciples' feet.

The Master knelt behind them, one by one, until He came to Peter. All was silence up to this moment; the silent rebuke of the serving Master was going home to each heart; but Peter, the ever-forward Peter, spoke out: "Lord, dost Thou wash my feet?" "Jesus answered, and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." What a word this has been to broken hearts, and oh, how has patient confidence in God been rewarded when His children were willing to trust Him out of their sight. How often has the removal of one missionary to a higher service above been used of God to stir the hearts of many more to rise up and take his place. How often has an earnest worker been withdrawn from some important sphere of labor where his presence seemed to be essential, and been brought deep into God, and taught by the Holy Ghost to pray in faith for that work, and the whole work has been deepened and strengthened in a way it would probably not have been had he gone on as before. "What I do thou knowest not now (but Jesus Himself knew what He would do, John 5: 6); but thou shalt know hereafter."

Peter, like many young men who think they know everything, and pride themselves on taking the initiative, said: "Thou shalt never wash my feet." He thought he was doing Jesus more honor than did any other of the disciples. But truly he did not know the significance of what Jesus was doing; He had not yet learned that we in order that we may serve. Jesus patiently answered him, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me." No part with Jesus! Was this what was involved? Then, with all the impetuosity of his character, he said: "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." Peter must be something singular, something beyond the others. But Jesus so quietly and patiently explained to him, "He that is washed (or 'bathed') needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all."

Thank God, "the blood of Jesus Christ His Son, cleanseth us from all sin," all sin which is confessed. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." We have no right to remain uncleansed, any more than to remain unpardoned. There are many who have a sense of pardon, but have not yet a sense of cleansing. They have yielded themselves up to be reconciled and pardoned, but they have not yielded themselves to be cleansed from sin, from its desires, and from its power. But when we are bathed or cleansed, there are, day by day, and hour by hour, occasions on which we need the cleansing of the feet—a word which may give a wrong impression, a tone of voice which is not kind, an action which, from sheer thoughtlessness, is selfish, a movement of hurry, through forgetting how Jesus has our whole day in His hands and cannot overpress us.

WHO DOES NOT NEED

the washing of the feet? The lesson had been given; the great Teacher sat down again and commenced the application, "Know ye what I have done unto you? ye call me Teacher and Lord (R. V.), and ye say well for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you." This is a lesson we need to learn. The positions of prominence in Christian work are easily filled; many are eager to fill them, but in these days, as in the days of our Lord, every one wants to be the greatest, and the empty benches among His disciples are always at the back. "I am among you as He that serveth," said Jesus. Thus, those who are the nearest to the heart of Jesus may not be the well-known prominent men and women whose names are in every religious journal; they may be the Christian cook and housemaid who carry out the life of Christ in all their service, and make it easy for their master and mistress to do the more recognized work for the Master; the son and daughter at home who are making things comfortable for an overstrained father or mother; the patient district visitor, known only in her little sphere, but who, every day, carries life and comfort to many. These who willingly take the lowest places in service are the nearest like Jesus. It is greater to serve than to rule; it needs far more of God to be little than to be great. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

THE USEFUL LIFE.

BY H. BONAR.

Go, labor on; spend and be spent,
Thy joy to do the Father's will;
It is the way the Master went;
Should not the servant tread it still?

Go, labor on; 'tis not for naught;
Thine earthly loss is heavenly gain.
Men heed thee, love thee, praise thee not;
The Master praises, what are men?

Go, labor on; enough, while here,
If He shall praise thee, if He deign
Thy willing heart to mark and cheer,
No toil for Him shall be in vain.

Go, labor on; your hands are weak,
Your knees are faint, your soul cast down.
Yet falter not; the prize you seek
Is near—a kingdom and a crown.

Go, labor on, while it is day,
The world's dark night is hastening on;
Speed, speed the work, cast sloth away;
It is not thus that souls are won.

Men die in darkness at your side,
Without a hope to cheer the tomb;
Take up thy torch and wave it wide,
The torch that lights time's thickest gloom.

Toil on, faint not; keep watch, and pray!
Be wise the erring soul to win;
Go forth into the world's highway;
Compel the wanderer to come in.

Toil on, and in that toil rejoice;
For toil comes rest, for exile home.
Soon shalt thou hear the Bridegroom's voice,
The midnight peal, "Behold, I come!"

Russia

RAMBAUD'S is doubtless the best history of Russia in any language. Russian history begins almost in myth, proceeds into a wilderness of conflicting traditions, and emerges into a clear light only in comparatively recent times. It is studded with imposing personalities and darkened by hideous crimes; striking events make it dramatic, the sufferings of a great people lend it pathos; the unrest of the present hour and the uncertain outlook for to-morrow invest it with deep interest. M. Rambaud puts the reader's mind fully in train to consider the situation of the hour.—Literary World, Boston.

THE PERIOD covered is from the earliest times to 1877. It is more interesting as told by M. Rambaud than any romance. It is a cloth of gold studded with diamonds, not of moral brilliance but of intellectual vigor and fascinating personality. Ivan the Terrible, Peter the Great, Mazzeppa, Catherine, Nicholas, and other monarchs of iron will and broad ambition relieve the monotony of war, and the Mazzeppa of Byron comes in as a charming episode. The high civilization attained without the adoption of a civilized form of government, leaves no room for surprise at the strength of Nihilism.—Inter-Ocean, Chicago, Ill.

THE HISTORY of Russia now published is the most satisfactory history of that country ever brought before English readers. The history of the rise of this wonderful nation is remarkable. Its power of absorption and digestion is phenomenal. "The World," said Napoleon once, "one day be ruled by the Slav and Teuton races." The prophecy is under fulfillment. How the Russian Slavs extended from small districts about the Upper Dvina and Dneiper and the Volga and the Ok until they dominate one-sixth the territorial surface of the globe, containing a population of 103,000,000, is most admirably told by Rambaud. The work is well supplied with maps and well indexed.—Pioneer Press, St. Paul, Minn.

RUSSIAN history is full of cruelty, oppression, tyranny, and all sorts of crime, with few peaceful passages to note the advance of civilization. This very fact makes it dramatic and full of stirring incidents, and those who crave this kind of reading, or who desire to know the history of Russia for its own sake, will find M. Rambaud's volumes well suited to their needs. He has taken vast pains to make his history both full and accurate; his style is nervous and forcible, and he gives a graphic picture of the bloody centuries through which the Russian Empire rose. His book lifts to a great extent the veil of mystery that hangs over the origin and growth of Russia.—Inquirer, Philadelphia.

NO STUDENT of history and no observer of public events can afford to be ignorant of Russia—that Polar Bear which stretches on huge paw toward Constantinople and the other toward India—that "muffled destiny" of whose future no one knows save that it is to be great and must affect to a remarkable extent the condition of well-nigh the entire human race. No more weighty matter of debate exists among the nations than that which constitutes the "Eastern Question," and of this question the White Czar, representing territorially the greatest nation on earth and one of the strongest, most ambitious, shrewdest, far-seeing, and persistent, is the central figure. What is the best HISTORY of RUSSIA in the English language? Undoubtedly that of M. Alfred Rambaud.—Morning Star, Boston.

A RECENTLY published biography of one of the Lord's earnest but inconspicuous servants portrays a character so beautiful in its full consecration, and a life so full of simple, unselfish service, that a brief summary of it cannot fail to interest our readers. It is the life of a lady who, all unknown outside her own small circle, might well have as an epitaph the words our Lord uttered about one like-minded, "She hath done what she could."

Esther Matilda Grace Beamish was the daughter of a clergyman. Her father, the Rev. H. Hamilton Beamish, author of "Truth Spoken in Love," and other popular religious works, was at the time of her birth minister of Trinity Chapel, Conduit Street, London, where he filled an important place as one of the leaders of the Evangelical movement. Gifted as he was in a remarkable degree, both personally and mentally, his eloquent sermons drew large congregations, to which he never failed to preach "Jesus Christ and Him crucified."

Esther and her sister Frances, her biographer, shared the same room in the old-fashioned mansion in Somerset Street. It was at the top of the house, and the windows opened, as is common in old houses in London on wide leads, which the two children covered with flower-pots and boxes, turning the grimy place into a miniature garden in spite of the London smoke. They used to enjoy leaning out together to watch the stars and listen to the clocks chiming the hours; amusing themselves by naming each clock by the tone of its bell.

Esther used to creep down-stairs as she grew older, when all were sleeping, to the deserted drawing-room, and read and write there for two or three hours (see illustration No. 1), and this was a time of great enjoyment to her. An unpublished story, and a series of six tracts were written then, the tracts being afterward published.

The year 1863 brought a change of scene for the family. Mr. Beamish became Vicar of Old Cleeve, Somerset, and the family removed from the stifling city to the quiet country village. There the London preacher was warmly welcomed, and so clear and true was his Gospel preaching that it was no uncommon thing for him to see among his congregations on Sunday afternoons the ministers of the Wesleyan and Bible Christian chapels in the parish; and in the former the vicar was constantly prayed for by name, as one whom they revered and loved.

A NIGHT SCHOOL

for men and lads taught by Esther and her sisters, was organized the first winter of their being at Old Cleeve, and was largely attended, some of the men coming a distance of three and a half miles to attend it.

It was not, however, until the year 1871 that Miss Beamish really undertook public speaking in the cause of Christ. Two years before that time her father had quitted his Somersetshire charge for a more important sphere in Oxfordshire. There she entered ardently into active Christian work, and became known as an earnest and successful laborer. She went on a visit to Fakenham to assist in some special services by singing and conversation with seekers. While there some Christian men came from a town a short distance off and begged her to visit them and conduct some services. They said they had long been praying for help and believed that God had directed them to her. Their story led her to believe that the invitation was a call from God and she accepted it. The meetings were held and God blessed them to the conversion of many souls. Writing at the time to a friend to whom she was much attached, she said: "You cannot think how awful the work of speaking is to me. It makes me almost ill; and I have just every reliance in my own powers of language or expression drained from me, and am only able to throw myself on Jesus." The next year Miss Beamish was introduced during, a visit to a friend at Lowestoft, to the work which ever afterward had the greatest charm for her—both English and French, who were there in large numbers. Writing to her sister, she said: "The work among the sailors has become so absorbing that I do not at all like leaving. This is a great herring-fishery place, and whole convoys of smacks come here from France, Cornwall, Scotland, etc. The French boats have each over twenty men, and last week there were a great many in. Miss Waldegrave and I went down to the piers and gave the men some tracts in French, and invited them to a little meeting; they came with us to the room at the Sailors' Home, where they were addressed in their own tongue. At one meeting on Saturday we taught the men 'Tel que je suis'—'Just as I am'—and gave each a copy of the Gospels in French. Miss Waldegrave had to leave that evening, and the men could not be deserted, so on Sunday morning I had to take a French service. On Monday those French boats had left, but others had come in, so I spent all the morning on the fish-market pier among the English and French sailors, (see illustration No. 2), and had another French meeting in the afternoon, besides a class of Christians in the evening."

A MAGDALEN'S DEATH

which occurred while some services were being held in London deeply affected Miss Beamish. The Rev. W. H. Aitken and other clergymen were conducting the services, and Miss Beamish and some lady friends were assisting by holding meetings for women and girls. She thus narrates the incident which is illustrated on the first page (panel No. 3). "A young woman, who for six years had not entered a church, and for two had not written to her mother—a lost girl, was so impressed by what she heard, that she stayed for the after-meeting. A lady spoke with her, and at length she came then and there to Jesus, and believed, 'His blood cleanseth from all sin.' Just as she was going out quite bright, she said, 'There is one thing I should like—a Bible.' The lady said, 'You shall have mine,' and gave it just as it was, with her name in it. The next afternoon the same lady was visiting a large hospital, and one of the nurses said, 'We have such a sad case to-day, a young woman run over by an omnibus, and she is dead; and the curious thing is, she had your Bible in her pocket.' The lady said, 'Did she say anything?' 'Yes, when the doctors stood round her bed, she asked if it was hopeless, and when they said, 'Yes, quite hopeless,' she said, 'Thank God this did not happen yesterday. I am going to Jesus.' She had also written to her mother late the night before, saying, 'After so long, you will be glad to hear from me. I have given my heart to Jesus, and mean to live for Him.'" in the Bois de la Cambre, Spa, in which she successfully engaged in 1876 appears to have caused her considerable gladness. She observes: "The open-air mid-day meetings became most interesting, and a sort of happy fraternity which they recognized with us, attached the navvies to the meetings. The navvies themselves had been won through the providential fact that, an accident occurring one day at the moment of our arrival, the opportunity had arisen for making a very solemn appeal to them. Here is the story: the dinner-bell rang, the men were hurrying to their dinners, and one of them, De Keyser, a Fleming, who was at the bottom of a shaft over ninety feet in depth, called to the man at the windlass to let down the iron-bound basket to draw him up. This man hastily dropped the basket on De Keyser, who was instantly crushed.

WORK AMONG NAVVIES

"When he was brought to the surface fatally injured, and laid on trusses of straw in a shed, we were there, and the three hours spent in helping his kind comrades to ease the almost senseless and quivering body (while waiting for the doctor) were most precious. We had prayed together in the crowded shed, and a time of great solemnity with the large gathering of workmen outside. It was surely a solemn occasion to witness of Christ's love, and of the need of knowing Him! Lady Radstock, Miss Waldegrave, and I visited him frequently in the hospital, where it was discovered that his spine was injured. He lay at the end of a long ward, over the door of which hung a plain wooden cross, and, after a fortnight's illness, he said in reply to some remark about God and sin, 'when we are well we do not think of those things, but now I always look at that'—'je regarde toujours vers là,' turning his face toward the cross. The day before he died, he said quite spontaneously, and as if under a new conviction, 'Yes, Jesus was good, so good, quite different to us, and He died, He was nailed to a cross for us (pour nous autres), for nothing else, and now He wears a crown, and not a crown of mockery; ah, He is good!'"

The four following years were full of earnest Christian service. They were succeeded by work in far different scenes.

A JOURNEY TO EGYPT

was undertaken in the spring of 1880 with an invalid friend, Lady Sebright. They left England with the mail for India, crossing from Brindisi to Alexandria, and thence to Cairo. At Cairo they were visited by Miss Whately, daughter of the late eminent Archbishop of Dublin. In a letter dated, Nile, February 18th, Miss Beamish says: "Monday was full of interest. In the morning we were off to take up a good place to see the ceremony of

BLESSING THE CARPET.

The Khedive, in full-dress military uniform, touched the sacred camel, over which there was a high golden canopy containing part of the carpet, the rest of it being packed in rough deal, swung on camels' backs. I can never describe the sight as to color and brilliancy! The procession came down a winding hilly street, with Arab houses on either side, and parties of veiled women on the roofs, who, as the sacred camel approached, made that curious melodious trill, 'Lirra, lirra, lirra.' Soldiers kept the ground; but the road down which the procession came was lined with men carrying enormous green silk banners, with texts from the Koran written on them. Military bands, playing a very stirring Arab march, came before each regiment; and there was a splendid old Mohammedan priest on an Arab horse, who stood near us until he cut in and joined the procession. About ten immense banners belonged to him, and the people crowded to kiss his hands." (See illustration No. 4.) which is illustrated on the first page (panel No. 5), was witnessed by Miss Beamish in company with her friend, Lady Sebright, during a visit to Algiers. She thus described it: "Through one of the pastors, a German missionary, who has been here for years, and knows all the leading Jews, Arabs, Spaniards, etc., we got ourselves taken to a fête. He conducted us through the network of narrow alleys of the Arab town at night, where we did not meet a single European, and only saw two women (unveiled), until we reached a strange corner with no windows, only blank walls and low Mauresque doors; outside one of these sat a very fine-looking Arab, a chief of the sect called the Aissous, from the name of their founder, Ben Aissa—the name Aissa being the same as Joshua, and Jesus. This Ben Aissa was ages ago banished to the desert for some political intrigue, and with his family was 'starving'; and the inspiration came to him to open the Koran, and obey whatever command he first read, which happened to be, 'Eat what is set before thee.' There were only scorpions, stones, prickly pears, etc., but they all ate these things, and now the sect called Aissoua, his descendants, do the same at these RELIGIOUS ORGIES.

AN ALGERIAN FÊTE

At about nine o'clock we went into a little Moorish house, an open court with pillars, and two stories of rooms round open galleries. On a stone shelf sat the Marabout, or Sidi, which means saint, who directed the ceremonies. A very venerable, white-haired old man, with keen, bright eyes, and the most passionless, un pitying face. He was now on a prayer-mat, the centre of a semicircle of fanatics, all thrumming on a kind of drum and singing a minor chant in exact time. In the middle was a stone brazier with charcoal and incense burning. The singing and drumming got louder and quicker, until one rose up in a frenzy and flung himself on his face, and leaping up began a wild dance, throwing off bonnet, waistcoat, shirt, and yelling like a wild beast."

On her return home Miss Beamish seemed possessed with an insatiable appetite for Christian labor, as if she had a presentiment that her time was growing short.

AT A MEETING OF GIPSIES

of which there is a picture on the first page (panel No. 6), she took a very prominent part. It was gotten up by her brother who is a clergyman and whose parish is on the high road frequented by the gipsies in their wanderings. He was deeply concerned for their spiritual welfare and went among them to hold a service. Miss Esther accompanied her brother, and her gentle, earnest words moved the uncouth gathering to tears.

A FATAL VISIT to her friend, Lady Sebright, was paid by Miss Beamish in December, 1881. During her stay her friend's daughter, Olive, a bright, winsome child, fell sick. Miss Beamish assisted Lady Sebright in nursing the child between whom and herself existed a warm attachment. Olive's disease was pronounced diphtheria, but the devoted Christian girl refused to fly from the infectious disease but insisted on remaining in attendance, though she so far complied with Lady Sebright's entreaties as to avoid inhaling the child's breath. The child's affection, however, set aside precautions. When death was near little Olive rose in her bed, and drawing Esther's head down to her, gave her a passionately loving kiss on her lips. (See illustration No. 7.) Lady Sebright was just behind, and caught hold of Esther (for an awful fear seized her mind), saying, as she drew her back, "How can you, how dare you do that?" and the reply was, "I could not resist the little sweet." This no doubt was to her a fatal kiss.

Little Olive died and Esther was the bereaved mother's comforter. On the following day Miss Beamish herself fell sick, and the physicians declared that her disease was blood poisoning with diphtheria, and pronounced it hopeless.

Three days of suffering followed and then at the physician's request Lady Sebright told her that all hope of recovery was over, and asked her if she had any fear. She smiled brightly in her face, saying, "Fears! no; why should I be afraid when I am going to the One I have lived with and for all my life?" Constantly, during her last hours, with varying distinctness, she repeated hymns and psalms, and began Psalm 23, which a friend, Miss Gilbert, finished for her. Toward morning, seeing the light on her face, and hearing more frequently the Saviour's name, they asked her if she saw Him, but she said,

"NO; ONLY HIS GLORY, INTENSE GLORY."

Near the end she spoke rapidly and less clearly; but scraps of prayer were heard, as even in death she pleaded for unsaved souls. - But at the last they heard distinctly the words, "O Lord! oh, pity! oh, love!" With this last aspiration toward the divine love, she entered His glorious presence.

Volume VIII. of the Christian Herald, containing the Numbers for 1883, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3, including postage. A few volumes of 1883, and 1884 are also for sale. We have none prior to 1883.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"As Free as Birds in the Air."—At a recent meeting Mr. Sloan said: "I know two young women who two years after they professed to be Christians, were led to give themselves in full surrender to God. They had previous to this been dealing in an unfair way toward their employer, but the Lord led them to see that this must be given up, that a consecrated life must be a life of purity and free from guilt. They went to their employer and confessed their fault. I have no doubt this must have made a strange impression upon him, that those two mill workers should have made such a confession to him of their own free will; and as for the girls, as they expressively said: 'We now feel as free as birds in the air.' Because they had by God's grace climbed the mountain that stood between Him and them."

Killed on the Spot.—A Gentleman Working for Christ in Scotland said: "I knew two young men in Aberdeen who held a very good position there. They scoffed at anything in the nature of religion, and even made it a boast that they would every Sunday drive riotously through the town of Aberdeen, when worshippers were gathering to the House of God; and they made a habit of returning when the congregations were dispersing. If any one remonstrated with them for their unseemly conduct they used to say, 'It is a day of pleasure; and why should we not make it so?' So they took their own way, and had their pleasure, but it was of shorter duration than they thought. One Sunday, when returning from their drive, they were lashing the horses to an unusual speed. The frantic animals galloped wildly on, and dashed up against a railing, throwing the two men out of the trap, and killing them on the spot. So their little day of serving the devil was over, and what was their reward? 'Whoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.'"

The Lost Bank-Note.—A Farmer who had long neglected the house of God, and indulged in the use of profane language, one day lost a bank-note in his barn. He searched for it long and earnestly, but in vain. At length he said, "That note is in the barn, I'm perfectly sure of that, and I will search for it until I find it." Accordingly, he again went to the barn, and carefully moved the hay and straw, hour after hour, till at last he found the note. A few weeks before this he had been awakened to a sense of his need of a Saviour, and had earnestly sought to live a better life. His anxiety increased, but he did not find the peace which comes to every true penitent the moment he accepts Christ as his Saviour. After he lost the note he sat by the fire one evening musing on the state of his soul, when he turned to his wife, and asked, "What must one do to be a Christian?" "You must seek for it," she replied, "as eagerly as you sought for the bank-note." It was "a word fitly spoken," and he found Christ that very night, and is now rejoicing in Him.

Three Distinct Calls.—Mr. Ferrie Observed: "The Lord is near to them that call upon Him. Mr. Moody used to tell a striking illustration of this verse. He said: 'My little boy has three calls. He opens the study door and calls, "Papa." I pay no attention to him because I know it is merely to attract notice. Again he comes throwing the study door open, and running in, he calls: "Papa, look here, I have something to show you." I know by his call that he is really in earnest, and I turn to share in his joy. He has still another call; when he is in the garden he may meet with an accident; in a quick and distressed voice, he calls: "Papa." I know by the call that my child is in trouble, and I am out of the house in an instant, and by my boy's side, doing what I can to help him.' In like manner God deals with us. We sometimes call to Him, scarcely meaning anything by our call, and never looking for or expecting a reply. Then, again, we wish to call the Lord's attention to some unexpected joy or pleasure which we have received. He listens to us because He delights to share in all that concerns us. But, dear friends, how quickly the Lord will come to the call of one in distress! He knows all the different calls of His children, and specially those in trouble, for has He not promised, 'Call upon Me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee.'"

A Drunkard's True Dream.—Mr. Wright, a devoted Christian worker, said: "A gentleman in Dumfriesshire told me of a man there who indulged in drinking bouts periodically. His friends entreated him to give up the degrading and ruinous course, warning him that at any time he might fall down the long stair which led to his house, and sustain some serious harm. The minister of the parish also many times earnestly warned him of the danger of indulging in strong drink; but nothing would stop him. One morning he told his wife that he had had a dream during the night, in which he thought he was in one of his drinking fits, and was returning home, and had just gained the top step of the stair, when he missed his footing, and fell to the bottom, breaking his neck. He told his wife that this dream was so vivid that he was troubled about it. His wife said that it was a warning from God, and that he must look upon it as such. When the thought of the dream had gradually gone from his mind, he returned to his drinking, and one night he was returning home, and had just reached the top step, when he actually did fall down and break his neck, and was carried to his bed lifeless."

A Dying Welsh Soldier's Despair.—A Christian worker observed: "I once went to visit a soldier who had bought himself off from the army. He was dying, but did not know it. I sat down by his side, and said, 'I will read a bit of the Bible for you.' 'Oh, you need not trouble; I am not so ill as all that,' he replied. Poor fellow; he thought that he must be very ill before any one need offer to read a part of the Bible for him. Next morning when I called, I found him much worse. I learned that he was a Welshman, and his mother was a Christian. Suddenly, he threw himself back in bed, and wringing his hands he cried, 'Oh, what shall I do! what shall I do! I am as a dead man; the mark of death is upon me, and I am not saved.' There is a time when Christ may be found, but there is also a time when He may not be found. It is one of the saddest sights that one can look upon to see a soul seeking for Christ, but unable to find Him. And this young dying soldier sought and sought for Christ, but it was all in vain; Jesus had passed by. He became delirious and died in agony. 'Seek the Lord while He may be found; call ye upon Him while He is near.'"

The Difference Between One Street and Another.—A Christian lady observed: "I lately heard of a very singular answer to prayer received by a woman in a district which I visit. She was a good Christian woman, but she had never got to the point of believing that God would in a direct and speedy way, answer her prayer, especially in temporal matters. She had never fully realized that He who cares for the soul also cares for the body. She had heard of many cases of answer to prayer, and she thought, 'If God has answered the prayers of others for temporal things then He may answer my prayer,' and with this new thought she went home and prayed simply and believingly, that her son, who was out of employment, might obtain work. She told her son what she had done, and that she was sure he would soon get something to do. He went out to attend a meeting, and when he was partly up one street, he suddenly changed his mind and turned and walked up another. There he met his old employer, who said, 'I am glad to see you, for I have something for you to do, will you come in tomorrow morning?' The young man, instead of going to the meeting, went home and told his mother of the speedy answer to her prayer. Thus, friends, we should go to the Lord and in simple faith make our requests known unto Him."

FEASTING has been known in all ages. It was one of the most exciting times in English history when Queen Elizabeth visited Lord Leicester at Kenilworth Castle. The moment of her arrival was considered so important that all the clocks of the castle were stopped, so that the hands might point to that one moment as being the most significant of all. She was greeted at the gate with floating islands and torches and the thunder of cannon, and fireworks that set the night ablaze, and a great burst of music that lifted the whole scene into

PERFECT ENCHANTMENT.

Then she was introduced in a dining-hall the luxuries of which astonished the world; four hundred servants waited upon the guests; the entertainment cost five thousand dollars each day. Lord Leicester made that great supper in Kenilworth Castle.

Cardinal Wolsey entertained the French ambassadors at Hampton Court. The best cooks in all the land prepared for the banquet; purveyors went out and travelled all the kingdom over to find spoils for the table. The time came. The guests were kept during the day hunting in the king's park, so that their appetites might be keen; and then in the evening to the sound of the trumpeters, they were introduced into a hall hung with silk and cloth of gold, and there were tables a-glitter with imperial plate, and laden with the rarest of meats, and a-blush with the costliest wines; and when the second course of the feast came it was found that the articles of food had been fashioned into the shape of men, birds and beasts, and groups dancing, and jousting parties riding against each other with lances. Lords and princes and ambassadors out of cups filled to the brim drank the health, first of the King of England, and next of the King of France. Cardinal Wolsey prepared that great supper in Hampton Court.

But my text takes us to a more exciting banquet. It was taking

NIGHT IN BABYLON.

The shadows of her two hundred and fifty towers began to lengthen. The Euphrates rolled on, touched by the fiery splendors of the setting sun; and gates of brass, burnished and glittering, opened and shut like doors of flame. The hanging gardens of Babylon, wet with heavy dew, began to pour from starlit flowers and dripping leaf, a fragrance for many miles around. The streets and squares were lighted for dance and frolic and promenade. The theatres and galleries of art invited the wealth and pomp and grandeur of the city to rare entertainments. Scenes of riot and wassail were mingled in every street; and godless mirth and outrageous excess and splendid wickedness came to the king's palace to do their mightiest deeds of darkness.

A ROYAL FEAST

to-night at the king's palace! Rushing up to the gates are chariots upholstered with precious cloths from Dedan and drawn by fire-eyed horses from Togamah, that rear and neigh in the grasp of the charioteers; while a thousand lords dismount, and women dressed in all the splendor of Syrian emerald, and the color blending of agate, and the chasteness of coral, and the sombre glory of Tyrian purple, and princely embroideries brought from afar by camels across the desert and by ships of Tarshish across the sea. Open wide the gates and let the guests come in! The chamberlains and cup-bearers are all ready. Hark to the rustle of the silks and to the carol of the music! See the blaze of the jewels! Lift the banners! Fill the cups! Clap the cymbals! Blow the trumpets! Let the night go by with song and dance and ovation; and let that Babylonish tongue be palsied that will not say: "Oh King Belshazzar, live forever!"

ORIENTAL SPLENDOR.

Ah, my friends! it was not any common banquet to which these great people came. All parts of the earth had sent their richest viands to that table. Brackets and chandeliers flashed their light upon tankards of burnished gold. Fruits, ripe and luscious, in baskets of silver entwined with leaves, plucked from royal conservatories. Vases inlaid with emerald and ridged with exquisite traceries, filled with nuts that were threshed from forests of distant lands. Wine brought from the royal vats, foaming in the decanters and bubbling in the chalices. Tufts of cassia and frankincense wafting their sweetness from wall and table. Gorgeous banners unfolding in the breeze that came through the opened window, bewitched with the perfume of hanging gardens. Fountains rising up from inclosures of ivory in jets of crystal, to fall in clattering rain of diamonds and pearls. Statues of mighty men looking down from niches in the wall upon crowns and shields brought from subdued empires. Idols of wonderful work standing on pedestals of precious stones. Embroideries stooping about the windows and wrapping pillars of cedar, and drifting on floor inlaid with ivory and agate. Music, mingling the thrum of harps, and the clash of cymbals, and the blast of trumpets in one wave of transport that went rippling along the wall and breathing among the garlands, and pouring down the corridors, and thrilling the souls of a thousand banqueters.

is given, and the lords and ladies, the mighty men and women of the land, come around the table. Pour out the wine! Let foam and bubble kiss the rim! Hoist every one his cup and drink to the sentiment: "Oh King Belshazzar, live forever!" Bestarred head-band and carcanet of royal beauty gleam to the uplifted chalices, as again and again and again they are emptied. Away with care from the palace! Tear royal dignity to tatters! Pour out more wine! Give us more light, wilder music, sweeter perfume! Lord shouts to lord, captain ogles to captain. Goblets clash, decanters rattle. There come in the obscene song and the drunken hiccough, and the slaverling lip and the guffaw of idiotic laughter, bursting from the lips of princes, flushed, reeling, bloodshot; while mingling with it all I hear: "Huzza, huzza, for great Belshazzar!"

What is that on the plastering of the wall? Is it a spirit? Is it a phantom? Is it God? The music stops. The goblets fall from the nerveless grasp. There is a thrill. There is a start. There is a thousand-voiced

SHRIEK OF HORROR.

Let Daniel be brought in to read that writing. He comes in. He reads it: "Weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." Meanwhile the Assyrians who for two years had been laying a siege to that city, took advantage of that carousal and came in. I hear the feet of the conquerors on the palace stairs. Massacre rushes in with a thousand gleaming knives. Death bursts upon the scene; and I shut the door of that banqueting-hall, for I do not want to look. There is nothing there but torn banners, and broken wreaths, and the slush of upset tankards, and the blood of murdered women, and the kicked and tumbled carcass of a dead king. For "in that night was Belshazzar slain."

I. I learn from this, that

anything on the wall a man had better read it as it is. Daniel did not misinterpret or modify the handwriting on the wall. It is all foolishness to expect a minister of the Gospel to preach always things that the people like or the people choose. What shall I preach to you to-day? Shall I tell you of the dignity of human nature? Shall I tell you of the wonders that our race has accomplished? "Oh, no!" you say, "tell me the message that came from God." I will.

If there is any handwriting on the wall it is this lesson: "Repent, accept of Christ and be saved." I might talk of a great many other things but that is the message, and so I declare it.

Jesus never flattered those to whom He preached. He said to those who did wrong and who were offensive in His sight: "Ye generation of vipers! ye whited sepulchres! how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" Paul the apostle preached before a man who was not ready to hear him preach. What subject did he take? Did he say: "Oh, you are a good man, a very fine man, a very noble man?" No; he preached of righteousness, to a man who was unrighteous; of temperance, to a man who was the victim of bad appetites; of the judgment to come, to a man who was unfit for it. So we must always declare the message that happens to come to us. Daniel must

READ IT AS IT IS.

A minister preached before James I. of England, who was James VI. of Scotland. What subject did he take? The king was noted all over the world for being unsettled and wavering in his ideas. What did the minister preach about to this man who was James I. of England and James VI. of Scotland? He took for his text, James 1: 6: "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed." Hugh Latimer offended the king by a sermon he preached, and the king said: "Hugh Latimer, come and apologize." "I will," said Hugh Latimer. So the day was appointed, and the king's chapel was full of lords and dukes, and the mighty men and women of the country, for Hugh Latimer was to apologize. He began his sermon by saying: "Hugh Latimer, bethink thee! Thou art in the presence of thine earthly king who can destroy thy body! But bethink thee, Hugh Latimer, that thou art in the presence of the king of heaven and earth, who can destroy both body and soul in hell-fire. Oh king, cursed be thy crimes!"

II. Another lesson that comes to us: There is a great difference between the opening of

and its close. Young man, if you had looked in upon the banquet in the first few hours you would have wished you had been invited there and could sit at the feast. "Oh the grandeur of Belshazzar's feast," you would have said; but you look in at the close of the banquet and your blood curdles with horror. The King of Terrors has there a ghastlier banquet; human blood is the wine and dying groans are the music.

Sin has made itself a king in the earth. It has crowned itself. It has spread a banquet. It invites all the world to come to it. It has hung in its banqueting-hall the spoils of all kingdoms and the banners of all nations. It has gathered from all music. It has strewn from its wealth the tables and floors and arches. And yet how often is that banquet broken up and how horrible is its end! Ever and anon there is a handwriting on the wall. A king falls. A great culprit is arrested. The knees of wickedness knock together. God's judgment, like an armed host, breaks in upon the banquet, and that night is Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain.

Here is a young man who says: "I cannot see why they make such a fuss about

THE INTOXICATING CUP.

Why, it is exhilarating. It makes me feel well. I can talk better, think better, feel better. I cannot see why people have such a prejudice against it." A few years pass on and he wakes up and finds himself in the clutches of an evil habit which he tries to break but cannot; and he cries out: "O Lord God, help me!" It seems as though God would not hear his prayer, and in an agony of body and soul he cries out: "It biteth like a serpent and it stingeth like an adder." How bright it was at the start! how black it was at the last!

Here is a man who begins to read

FRENCH NOVELS.

"They are so charming," he says, "I will go out and see for myself whether all these things are so." He opens the gate of a sinful life. He goes in. A sinful sprite meets him with her wand. She waves her wand and it is all enchantment. Why, it seems as if the angels of God had poured out vials of perfume in the atmosphere. As he walks on he finds the hills becoming more radiant with foliage, and the ravines more resonant with the falling water. Oh what a charming landscape he sees!

But that sinful sprite with her wand meets him again; but now she reverses the wand and all the enchantment is gone. The cup is full of poison. The fruit turns to ashes. All the leaves of the bower are forked tongues of hissing serpents. The flowing fountains fall back in a dead pool, stenchful with corruption. The luring songs become curses and screams of demoniac laughter. Lost spirits gather about him, and feel for his heart, and beckon him on with, "Hail brother! Hail, blasted spirit, hail!" He tries to get out. He comes to the front door where he entered and tries to push it back, but the door turns against him; and in the jar of that shutting door he hears these words: "This night is Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain." Sin may open bright as the morning; it closes dark as the night.

III. I learn further from this subject that sometimes upon a banquet. Why did he not go down to the prisons in Babylon? There were people there that would like to have died. I suppose there were men and women in torture in that city who would have welcomed death. But he comes to the palace, and just at the time when the mirth is dashing to the tip-top pitch Death breaks in at the banquet. We have often seen the same thing illustrated. Here is a young man just come from college. He is kind. He is loving. He is enthusiastic. He is eloquent. By one spring he may bound to heights toward which many men have been struggling for years. A profession opens before him. He is established in the law. His friends cheer him. Eminent men encourage him. After awhile you may see him standing in the American Senate, or moving a popular assemblage by his eloquence as trees are moved in a whirlwind. Some night he retires early. A fever is on him. Delirium like a reckless charioteer seizes the reins of his intellect.

His father and mother stand by and see the tides of life going out to the great ocean. The banquet is coming to an end. The lights of thought and mirth and eloquence are being extinguished. The garlands are snatched from the brow. The vision is gone. Death at the banquet!

We saw the same thing on a larger scale illustrated at the last war in this country. Our whole nation had been sitting at

A NATIONAL BANQUET—

North, South, East and West. What grain was here but we grew it on our hills? What invention was there but our rivers must turn the new wheel and rattle the strange shuttle? What warm furs but our traders must bring them from the Arctic? What fish but our nets must sweep them for the markets? What music but it must sing in our halls? What eloquence but it must speak in our Senates? Ho! to the national banquet reaching from mountain to mountain and from sea to sea! To prepare that banquet the sheepfolds and the aviaries of the country sent their best treasures. The orchards piled upon the table their sweetest fruits. The presses burst out with new wines. To sit at that table came the yeomanry of New Hampshire, and the lumbermen of Maine, and the tanned Carolinian from the rice-swamps, and the harvesters of Wisconsin, and the Western emigrant from the pines of Oregon, and we were all brothers—brothers at a banquet. Suddenly the feast ended.

WHAT MEANT THOSE MOUNDS

thrown up at Chickahominy, Shiloh, Atlanta, Gettysburg, South Mountain? What meant those golden grain-fields turned into a pasturing ground for cavalry horses? What meant the corn-fields gullied with the wheels of the heavy supply train? Why those rivers of tears, those lakes of blood? God was angry. Justice must come. A handwriting on the wall! The nation has been weighed and found wanting. Darkness! Darkness! Woe to the North! Woe to the South! Woe to the East! Woe to the West! Death at the banquet!

IV. I have also to learn from the subject that the destruction of the vicious and of those who despise God will be very sudden. The wave of mirth had dashed to the highest point when that Assyrian army broke through.

IT WAS UNEXPECTED.

Suddenly, almost always, comes the doom of those who despise God and defy the laws of men. How was it at the Deluge? Do you suppose it came through a long northeast storm, so that people for days before were sure it was coming? No; I suppose the morning was bright; that calmness brooded on the waters; that beauty sat enthroned on the hills; when suddenly the heavens burst, and the mountains sank like anchors into the sea, that dashed clear over the Andes and the Himalayas.

The Red Sea was divided. The Egyptians tried to cross it. There could be no danger. The Israelites had just gone through; where they had gone why not the Egyptians? Oh it was such a beautiful walking-place! a pavement of tinged shells and pearls, and on either side two great walls of water, solid. There can be no danger. Forward, great host of the Egyptians! Clap the cymbals and blow the trumpets of victory! After them! We will catch them yet and they shall be destroyed. But the walls of solidified water begin to tremble. They rock. They fall. The rushing waters! The shriek of drowning men! The swimming of the war-horses in vain for the shore! The strewing of the great host on the bottom of the sea, or pitched by the angry wave on the beach—a battered, bruised and loathsome wreck! Suddenly destruction came. One half hour before they could not have believed it. Destroyed and without remedy!

I am just setting forth a fact which you have noticed as well as I. Ananias comes to the apostle. The apostle says: "Did you sell the land for so much?" He says: "Yes." It was a lie. Dead! As quick as that! Sapphira, his wife, comes in. "Did you sell the land for so much?" "Yes." It was a lie and quick as that she was dead! God's judgments are upon those who despise and defy Him. They come suddenly.

THE DESTROYING ANGEL

went through Egypt. Do you suppose that any of the people knew that he was coming? Did they hear the flap of his great wing? No! No! Suddenly, unexpectedly, he came.

Skilled sportsmen do not like to shoot a bird standing on a sprig near by. If they are skilled they pride themselves on taking it on the wing, and they wait till it starts. Death is an old sportsman and he lives to take men flying under the very sun. He loves to take them on the wing.

Are there any here who are unprepared for the eternal world? Are there any here who have been living without God and without hope? Let me say to you that you had better accept of the Lord Jesus Christ, lest suddenly your last chance be gone. The lungs will cease to breathe, the heart will stop. The time will come when you shall go no more to the office, or to the store, or to the shop. Nothing will be left but Death and Judgment and Eternity. Oh, flee to God this hour! If there be one in this presence who has wandered far away from Christ, though he may not have heard the call of the Gospel for many a year, I invite him now to come and be saved. Flee from thy sin! Flee to the stronghold of the Gospel!

To-day I invite you to

than any I have mentioned. My Lord the King is the banqueter. Angels are the cup-bearers. All the redeemed are the guests. The halls of eternal love, frescoed with light, and paved with joy, and curtained with unfading beauty, are the banquetting place. The harmonies of eternity are the music. The chalices of heaven are the plate; and I am one of the servants coming out with both hands filled with invitations, scattering them everywhere; and of that, for yourselves, you might break the seal of the invitation and read the words written in red ink of blood by the tremulous hand of a dying Christ: "Come, now, for all things are ready."

After this day has rolled by and the night has come may you have rosy sleep guarded by Him who never slumbers! May you awake in the morning strong and well! But, oh! art thou a despiser of God? Is the coming night the last night on earth? Shouldst thou be awakened in the night by something, thou knowest not what, and there be shadows floating in the room, and a handwriting on the wall, and you feel that your last hour is come, and there be a fainting at the heart, and a tremor in the limb, and a catching of the breath—then thy doom would be but an echo of the words of my text: "In that night was Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain."

A NOVEL INTERMENT.

A MOST extraordinary funeral took place in India recently. This is the account of it as published by the Indian Witness:

Attached to the famous Krishna Temple at Udipi, in the South Canara District, are eight mutts, each of which is governed by a swamy, who is supposed to be a very holy individual. These swamies are usually appointed when very young, and, being surrounded by a lot of sycophants, they are pampered in such a way that they become terrible martinets when they get older. Every Hindoo, no matter what his social position, has to fall down flat on his face before one of these infallible popes. They are higher than even the highest class of Brahmins; they never marry; they shave every hair from off their bodies, and are supposed to be above the influence of things earthly.

One of these swamies died yesterday, and to prevent the corruption that all flesh is heir to—the ordinary mode of cremation being considered not good enough for him—immediately after death he was placed in a sitting posture, in the orthodox position of a Brahman and put into a small basket. As soon as rigidity gave firmness to his corpse, he was carried three times round the big temple, with all the gorgeous paraphernalia of an Oriental procession, and then carried to the graveyard, where a couple of dozen of his ancestors are lying. The grave was about six feet deep and four feet square. A big piece of red cloth was laid over its mouth, a couple of baskets of salt were put on the cloth, thus pushing it to the bottom, then a layer of camphor, on which the body was placed in a sitting posture, various articles which are necessary for the performance of puja being put into the hands of the corpse, and around it, some food, and even his old slippers, to keep him up on his way to the unknown regions; then layer after layer of immense quantities of camphor, pepper, mustard-seed, and salt were poured in and around the body, till the whole was covered, except the glistening top of his head. On this a coconut was placed, and a tremendous blow from a heavy hammer smashed both the coconut and skull. A saligram, or small idol, was then pushed into the cavity of the skull, a couple of more baskets of salt and camphor were thrown on, the ends of the stout cloth were brought together and tied in a knot just over the head, and earth was filled in by handfuls by the eager spectators, amid the yells and shrieks of "Govinda!" "Govinda!"

A LONG-LOST BROTHER'S RETURN.

A MEETING between two brothers long separated occurred recently in Lewiston, Me. Any poor wanderer who is miserable and forlorn reading of it, may be assured that if he will seek his divine Elder Brother he will be recognized and welcomed (Heb. 2 : 17, 18).

The Lewiston Journal says: "One day last week Edward Lacey stood on the street corner for a moment on his way home waiting for a street-sprinkler to pass. He abstractedly watched the countless streams of water and, after it had passed, noticed a man with gray hair and beard coming up the street and across to the corner. The man appeared to be looking around the street as though its aspect were wholly new to him. The man wandered along and finally stopped on the corner and then, approaching Mr. Lacey, said: 'I am a stranger here and haven't been here before for many years. I've a brother here that I haven't seen for thirty years. I just came in on the train and haven't found out if he lives in the city now or not. Perhaps you know him or where he lives. His name is Edward Lacey and mine is John Lacey, and I am his brother.' Here was a miraculous meeting of two brothers amid the crowds of the street after thirty years. Edward Lacey looked at the face of his brother and knew it, although the years had whitened the hair and added the crowfeet to his face. 'Should you know your brother Edward if you should see him?' he asked, and John Lacey said that he thought he should, and then Edward Lacey said that he knew where Edward Lacey lived, and that as he was going that way he would show him the house, and they went off together. The dé-nouement came when the two entered the house and Edward Lacey said, 'Welcome home.'"

A WICKED AND SLOTHFUL SERVANT.

How much injury may be done by an inconsistent Christian cannot be estimated. It may extend widely around his home as well as in it, and may be felt in eternity. Men and women who might be attracted to the religion of Jesus are repelled when they see professing Christians proving by their lives that the religion they profess does not keep them from open sin. One such case is mentioned by the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, in Words and Weapons. He says: "Not very long ago a pastor found an inquirer awaiting him after a Sunday evening service. She was an inmate of the home of a distinguished neighboring minister. He asked why she did not unite with the church of which her employer was the pastor. She said that she could not; she had never heard him preach; she would not listen to him; observing him in his home had almost made her an infidel; he had absolutely no religion; his apparent religious life was an unmistakable sham. She was not an ignorant or vindictive servant, as may be supposed, but an intelligent person, well educated, capable of forming an opinion upon such a subject without venom. The minister of whom she spoke is noted in this country, at least within his denomination. I know him, and (it is wicked to judge of one's inner life, but we may have an opinion of one's conduct), I am satisfied that the woman was right. If the man is a Christian, there is nothing about him that gives evidence of it." (II Tim. 2 : 19.)

A CHRISTIAN HEROINE AMONG WILD BEASTS.

AN incident which shows that the God who protected Daniel in the den of lions is just as ready now to protect His children when they call upon Him, is related by Dr. Dowkontt in his excellent periodical, the Medical Mission Record. He says that Dr. John Scudder, the pioneer of medical missions, was on one occasion obliged to take a long journey from Madras, India, far into the interior. On his way homeward he was seized with jungle fever and his life was despaired of. News of his extremity was carried to his wife in Madras. With the devotion of the Christian and the wife she resolved to go and nurse him. She borrowed a tent, hired bearers, and with her little boy, whom she could not leave behind, set out into the jungle.

She travelled by night as well as day in her determination to reach her dear one as soon as possible. This involved peril such as strong and brave men would scarcely venture upon. In the worst part of the jungle road one night the bearers became frightened at the sound of the wild beasts roaring after their prey, and all of them actually ran away and left this noble woman with her little boy. In that moment of awful peril no thought of flight crossed her mind. She put her trust in God and, having prayed, settled herself for the night. Holding her boy in her arms she sat calmly through the long hours of darkness. She heard the heavy tread of the elephants, who might easily have crushed them to death, and the low growls of the tigers and other wild beasts. In fact they seemed to be circling around that little spot; but not once did the fierce creatures come near her. When Mrs. Scudder arrived at last at her destination, she had the joy not only of finding the doctor alive, but convalescing, although it took several months to restore his health sufficiently for him to partly resume his beloved work again.

THE WONDERFUL AWAKENING IN PERSIA.

In a long and deeply interesting letter from Rev. J. H. Shedd, D.D., dated Oroomiah, May 14th, and published in the Foreign Missionary, he describes the glorious outpouring of the Spirit that has recently been witnessed in that land. He says:

"In seventeen congregations there have been revivals, some of them of great power, moving the whole community. In all there were over five hundred inquirers. In Guelpashaw, ninety; Dizzataka, eighty, and so on in smaller numbers. Of these there have been received to the church to this date about two hundred. Others will be received at the communion seasons of the summer. The fruits of the revival are the more marked as many of the converts are men in middle life or early manhood, and heads of families. More than two thirds of all our church members are women, but of the converts this winter more than half are men. Many very hardened and profligate men have been reached and brought to Christ. Some hard drinkers have made their stand for Christ by giving up their wine, and all received to the church are conscientiously total abstainers. In the villages where the awakening has prevailed there has been a great decrease of drinking and quarrelling and other forms of evil, and the winter has passed, and the Easter feasts also, with marked sobriety and morality.

Among the causes assigned for this movement, a prominent one is the gratitude awakened to the Christians for their kindness to the sufferers by famine and by the Kurdish War. The Persians appear to have thought that there must be something good in a religion which prompted its professors to deeds of love to the sick and suffering.

A MISSIONARY ON THE CHINESE OUTRAGES.

THE outrages on the Chinese in Wyoming and elsewhere are, it appears, well known not only to the Chinese Government, but to the common people. The effect on mission work is deplorable. It excites a prejudice against the missionaries and there are fears of its leading to retaliation. In the course of a letter from Chungking, China, to the Independent, Mr. George B. Crews says:

"Heretofore English missionaries have been taunted with being citizens of the nation that forced opium upon China—a fact which seems to be known among all classes—while Americans enjoyed an immunity from such a disgrace forced upon them by the policy of their native land; but now we are placed in a position not less humiliating than that of our English friends, by reason of the barbarous treatment of the Chinese in our country. We are so far inland that the mass of the people do not know of the existence of most of the western nations, much less of current events, but the recent mobs in the Western States are freely discussed on the streets in Chungking, indicating that America has succeeded in making an impression in China. Our native friends come to us with such questions as this: 'The people on the streets say that your people in America mob and kill our people there. Is it true?' We have to admit the facts, but it is of little use to try to extenuate the crime by explaining circumstances, for their simple minds grasp only the fact that Chinese are unjustly oppressed and frequently killed in America. So far, we have been treated kindly, and allowed to secure and take possession of property inside and outside the city unhindered, but if China should adopt a retaliating policy we would be in a much more hazardous position than during the late war, because the officials would permit, if not actually instigate measures against us."

SIGNS OF THE COMING AGE.

By J. P. Weethe.*

The Nature of Signs—Why they were Promised—Extraordinary Events—Physical Signs—Signs in the Sun—The Dark Day—In the Stars—The Strange Meteoric Showers—Moral Signs—The Force in the Combination—An Ominous Resemblance to the Antediluvians and the Sodomites.

IT seems to us that too much attention cannot be devoted to the signs, since they were given by Christ for the express purpose of putting all upon the watch, so that they might not be overtaken as a thief. He directs them first to the phenomena of the natural world as if He would say, "I wish you to know when I am about to come again in person to the earth, so that you may have your work all well done, and be ready to receive me. That you may know My near approach I will print the message on the face of the heavens, and on the earth also. You are familiar with nature; you can discern its ordinary phenomena and therefore be able to see any extraordinary changes. When nature begins to clothe herself with unusual dresses and appearances, such as draw special attention by their singularity; when these unusual phenomena are seen in the sun, moon and stars; when extraordinary storms upset the sea, destroying commerce and wrecking navies; when the stars fall from the heavens, as a fig-tree casteth her green figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind—when the physical world assumes such extraordinary visages, you may know that My Coming is near—even at the door."

PHYSICAL SIGNS.

First, in the heavens above; second, on the earth beneath. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." (Matt. 24 : 29; see also Mark 13 : 24, 25; Luke 21 : 25, 26, and Acts 2 : 19, 20.)

It is said there shall be signs in the sun. What signs? Have they taken place? As these were to be indications of Christ's near approach, if they have not taken place, the Saviour's return is not at the doors; but if they are in the past His glorious epiphany is close upon us. This becomes a practical question. Joel says "The sun shall be turned into darkness" (darkened). There is no indication that the sun should be blotted out, but only darkened for a time. The darkness was to be something more than an ordinary eclipse; otherwise it would excite no special notice, and would not therefore constitute a sign; since to be a sign requires that it should produce the impression on the mind of some that it was intended as a sign. Has the sun been supernaturally darkened?

Within little more than a century (May 19th 1780), it has been supernaturally darkened. It was known throughout New England as "the dark day." It was not an ordinary eclipse; it continued too long, and the moon was not in the right position to produce an eclipse. It had the chief element of a sign since it produced the general impression that the Son of Man was about to return. It may be objected that the sign was not sufficiently general. To this we reply that signs to be such, do not require that they should extend over the whole world nor be seen by mankind generally. Some are required to believe on the testimony of others (John 20: 29).

"The stars shall fall from heaven." Has this sign taken place? Shooting stars have been noticed for centuries, but not till November 13th, 1833, did they fall in such numbers as to constitute an extraordinary event. Professor Olmsted, in his work on astronomy, has the following: "The remarkable exhibitions of shooting stars which have occurred within a few years past have excited great interest among astronomers, and led to some new views respecting the construction of the solar system. Their attention was first turned toward this subject by the great meteoric shower of November 13th, 1833. On that morning from two o'clock until broad daylight, the sky being perfectly serene and cloudless, the whole heavens were lighted by a magnificent display of celestial fireworks. At times the air was filled with streaks of light occasioned by fiery particles darting down so swiftly as to leave the impression of their light on the eye (like a match ignited and whirled before the face), and drifting to the northwest like flakes of snow driven before the wind, leaving after them long trains of light which were in some instances variegated with different prismatic colors. This shower pervaded nearly the whole of North America, having appeared in almost equal splendor from the British possessions on the north, to the West Indian Islands and Mexico on the south, and from sixty-one degrees of longitude east of the American coast to the Pacific Ocean on the west."

Professor Olmsted's belief was that they were bodies of large size, sometimes several thousand feet in diameter. Their cause is unknown. On the minds of many it produced great alarm. It had all the elements of a sign.

MORAL SIGNS.

"And upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (Luke 21: 25, 26). As these characteristics have been seen in the political world in all ages since these words were uttered, it is declared to be no sign. To this objection we answer: To be a sign the movements among the nations must be so great and extraordinary as to call the special attention of the wise. As with physical phenomena it is the combination that constitutes their force as a sign. There are about thirty items called signs of Christ's Coming. All these might separately occur and not be a sign; but when a period comes in which they are all combined, each one is a sign, and the combination also since the combination is new. An age takes place in which there is a certain predicted combination of physical and moral phenomena which is followed by a specific phenomenon, and then comes the noted event itself. So soon as the political world reflects the exact likeness described by our Saviour the political sign of His return is complete.

The state of morals in the world just previous to the Saviour's return must be like the morals of the old world in the days of Noah; and also like those of Sodom and Gomorrah when Lot went out of Sodom. They were guilty of the most debasing actions. The old world was so full of wickedness and evil thoughts that they gave no heed to the one hundred and twenty years' warning of Noah, though they had a visible proof of his faith in the building of the ark. They were citizens of the world and so absorbed in its interests, that any warning of coming events could not find a place in their hearts; they heard but gave no attention. They knew not, believed not, and therefore made no preparations. The morals of Sodom were similar to those before the Deluge. They had no fear of man, of angels, nor of God Himself. Are the morals of the present world outside of the Church similar?

The last point of resemblance is the ignorance of Christ's Coming. Of the flood it is said: "They knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the Coming of the Son of Man be." Lot's message was not believed. His notes of alarm and cries of warning had no effect, even upon his own sons-in-law. The people went about their worldly business as usual; they saw no grounds for such notes of alarm. No marriage was postponed; they worked in their gardens, on new houses, and attended feasts up to the beginning of the terrible storm of fire and brimstone. So will it be with the world at the Coming of the Son of Man. They will have warning but their corruption will prevent their belief.

THE UNFOLDING MESSAGE.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

JESUS told His disciples that it was expedient for them that He go away. Why, Master, can anything be better than Thy presence? Could anything take the place of that gracious being, that benign heart? Jesus said, "The best thing I can do is to go to My Father." Oh, how poor the disciples thought they were to lose a friend, to lose an associate like Christ; how poor it made them; but Jesus said, "It is better for you that I go away." I have wondered, could anything be better than Jesus?

Brother, back yonder, four thousand or five thousand years ago, this old world and despair. They turned their eager faces up into heaven and cried, "Who art Thou, Thou Great Being that made us all? We grope in darkness and despair." And they bent their ears to catch any whisper in reply, and all at once as they bent their ears up into the darkness they heard a voice saying, "I am." They got an expression. He said "I am," "I am." "We have heard His voice. We have heard His name." By and by they groped in darkness and despair, and years and centuries wore away and they looked up again and said, "Tell us who Thou art, Thou Great Being of the universe." And they heard the voice again, and God spake out of a cloud and said, "I am that I am." And they said, "Here is a little more light. He has spoken a little more to us in our darkness and our gloom."

And finally as the cloud gathered about the humble Nazarene, they were all hushed in His presence. And Jesus spake up and said, "I am." And they stopped and said, "Hush; listen, we have heard that before—'I am.' Listen; we will get

MORE LIGHT."

And Jesus said, "I am the way." "Ah," they said, "glory to God; we have been lost in the wilderness for four thousand years and here is a high way and a holy way that leads to God and heaven. Oh ye lost ones of earth come and walk in this pathway that leads up to heaven." Listen; He is going to "speak again;" "I am the truth." Oh ye men that have lived overshadowed by error all your life, you who have followed falsehood and been mistaken and have groped in error so long, here is the truth at last, embodied in the blessed Son of God. Here is the truth that will make you free. Here is the truth that will enlighten, that will burst the shackles from you, that will make you wise unto salvation. But, listen; He is going to speak again: "I am the Life." Oh ye dying millions, and ye who people the graveyards and cemeteries of the earth, here is life, eternal life to every one that believeth. Listen; He is going to speak again: "I am the bread." Oh ye hungry, famishing millions, here is bread which, if a man eat, he shall hunger no more forever! Listen; He is going to speak again:

"I am the water." Oh ye thirsty ones of earth, come drink and be dry no more forever. Listen; He speaks again: "I am the door." And the door means house, home, and hospitality and welcome.

O blessed Christ, Thou art the way, Thou art the truth, Thou art the Life, Thou art the bread, Thou art the water, Thou art the home of the soul, oh, wilt Thou go, and canst Thou tell us that there is something better still for us than bread and water and way and peace and home and welcome? Jesus said: "I am all these, but it is expedient; the best thing I can do for you is to go to My Father"—to go to My Father! And that company of praying men and women gathered in their upper chamber of Jerusalem and prayed one day and two days and four days and six days and on the morning of the tenth day, as they prayed to God for the endowment of power on high, all at once the blessed Spirit filled that upper chamber like a rushing, mighty wind, and Peter caught the divine Spirit, his lips caught fire, and he ran down into the streets of Jerusalem, and preached the one memorable Gospel sermon, and won three thousand souls to Christ; and that blessed Spirit came with the benediction of the Father, with the blood of the Son, and with the great heart of the Trinity to bless and save a world.

Brother, if God has given us His own testimony of Himself, and given His Son to die for us, why, then, was Jesus to the Jew a stumbling-block, and to the Greek foolishness? They did not understand His character. They did not know what it meant. They did not know what a divine sacrifice taught the children of men. And I say to you to-day, I have walked out in hills of north Georgia in the morning before daylight. I have looked out on those hills and valleys, and saw but the dim outline of an indistinct picture; and hours later I walked out, and the sun had risen upon the scene and both hills and valleys were in a perfect sea and flood of light. And as I looked out upon the valleys and mountains, bathed in the light of the sun, I saw beauties and splendors that my eyes never looked on before. But, brother, yonder is that cross. There it is with its victim. I look on it, and I see but the dim outline of something. I do not understand it. But when the Holy Ghost arose on the cross and bathed it in a sea of heavenly light, then I saw indeed

One hanging on a tree
In agonies and blood;
He fixed His languid eyes on me,
As near His cross I stood.
Sure never to my latest breath
Can I forget that look;
It seemed to charge me with His death,
Though not a word He spoke,
A second look He gave which said,
I freely all forgive;
My blood is shed that you might live,
A ransom paid for you.

Holy Ghost arise on the cross to-night and let this congregation of men and women see the Saviour of men as they never have seen Him before. This blessed Spirit comes into the world to woo us, comes to beseech, to implore, to con-jure every man to be a man of God. But brother, hear me to-night. He comes to call you to a better life, to nobler aims, to truer purposes, and everywhere the spirit knocks at the door of the heart. He would bid you come out into the presence of God and into the sunlight of heaven? Will you hear the call? Will you heed the call of that divine Spirit to-night? Brother, brother, I have seen the Spirit strive with men and strive with men until I could almost hear the restlessness of His retreating wings, and almost hear the gates of mercy as they closed upon their hinges forever. Oh, you may trifle with this preacher, and trifle with all these preachers, but I warn you he that sinneth persistently against the Holy Ghost shall not be pardoned in this world, nor in the world to come. O Spirit of grace linger with us, enlighten us, try us, woo us, and beseech us to come to a better life. The Spirit says come.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Adjournment of Congress on Thursday last brought to a close a somewhat barren session. The two conspicuous measures by which it will be chiefly remembered are the bill regulating the Presidential succession in the event of the death or disability of both President and Vice-President, and the bill imposing a tax on oleomargarine. It will also be memorable for its lavish appropriations. With the single exception of the year 1882, no Congress has voted away so much money at a single session in a time of peace. Yet the important work of sea-coast defences was wholly unprovided for, and but a very small sum was appropriated for the reconstruction of the navy. The tariff has not been touched, the Democrats not being able to agree among themselves, and the Republicans being opposed to any change. The failure to pass a national bankruptcy law has caused disappointment in business circles. The attention of the Senate has been chiefly occupied by the nominations and the question of secret executive sessions, while the industry of the House has been most conspicuous in passing private pension bills for the President to veto. Neither of the political parties has come out of the session with an increased reputation for statesmanship.

President Cleveland's Vetoes will Render the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress memorable. In all, he vetoed one hundred and fifteen measures which had passed both Houses of Congress, and nine others failed because he would not affix his signature to them. Among the latter was the famous Morrison resolution regulating the payments on the public debt. Of the bills vetoed one hundred and two were private pension bills, and six for public buildings. Only one—a private pension bill—was passed over his veto. The consideration of the others was postponed until next session, except a few in which an attempt to override the veto failed. President Cleveland has now vetoed four more bills than all his predecessors combined. The total number of bills and joint resolutions introduced in both Houses was 12,202. Of these 1101 passed both Houses, 814 were approved, and 157 became laws without the President's signature.

The River and Harbor Bill, after Many vicissitudes in the two Houses, finally reached the President in such a shape as to secure his approval. It appropriates about fourteen millions and a half. This is less by four millions than the bill that President Arthur vetoed. It was confidently expected that President Cleveland would have vetoed this bill, and certain remarks made by him indicate that he was disposed to do so. It appears that the Chief of Engineers convinced him that the interests of the Government demanded that the bill should be signed. He assured him that all of the appropriations—nearly four hundred in number—were meritorious, with the possible exception of eighteen, involving the expenditure of less than $140,000. These eighteen he did not condemn, but he was unable to give a positive opinion about them for lack of complete information. The President came to the conclusion that some of the other appropriations might be objectionable, but inasmuch as the preservation of works in progress for a year would cost $500,000, or about $400,000 more than the sum covered by those items about which there was some doubt, he decided that the bill should be approved. Now, if the Chief of Engineers will convince the people as he convinced the President, he will render a service to some members of Congress who are exceedingly likely to lose their seats by having voted for the bill.

The Death of the Eminent Democratic Statesman, Samuel J. Tilden, on August 4th, has occasioned sincere sorrow throughout the country. The one fact alone that one half his countrymen believed him to have been defrauded of the Presidency would suffice to render him one of our most conspicuous citizens. But beside this, he had other claims to public regard. To him probably more than to any other man New York was indebted for the overthrow of the Tweed Ring and the corrupt judges who had upheld it. He also delivered the State from the grip of the thieves who were plundering it through the canals. To his patience and forbearance also we are indebted for the peaceable solution of the difficulty of 1876. At a word from him in that critical time a struggle more dreadful than the war just closed might have broken out. But he preferred his country's good to his own advancement, and that act history will record to his credit. Mr. Tilden had long been in feeble health, but to the last his death was not expected. He died at his residence at Greystone, in the seventy-third year of his age.

The Trial of the Chicago Anarchists Continued to attract public attention last week. Several of the prisoners went on the stand to testify on behalf of themselves and their fellow-prisoners. The general line of defence in addition to the alibi which several of them hope to prove, was an attempt to show that the police did the shooting, and that the bomb was thrown not from, but toward the speaker's wagon from the outer edge of the crowd. The testimony last week directly contradicted much of that given for the people. In some cases the witnesses for the defence did not agree with each other.

Sentence on Mr. Cutting was Passed by the Mexican court last week. It was that he be imprisoned for one year with hard labor on the public works, and pay a fine of six hundred dollars, or in default, serve another hundred days of imprisonment. The news produced intense excitement in Texas, and an eager desire for war. Mr. Cutting at his trial refused to recognize the jurisdiction of the court, and declined, when invited to do so, to express satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the sentence. He claimed the protection of his Government, and reiterated his conviction that he would be rescued by United States troops. Mr. Bayard's demand for his release had a peremptory tone. It appears to be based on the fact that the Mexicans have tried Cutting not for contempt of court in circulating his second libel in Mexico, for which he is really amenable to the law, but for publishing it in Texas, of which offence, according to our ideas of international law, they can take no cognizance. An additional complication arises from the fact that Cutting is a prisoner of the State Chihuahua, and President Diaz feels a delicacy about coercing a State government, even if himself disposed to pardon the man.

An Official Scandal, which in England is very rare, has been unearthed by the London Times. It involves the officers of the War Department, who, if the charges are true, have been robbing the public Treasury. The Times says: "It has long been manifest that the War Department was incompetent, and now it is openly said to be corrupt. The department is composed of military men without mechanical, chemical, or metallurgical knowledge; of men who are babies in the hands of their subordinates, some of whom are shareholders in a private gunnery company. If England should become involved in a war to-morrow she would be compelled to become a suppliant to Krupp to supply means of defending her national existence. Colonel Hope has offered to prove wholesale corruption against the department in supplying guns which burst, rifled cartridges which jam, bayonets which bend, and swords which will not cut."

The British Parliament Reassembled On August 5th. Mr. Arthur W. Peel, whose portrait appeared in this journal on May 6th, was re-elected Speaker. Lord Hartington and Mr. Chamberlain with remarkable effrontery took their seats on the front bench with Mr. Gladstone. The great statesman caused them much confusion by going to them, and shaking hands, thus displaying the magnanimity of true greatness. The understanding among the followers of the two men is that they shall continue to act with the Liberal party unless and until their so acting tends to put Mr. Gladstone in power, when they will abstain from voting. The object of this policy is to secure the reversion of Mr. Gladstone's place when he dies or retires. It is expected that by that time the Liberal party will have forgotten or condoned their treacherous desertion of their leader. Mr. Gladstone, however, is anxious that Lord Rosebery and Mr. John Morley should succeed him as leaders of the Liberal party. He is still sanguine that he will see justice done to Ireland before he dies.

Belfast Was Again Disturbed by Riots Last week. On August 1st a Protestant Sunday-school excursion was returning to the city and a number of persons stopped to look at it. Some groans were heard from the crowd, and immediately stone throwing was commenced. Protestants and Catholics set upon each other and fought desperately. Eventually the Catholics were outnumbered and driven off, and the Protestants then started on an expedition of destruction. They wrecked several houses owned by Catholics, and were only dispersed when the police, finding their clubs useless, began to fire buckshot among them. At night they renewed the disorder, and the military were called out. Quiet was maintained until Saturday last when the riots broke out again, and attained such proportions that it was necessary to re-enforce the military. Four hundred foot and two hundred dragoons were hurriedly dispatched to the city, and all day Sunday were engaged in fighting the mob who threw up barricades and fought fiercely. The rioting continued all Sunday night. Many saloons were wrecked, and the passions of the mob were inflamed by the liquor stolen.

The University of Heidelberg Celebrated the five hundredth anniversary of its foundation last week with great magnificence and enthusiasm. On Monday the ancient city was decorated with flags and evergreens, and thousands of persons were pouring in from all parts of Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. The reunion of old students, many of them very aged men, distinguished in arms, diplomacy, and letters was a scene never to be forgotten. Delegates were present from the universities of Yale and Harvard, Oxford and Cambridge, and other seats of learning. The Crown Prince of Germany and the Grand Duke of Baden were also there, and their receptions were crowded each day. The most interesting feature of the celebration was an historical procession, each part of which represented a century in the history of the University. The costumes were prepared from original drawings at an immense cost. Knights in armor, students in quaint attire, and an English lady representing Elizabeth Stuart were in the procession. In all the speeches delivered during the fêtes, the utmost enthusiasm was evoked by the mention of the Emperor's name.

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $30. They are from: A Friend, Portland, Me., $20; Chicago, Ill., $1; London, Ont., $1; Seaward, Me., $3; Lafayette, R. I., 50 cents; Auburn, Ala., 50 cents; Dayton, O., $1; New Brunswick, N. J., $1; Howell, Mich., $2.

Successful Evangelistic Services Have Been held at Denver, Col., by Dr. L. W. Munhall and Mr. Charles Herald. In spite of the excessive heat the services were crowded day after day for four weeks. At the conclusion of the services no less than seven hundred and fifty persons made profession of faith in Christ. Afternoon Bible readings for Christians were much blessed. Some Christian persons whose faith had been shaken by the new theology were brought back to their old standing-ground by the good old-fashioned teaching of Dr. Munhall, who holds firmly to the doctrines now abandoned by the teachers of the advanced school. Mr. Herald organized an excellent choir which rendered efficient aid in the services. Mr. Herald, we are informed, contemplates removing to Brooklyn, N. Y. He will receive a warm welcome from the churches, and his assistance in evangelistic work will be thoroughly appreciated.

The Rejection of an Atheist's Application for naturalization in New York last week has caused some excitement among native sceptics and infidels. The applicant was Carl Robitscheck, an Austrian, who went to the Bureau of the Court of Common Pleas to declare his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States. When he learned that the declaration must be on oath, Robitscheck drew back, saying, "I am an atheist." Mr. Nathaniel Jarvis, the clerk, made this endorsement under his name on the record book, "This applicant declaring that he is an atheist, the declaration was refused." "The statute," Mr. Jarvis said, "requires that the declaration be made on oath." Colonel Robert Ingersoll contends that the clerk of the court acted illegally in refusing the application, and insists that an affirmation ought to have been accepted. Ingersoll is very indignant about it, and we shall probably hear of this case again.

The Assassination of a Temperance Worker at Sioux City, Iowa, on August 3d, has caused intense agitation in the locality. Since the prohibition law has been in force in the State the saloons in Sioux City have been run openly, but lately the temperance people have organized a crusade on them and applied for injunctions to close them all. The Rev. E. C. Haddock was one of the leaders in bringing these suits, and was the prosecuting witness in many of them. The saloon men were particularly incensed against him, and his life has frequently been threatened. On Saturday, August 3d, while passing along the street, one saloon-keeper threatened to kill him with an axe. On the same evening he, with another minister, had just returned from a short drive, and as they were leaving the livery stable and were crossing the street at the intersection of Fourth and Water streets a sharp pistol report was heard, and Mr. Haddock fell to the ground and expired within five minutes. The villain who perpetrated the foul deed is unknown, as it was a dark, stormy night, and no one could be recognized at any distance.

The Home of Industry Established in New York, in 1879, by Michael Dunn to aid discharged prisoners has recently issued a report of its work, which proves how valuable is the labor it is doing. Since the home was established 1888 men have been received as inmates, and 910 have obtained employment through its influence. During the past year 327 have been received, and 131 obtained employment, and the daily average number of inmates has been 40 men. One of the regular industries of the Home is the manufacture of brooms. They make these until outside employment is secured.

While the temporal needs of the men are remembered, their spiritual interests are not forgotten.

A New Sect has been Formed in Cincinnati founded on a belief appalling in its blasphemous pretensions. A despatch to the New York Times states that a party of thirty or forty persons, most of them prominent and above the average in intelligence, believe that a married woman residing at Walnut Hills is Christ manifest in the flesh, and that her sister is the Holy Ghost. The followers of these two women meet at the house occupied by the women and worship them both. The woman claiming to be the Christ has exerted some strange and wonderful influence that has put them completely in her power, and they are fanatics on the subject. "This movement," says the despatch, "has been going on quietly for a year without becoming generally known. The women seclude themselves, and will not be seen by any one who is not a worshipper, or vouched for by a worshipper. Many have sold their homes and taken houses near the women. Those who have given up their positions say they do not need work or money. All they need is spiritual food, and this will be furnished by the Lord, just as it was furnished to the Israelites in the wilderness." This is another of the signs for which Christ bade His followers watch (Matt. 24 : 24).

A Montreal Lady's Heroism Saved Her father's life on August 6th. She accompanied him on his steam yacht, on Thursday night, on a voyage from Brockville to Lachine. The engineer was the only other person on board. Late in the night they lost their bearings, passed Lachine without seeing it, and at dawn were seen running at full speed for the rapids. A bridge is being constructed over the river, and against one of the piers the yacht struck and sank. The three occupants were struggling in the fierce current, but the engineer clambered on the pier and was saved. The girl, who is a good swimmer, struck out for the shore, but, looking back, she saw her father sinking, and returned to his assistance. She stayed with him, holding his head up with one hand while she swam with the other. She supported him in this way until a boat came and rescued them just as the girl's strength was exhausted. Those who witnessed the heroism of the girl say that it was wonderful that, encumbered as she was with her clothing, she kept herself and her father from being carried over the rapids. Cases of this kind are rare; generally it is the father who rescues the daughter. In spiritual matters it has often happened that a daughter has been the means of saving the father from being carried over the rapids of eternal destruction (Isa. 11 : 6).

A Curious Mistake at a Wedding was Made in New York the other day. The wife of a New York merchant has a friend who has just been married to an officer in the King's County Penitentiary. The merchant did not know the lady, nor the gentleman she was about to marry, but he readily granted his wife's request that her friend might use his house for her wedding reception. On the day of the wedding he was detained in business until a late hour. When he entered his house he had to pass through the room in which the guests were assembled. His wife was not there at the time to introduce him, and he went quickly through the room toward his chamber to change his dress. He hoped to escape unobserved, but the guests looked askance at him in his business suit, nudged each other, and whispered among themselves. He heard one of them say, "He must be one of the prisoners. It's a shame that such a person should force himself in here." General suspicion was manifested toward him, which was turned into mortification when he returned some time afterward in his dress suit and was introduced to the party by his wife. Then the good-humored merchant joined in the general laugh at the danger he had escaped of being turned out of his own house by his guests. Their humiliating blunder was probably caused by their forgetting all about the owner of the house, or by supposing him to be a man of different appearance. It was thus that the Jews sinned when Christ came, and they failed to recognize Him (John 1 : 11).

A Perilous Voyage Has Been Undertaken by two Norwegian sailors. On August 1st, Captain Watkins, of the Inman Line steamship City of Chicago, passed in mid-Atlantic a tiny craft, only nineteen feet long, of the life-boat class. On board were two bronzed and bearded sailors, who reported all well, and that they were not in need of anything. The Chicago passed close to the life-boat, which bore the name of the Ocean. She left Norway on June 28th, and after passing Copenhagen crossed the North Sea, and rounding the north of Scotland proceeded to Queenstown, from which she sailed a number of days ago for this port. The men were quite cheerful, and seemed to have no fear of failing to complete their voyage safely. Captain Watkins says their craft was well adapted for riding heavy seas. That doubtless accounts for the calmness of the two men in circumstances that would alarm most persons. It is so with the Christian in the voyage of life. He knows that whatever storm may rage around him the life-boat in which he is will bear him safely through (Isa. 26 : 3).

An Imitator of William Tell Had a Narrow escape of killing a man at Greenville, N. C., on August 6th. A saloon-keeper in that city, who is proud of his skill as a marksman, occasionally amuses his customers by shooting at corks placed on the head of his bartender. On Friday he was practising the feat when a countryman entered who knew nothing of this habit. Seeing the saloon-keeper pointing his rifle at the bartender, and thinking a murder was intended, he cried, "Look out!" The alarm caused the man with the cork on his head to look up involuntarily, and the same instant the trigger was pulled and the bullet struck him, a quarter of an inch below the cork. Happily it glanced upward from the bone and did no more injury than to cut an ugly lane through his hair, carrying a strip of the scalp with it. Both the men were very thankful the result was no worse, and there will be no more William Tell business in that saloon. If the man had been killed, the saloon-keeper might have escaped punishment, as he did not intend to kill him; but he would not have been held guiltless of breaking God's commandment (Ex. 20 : 13). The Bible clearly describes the character of the man whose foolish acts or words do mischief which he did not design (Prov. 26 : 18, 19).

A Horse was Pacified by Hymns Recently in Southern Indiana. He was a spirited animal belonging to a minister, who is a great revivalist, noted for his beautiful singing of revival hymns. The horse would not allow any blacksmith to shoe him, but a blacksmith residing in the county seat undertook and successfully executed the task a short time ago. The smith, meeting the preacher one day, referred to the well-known peculiarity of the horse, and said, "If you'll bring that horse to my shop to-morrow and follow my instructions I'll shoe him all round and it shan't cost you a cent." Accordingly the preacher was on time at the smith's shop with his refractory steed, and after the animal had been divested of saddle, blankets, and all but the bridle, the smith said, "Now, hold your horse by the rein, close to the bridle-bit, and sing one of your liveliest camp-meeting songs, and when that is ended strike up another, and keep on singing until I finish shoeing the horse." The preacher obeyed, and, to the astonishment of all, the animal was passive until the work was completed. As the blacksmith clinched the last nail he dropped the animal's foot, exclaiming, "There, I knew you could sing religion into that horse." This case is, we believe, unprecedented, but there are innumerable cases on record of men of brutish passions, violent, and implacable, becoming gentle and lovable under the influence of religion. The worst case is not hopeless (1 Cor. 6 : 9-11).

THE HEART OF THE GOSPEL.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."—II CORINTHIANS 5:20, 21.

The Essential Doctrine—Roman Vessels Laden with Sand—The Mockery of the Hungry People—An Old Legend—The Test of the True Cross—I. The Great Doctrine—Jesus Made Sin for Us—Not a Sinner—Spotlessness Necessary to Substitution—What was Done with Him—Who Did It—What Happened in Consequence—II. A Great Argument—A Beseeching God—A Pleading Saviour.

THE heart of the Gospel is redemption, and the essence of redemption is the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ. They who preach this truth preach the Gospel in whatever else they may be mistaken; but they who preach not the atonement, whatever else they declare, have missed the soul and substance of the divine message. In these days I feel bound to go over and over again the elementary truths of the Gospel. In peaceful times we may feel free to make excursions into interesting districts of truth which lie far afield; but now we must stay at home, and guard the hearths and homes of the Church by defending the first principles of the faith.

In this age there have risen up in the Church itself men who speak perverse things. There be many that trouble us with their philosophies and novel interpretations, whereby they deny the doctrines they profess to teach, and undermine the faith they are pledged to maintain.

Let me give you a parable. In the days of Nero there was great shortness of food in the city of Rome, although there was abundance of corn to be purchased at Alexandria. A certain man who owned a vessel went down to the sea-coast, and there he noticed many straining their eyes toward the sea, watching for the vessels that were to come from Egypt with corn. When these vessels came to the shore, one by one, the poor people wrung their hands in bitter disappointment, for on board the galleys there was nothing but sand which the tyrant emperor had compelled them to bring for use in the arena. It was infamous cruelty, when men were dying of hunger to command trading vessels to go to and fro, and bring nothing else but sand for gladiatorial shows, when wheat was so greatly needed. Then the merchant whose vessel was moored by the quay said to his shipmaster, "Take thou good heed that thou bring nothing back with thee from Alexandria but corn; and whereas, aforetime thou hast brought in the vessel a measure or two of sand, bring thou not so much as would lie upon a penny this time. Bring thou nothing else, I say, but wheat; for these people are dying, and now we must keep our vessels for this one business of bringing food for them."

Alas! I have seen certain mighty galleys of late loaded with nothing but mere and speculation, and I have said within myself, "Nay, but I will bear nothing in my ship but the revealed truth of God, the bread of life so greatly needed by the people." God grant us this day that our ship may have nothing on board it that may merely gratify the curiosity, or please the taste; but that there may be necessary truths for the salvation of souls. I would have each one of you say: "Well, it was just the old, old story of Jesus and His love, and nothing else." I have no desire to be famous for anything but preaching the old Gospel. There are plenty who can fiddle to you the new music; it is for me to have no music at any time but that which is heard in heaven—"Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory forever and ever!"

I have found, my brethren, by long experience, that nothing touches the heart like the cross of Christ; and when the heart is touched and wounded by the two-edged sword of the law, nothing heals its wounds like the balm which flows from the pierced heart of Jesus. The cross is life to the spiritually dead. There is which can have no literal truth in it, but if it be regarded as a parable it is then most instructive. They say that when the Empress Helena was searching for the true cross they dug deep at Jerusalem and found the three crosses of Calvary buried in the soil. Which out of the three crosses was the veritable cross upon which Jesus died they could not tell, except by certain tests. So they brought a corpse and laid it on one of the crosses, but there was neither life nor motion. When the same dead body touched another of the crosses it lived; and then they said, "This is the true cross." When we see men quickened, converted, and sanctified by the doctrine of substitutionary sacrifice, we may justly conclude that it is the true doctrine of atonement. I have not known men made to live unto God and holiness except by the doctrine of the death of Christ on man's behalf. The story of the great Lover of the souls of men Who gave Himself for their salvation is still in the hand of the Holy Ghost the greatest of all forces in the realm of mind.

I. First, then, with as much brevity as possible I will speak upon

THE GREAT DOCTRINE.

The great doctrine, the greatest of all, is this, that God, seeing men to be lost by reason of their sin, hath taken that sin of theirs and laid it upon His only begotten Son, making Him to be sin for us, even Him who knew no sin; and that in consequence of this transference of sin he that believeth in Christ Jesus is made just and righteous, yea, is made to be the righteousness of God in Christ. Christ was made sin that sinners might be made righteousness. That is the doctrine of the substitution of our Lord Jesus Christ on the behalf of guilty men.

Now consider, first, who was made sin for us? The description of our great Surety here given is upon one point only, and it may more than suffice us for our present meditation. Our substitute was spotless, innocent, and pure. "He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin." Christ Jesus, the Son of God, became incarnate, and was made flesh, and dwelt here among men; but though He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, He knew no sin. Though upon Him sin was laid, yet not so as to make him guilty. He was not, he could not be, a sinner; he had no personal knowledge of sin.

Beloved, it was absolutely necessary that any one who should be able to suffer in our stead should himself be spotless. A sinner obnoxious to punishment by reason of his own offences, what can he do but bear the wrath which is due to his own sin? Our Lord Jesus Christ as man was made under the law; but He owed nothing to that law, for He perfectly fulfilled it in all respects. He was capable of standing in the room, place, and stead of others, because He was under no obligations of His own. He was only under obligations toward God because He had voluntarily undertaken to be the surety and sacrifice for those whom the Father gave Him. He was clear Himself, or else He could not have entered into bonds for guilty men.

This leads me on to the second point of the text, which is, what was done with Him who knew no sin? He was "made sin." It is the more you weigh it the more you will marvel at its singular strength. In the church and out of the church there is a deadly animosity to this truth. Modern thought labors to get away from what is obviously the meaning of the Holy Spirit, that sin was lifted from the guilty and laid upon the innocent. It is written, "The Lord that hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." This is as plain language as can be used; but if any plainer was required, here it is—"He hath made Him to be sin for us."

The Lord God laid upon Jesus, who voluntarily undertook it, all the weight of human sin. Instead of its resting on the sinner, who did commit it, it was made to rest upon Christ, who did not commit it; while the righteousness which Jesus wrought out was placed to the account of the guilty, who had not worked it out, so that the guilty are treated as righteous. Those who by nature are guilty, are regarded as righteous, while He who by nature knew no sin whatever, was treated as guilty. I think I must have read in scores of books that such a transference is impossible; but the statement has had no effect upon my mind. I do not care whether it is impossible or not with learned unbelievers; it is evidently possible with God, for

HE HAS DONE IT.

But they say it is contrary to reason. I do not care for that, either; it may be contrary to the reason of those unbelievers, but it is not contrary to mine; and if I am to be guided by reason, I prefer to follow my own. The atonement is a miracle, and miracles are rather to be accepted by faith than measured by calculation. God saith it, and I believe it; and believing it, I find life and comfort in it. Shall I not preach it? Assuredly I will.

"E'er since by faith I saw the stream
His flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming love has been my theme,
And shall be till I die."

Christ was not guilty, and could not be made guilty; but He was treated as if He were guilty, because He willed to stand in the place of the guilty. Yea, He was not only treated as a sinner, but He was treated as if He had been sin itself in the abstract. This is an amazing utterance. The sinless one was made to be sin.

Sin pressed our great Substitute very sorely. We know that He bore pains innumerable of body and of mind; He thirsted, He cried out in the agony of desertion, He bled, He died. We know that He poured out His soul unto death, and yielded up the ghost. But there was at the back, and beyond all this, an immeasurable abyss of suffering. The Greek Liturgy fitly speaks of "Thine unknown sufferings," probably to us they are unknowable sufferings. He was God as well as man, and the Godhead lent an omnipotent power to the manhood, so that there was compressed within His soul, and endured by it, an amount of anguish of which we can form no conception. I will say no more; it is wise to veil what it is impossible to depict. This text both veils and discovers His sorrow, as it says, "He made Him to be sin." Look into the words. Perceive their meaning, if you can. The angels desire to look into it.

So I pass on to notice in the third place,

WHO DID IT?

The text saith, "He hath made Him to be sin for us"; that is, God Himself it was who appointed His dear Son to be made sin for guilty men. The wise ones tell us that this substitution cannot be just. Who made them judges of what is right and just? I ask them whether they believe that Jesus suffered and died at all? If they believe that He did, how do they account for the fact? Do they say that He died as an example? Then I ask, is it just for God to allow a sinless being to die as an example? The fact of our Lord's death is sure, and it has to be accounted for. Ours is the fullest and truest explanation.

The death of our Lord displayed divine justice. It pleased God as the Judge of all, that sin should not be forgiven without the exaction of the punishment which had been so righteously threatened to it, or such other display of justice as might vindicate the law. They say that this is not the God of love. I answer, it is the God of love, pre-eminently so. If you had upon the bench to-day a judge whose nature was kindness itself, it would behoove him as a judge to execute justice, and if he did not, he would make his kindness ridiculous; indeed, his kindness to the criminal would be unkindness to society at large. Whatever the judge may be personally, he is officially compelled to do justice. And "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" You speak of the Fatherhood of God. Enlarge as you please upon that theme, even till you make a heresy of it; but still God is the great moral Governor of the universe, and it behooves Him to deal with sin in such a way that it is seen to be an evil and a bitter thing.

Admire also in the substitutionary sacrifice the great grace of God. Never forget that He whom God made to be sin for us was His own Son; ay, I go further, it was in some sense His own self: for the Son is one with the Father. You may not confound the persons, but you cannot divide the substance of the blessed Trinity in Unity. You may not so divide the Son of God from the Father as to forget that God was in Him reconciling the world unto Himself. It is the Father's other self who on the cross in human form doth bleed and die.

The last point is

in consequence? "That we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." Oh this weighty text! No man living can exhaust it. No theologian lived, even in the palmiest days of theology, who could ever get to the bottom of this statement. Every man that believes in Jesus is through Christ having taken his sin made to be righteous before God. Herein is a great mystery. The righteousness which Adam had in the garden was perfect, but it was the righteousness of man; ours is the righteousness of God. How acceptable with God must those be who are made by God Himself to be "the righteousness of God in him!" I cannot conceive of anything more complete. Oh, the splendor of this doctrine! Canst thou see it, my friend? Sinner though thou be, and in thyself defiled, deformed, and debased, yet if thou wilt accept the great Substitute which God provides for thee in the person of His dear Son, thy sins are gone from thee, and righteousness has come to thee. No doctrine can be more sweet than this to those who feel the weight of sin and the burden of its curse.

II. So now, gathering all up, I have to close with the second part of the text, which is not teaching, but the application of teaching—

A GREAT ARGUMENT.

"Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." Oh, that these lips had language, or that this heart could speak without them! Then would I plead with every unconverted, unbelieving soul within this place, and plead as for my life. Friend, you are at enmity with God, and God is angry with you; but on His part there is every readiness for reconciliation. He has made a way by which you can become His friend—a very costly way to Himself, but free to you. Oh, sirs, if you are not saved it is not because God will not or cannot save you; it is because you refuse to accept His mercy in Christ.

Now observe what we have to say to you today is this: we are anxious that you should be at peace with God, and therefore we act as ambassadors for Christ. Why should you not be at peace with One who so much wants to be at peace with you? Why should you not love the God of love, and delight in Him who is so kind to you? What He hath done for me He is quite willing to do for you; He is a God ever ready to pardon.

I have preached His Gospel now for many years, but I never met with a sinner yet that Christ refused to cleanse when he came to Him. I never knew a single case of a man who trusted Jesus, and asked to be forgiven, confessing his sin and forsaking it, who was cast out. I say I never met with one man whom Jesus refused; nor shall I ever do so. I have spoken with harlots whom He has restored to purity, and drunkards whom He has delivered from their evil habit, and with men guilty of foul sins who have become pure and chaste through the grace of our Lord Jesus. They have always told me the same story—"I sought the Lord, and He heard me; He hath washed me in His blood, and I am whiter than snow." Why should you not be saved as well as these?

Dear friend, perhaps you have never thought of this matter, and this morning you did not come here with any idea of thinking of it; but why should you not begin? You came just to hear a well-known preacher; I pray you forget the preacher, and think only of yourself, your God and your Saviour. It must be wrong for you to live without a thought of your Maker. To forget Him is to despise Him. It must be wrong for you to refuse the great atonement; you do refuse it if you do not ACCEPT IT AT ONCE.

It must be wrong for you to stand out against your God; and you do stand out against Him if you will not be reconciled to Him.

Notice how the text puts it: "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us." This thought staggers me. As I came along this morning I felt as if I could bury my head in my hands and weep as I thought of God beseeching anybody. He speaks, and it is done; myriads of angels count themselves happy to fly at His command; and yet man has so become God's enemy that he will not be reconciled to Him. God would make him His friend, and spends the blood of His dear Son to cement that friendship; but man will not have it. See the great God turns to beseeching His obstinate creature! His foolish creature! In this I feel a reverent compassion for God. Must He beseech a rebel to be forgiven? This makes it does it not? Then notice that next line, which if possible has even more force in it: "We pray you in Christ's stead." Since Jesus died in our stead, we, His redeemed ones, are to pray others in His stead; and as He poured out His heart for sinners in their stead, we must in another way pour out our hearts for sinners in His stead. "We pray you in Christ's stead." Now if my Lord were here this morning how would He pray you to come to Him? I wish, my Master, I were more fit to stand in Thy place at this time. Forgive me that I am so incapable. Oh, souls, why will you refuse eternal life? Why will ye die? Why will ye despise Him by whom alone you can live? There is but one gate of life; that gate is the open side of Christ; why will ye not enter, and live? "Come unto Me," saith He; "come unto Me."

AWFUL WORK TO PREACH,

I THINK I HEAR HIM

say it: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls." I think I see Him on that last day, that great day of the feast, standing and crying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." I hear him sweetly declare, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." I am not fit to pray you in Christ's stead, but I do pray you with all my heart. You that hear my voice from Sunday to Sunday, do come and accept the great sacrifice, and be reconciled to God. You that hear me but this once, I would like you to go away with this ringing in your ears, "Be ye reconciled to God." I have nothing pretty to say to you; I have only to declare that God has prepared a propitiation, and that now He entreates sinners to come to Jesus, that through Him they may be reconciled to God.

We do not exhort you to some impossible effort. We do not bid you do some great thing; we do not ask you for money or price; neither do we demand of you years of miserable feeling; but only this—be ye reconciled. It is not so much reconcile yourselves as "be reconciled." Yield yourselves to Him who round you now the bands of a man would cast, drawing you with cords of love because He was given for you. His spirit strives with you, yield to His striving. Believe and live! Quit the arch-enemy who has held thee in his grip. Escape for thy life, look not behind thee, stay not in all the plain, but flee where thou seest the open door of the great Father's house. At the gate the bleeding Saviour is waiting to receive thee, and to say, "I was made sin for thee, and thou art made the righteousness of God in Me." Father, draw them! Father, draw them! Eternal Spirit, draw them, for Jesus Christ Thy Son's sake! Amen.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PIRATES.*

So many changes have taken place during the present century that it is difficult for us to realize that only seventy years ago the Mediterranean was so unsafe that merchant ships of every nation stood in danger of capture by pirates unless they were protected either by an armed convoy or by tribute paid to the petty Barbary powers. Yet we can scarcely open a book of travels during the last century without mention being made of the immense risks to which every one was exposed who ventured by sea from Marseilles to Naples. The French dramatist Regnard was captured on an English ship going from Civita Vecchia to Toulon, and served for a time as a slave in Algiers at the end of the seventeenth century; and Jacob Leisler, who played such an important part in the early colonial history of New York, suffered the same fate before his arrival in this country.

The European States, in order to protect their commerce, had the choice of paying certain sums per head for each captive, which in reality was a premium on capture, or of buying entire freedom for their commerce by the expenditure of large sums yearly. The treaty renewed by France, in 1788, with Algiers was for fifty years, and it was agreed to pay $200,000 annually, besides large presents distributed according to custom every ten years, and a great sum given down. The peace of Spain with Algiers is said to have cost from three to five millions of dollars.

When the Revolution broke out we no longer had the safeguards for our commerce that had been given to us by England, and it was therefore that, in our very first negotiations for a treaty with France, we desired to have an article inserted into the treaty that the King of France should secure the inhabitants of the United States, and their vessels and effects, against all attacks or depredations from any of the Barbary powers.

[An interesting account is given by the author of the negotiations which followed. Our trade in the Mediterranean was increasing rapidly, and there was consequently increased opportunity for piratical outrages of which the African powers took full advantage. One American ship after another was seized, the cargoes stolen, and the officers and crews sold into slavery. The question became pressing of whether we should fight or pay blackmail for the safety of our ships. Efforts were made to effect an arrangement, sometimes indirectly through the Mathurins of France, and sometimes by a direct negotiation with the rulers of the piratical countries. An attempt of the latter order was made by William Eaton, who has left on record the following curious description of his visit to the Dey of Tunis:]

"We proceeded from the American house to the courtyard of the palace, uncovered our heads, entered the area of the hall, ascended a winding maze of five flights of stairs to a narrow, dark entry, leading to a contracted apartment of about twelve by eight feet, the private audience-room. Here we took off our shoes, and entering the cave (for so it seemed), with small apertures of light with iron grates, we were shown to a huge, shaggy beast sitting on his rump upon a low bench, covered with a cushion of embroidered velvet, with his hind legs gathered up like a tailor or a bear. On our approach to him he reached out his forepaw as if to receive something to eat. Our guide exclaimed, 'Kiss the Dey's hand!' The consul-general bowed very elegantly and kissed it, and we followed his example in succession. The animal seemed at that moment to be in a harmless mood; he grinned several times, but made very little noise. Having performed this ceremony, and standing a few moments in silent agony, we had leave to take our shoes and other property and leave the den, without any other injury than the humility of being obliged, in this involuntary manner, to violate the second command of God and offend common decency."

After the treaty of peace had been made with England [December 24th, 1814] we declared war against Algiers, and a naval force was sent out. Before our ships arrived at Algiers they had already captured an Algerian frigate and brig, and on their arrival they found that the whole Algerine corsair fleet was at sea. It was therefore very easy to intercept the ships as they returned to port.

An Algerine ship did come in sight, and every preparation was made for a fight; but within three hours, through the mediation of the Swedish consul, the treaty had been signed by the Dey, and the American prisoners delivered up. No presents were given, and tribute and presents of any kind were henceforth abolished. It was agreed, also, that prisoners of war should not be made slaves. This was on June 30th, 1815, just forty-one days after the squadron had left American waters.

THE NEW PALACE FOR THE PEOPLE.

A NOTABLE ceremony took place in London on June 28th. The Prince of Wales, with the Princess and two of their daughters, went to the East End of the city, where the poorest of the citizens live, to lay the foundation-stone of an institution which, it is hoped, may do for London on a larger scale what the Cooper Union is doing for New York. The royal cortège made quite a sensation when it appeared in the dirty, squalid streets, and crowds turned out to give it a hearty welcome. The Prince and Princess were warmly greeted, as they generally are in London, where their kindness and good-nature are well known. They were conducted around the site of the new building, and showed a sincere interest in all they saw and in the plans for the benefit of the poor struggling people. Before they left two prettily dressed children were introduced to the Princess, and presented her with a handsome bouquet as a memorial of her visit. This the Princess accepted with the grace and sweetness for which she is noted, and charmed the spectators by her gracious, womanly affability.

The institution of which the Prince laid the foundation-stone is the outcome of a munificent bequest made by Mr. Beaumont, a man whose heart was touched by the poverty around him. He left $62,000 to be applied to the provision of a free education for the poor. The enterprise commended itself to other philanthropists, who contributed largely until $375,000 was raised. With this the trustees commenced operations. They bought a site of five acres for $112,000, and propose to erect upon it a building to be used as a training-school for technical education, and also to contain reading-rooms, a library, baths, and gymnasium, to which, if more funds come in, will be added a School of Art costing $50,000. The object is to help poor boys and girls to an education, and to provide a place of recreation for the toiling millions.

THE DEACON'S MYSTERY SOLVED.

"DON'T cry, mamma; I'll soon be able to go to work, and then I'll earn plenty of money." The speaker was a bright little fellow under ten years old. His arm was around his mother's neck, and he was trying to kiss away the big tears that rolled down her cheeks.

Both mother and son were clad in deep mourning, and from the bonnet the former had laid aside on the table at her elbow, hung the long crape veil which indicated that she was recently widowed. Ada Greville put her arm around little Willie's shoulders and told him he was a brave, good boy, but he must go to school yet awhile, and mother must earn the money.

Poor creature! It was easily said, but she little knew what earning money in these days of nineteenth-century civilization in a Christian country meant. She had never earned a cent in her life. Her husband had always been able to provide for all their wants out of his salary as a clerk in a bank, and though they had saved little, there had always been enough. Now he was dead; his family were on the other side the Atlantic, and Ada knew nothing of them. Her own mother and father were dead, and she was all alone in the world with her orphan boy.

A few days of sorrow passed; the little store of money was dwindling, and Ada with an aching heart sent Willie to his school again and started out to look for work. It must be by her needle that she must live, for she could not take any situation that would separate her from her boy. She therefore went to the dry-goods store where she had been accustomed to deal and asked to see the proprietor. Many ready-made articles of clothing were sold there that must be made by some one, and why not by her?

She modestly explained her situation to the busy dry-goods man, and presented her request for employment. "No," he said, "we do not have these things made specially for us. We find we can buy them cheaper ready-made. These shirts, for example, cost, ready-made, only three cents more than the material, and we should have to pay a quarter for making. I do not know how it is done, but if we gave out the material ourselves and paid for the making, we could not sell them for a dollar. They are sold everywhere at that price, and you know, madam, we should soon lose our trade if our prices were more than our neighbors. We must buy in the cheapest market."

The dry-goods man was a Christian man, trustee and deacon of his church, very liberal in his contributions to its funds and to foreign missions, as a wealthy Christian merchant should be. He was doing a good business, his prices were as low as those of any other house, and some said a little lower; customers came to him in crowds, and he prospered. He was noted as a shrewd buyer, and was always on the look-out for any cheap lots there were in the market. That was the secret of his success, as he often said. "A thing well bought is half sold." Every wholesale house knew that the way to get his custom was to sell cheap, for he knew a good thing when he saw it, and knew its exact worth to an eighth of a cent. Those very shirts, for example, he had bought because they were six cents a dozen less than he had ever paid before. They were a bargain offered by a new house, which was rising in favor with such buyers as he.

The widow ventured to suggest that the shirts must have been made by some one, and, as she said with a smile, "not very well made. Could he not tell her where to get such work."

"Certainly," said the dry-goods man. "I will write you an introduction to the firm that sells them," and he did.

Mrs. Greville thanked him, and went in quest of Messrs. S— with the letter of introduction in her pocket. Several miserable, hungry-looking women were waiting when she arrived, and she drew her neat new dress about her as she passed them, they were so filthy and ragged.

"Why, certainly," said the clerk when he read the letter she presented. "We do not care who does our work, so long as they do it well and at our price. We shall be happy to oblige Mr. —. You may take this parcel, if you like, and here is a pattern shirt. There is enough material for one dozen. You must leave a deposit for the material; you will get it back when you bring the shirts."

Mrs. Greville left the deposit, which emptied her pocket-book, and the parcel being large and she unused to carry burdens through the streets, took a horse-car to her home. She sat down immediately and began her work. She toiled early and late. Not as she had been used to work, laying it aside when she was tired for an hour's reading or a stroll in the evening, but continuously till her eyes ached and her hand seemed paralyzed. Was she not working for her bread? It was so fortunate, as she said, that she was able to get work for herself and Willie just as they needed it. By dint of persistent labor the dozen shirts were finished in a week, and she tied them up carefully and went with a little touch of pride in her face to receive the first money she had ever earned.

She saw the same clerk she had seen before, and he remembered her. He looked carefully at the work, nodded his head approvingly, and handed her an order on the cashier for the money.

"What is this?" Ada asked. "Twenty-one cents? What is it for?"

"That is for making the shirts. It is our regular price."

"What, for a dozen?" said Ada, her voice breaking with tearful disappointment.

Ada Greville's Despairing Prayer.

"Oh, yes; that is all we can afford. We make a leading line of these things. You ask Mr. —, who introduced you. He will tell you we could not sell them to him at the price if we paid more than a cent and three quarters for making. That is how we got his trade. The people he used to buy from pay two cents, but we beat them, and we have made a customer of him."

Ada Greville made no reply. Her tears drowned her voice. She got her deposit back and the twenty-one cents for her week's hard work, and went sorrowfully home. So the mystery that puzzled the deacon was not a mystery to her. She knew how it was he could buy the shirts so cheap. Some other occupation must be found, for she and little Willie could not live on that. She tried many, but with no better success. The rate of remuneration was not fixed in any occupation by the work done, nor by the need of the person doing it, but by the competition for the work. "We used to pay ten dollars a week once," said a merchant to her when she answered an advertisement for a clerk, "but now there are so many clerks wanting places that we can get any number at three dollars, and they are glad to get that. After a time I suppose we shall have them offering to work for two dollars. I guess they will come to think two dollars is better than nothing."

It was after a month of unavailing search for work that the widow stood listening to that cynical talk, and when she left the merchant's office her heart was almost broken. She walked home by back streets, her veil over her face, crying bitterly as she went. It was a poor lodging that she occupied now. She had been forced to sell all her little possessions for bread, and she and Willie were living in a rear room at the top of a tenement-house.

It seemed that her cup of sorrow was full, but that night it was running over. Willie was sick and feverish. The next day he was too ill to go to school, and before night he was in a high fever. The foul smells had done their work on the poor, brave, little orphan. Ada sat up with him moistening his parched lips with water and listening to his delirious talk. At last in her agony she threw herself on her knees, and clasping her hands in despair, she prayed earnestly to the God of the widow and fatherless for deliverance. Oh, if only her boy might be spared!

Early the next morning she sought the physician who had attended her husband, and begged him to come to her boy, telling him plainly that she was too poor to pay a fee.

"Certainly I will come," he said, "and I am glad you came to me. It was only yesterday that a gentleman was here inquiring for you. I did not know where you were, but he left the name of his hotel with me, as he was doing with every one who knew you, on the chance of getting on your track. I will drive around to him on my way. He will be glad to find you. I believe he is your husband's father. He certainly spoke of his little grandson, and said he wanted to take you both back with him to England."

An hour later the doctor arrived in the squalid lodging house, bringing with him the gentleman he had spoken of. Ada's letter informing her husband's family of his death had been received at a time when an aged man was in the mood to forgive his erring son. It was too late then to forgive him, but the widow and the child should learn how much the husband and father was loved. The old man set out immediately for America, and searched diligently for his unknown relatives. Willie and his mother did not escape the ills of this mortal life in after years, but they never afterward experienced the awful misery of poverty.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leonard S. Keyser.*

The New Acquaintance.

It was an anxious moment with Leroy when he rang that bell on Sunday evening. Not even the sense of triumph which had filled his heart during the past day could stop the nervous trembling of his hand, or keep the knot out of his throat that made his voice husky and tremulous. It was strange that the prospect of a meeting with a comparative stranger should have power so to move him. He was moved, as he could not disguise even from himself.

It was excitement, he supposed, but it was not all excitement. That strange power we cannot explain, but which we call love, had laid its hand upon him. We laugh at "love at first sight," but how seldom love comes in any other way! True, it deepens and increases with intimacy, and the old man looking across the room at the gray-haired wife who, for thirty or forty years, has been his constant companion, is conscious that she is far dearer and more precious to him than she was when they first knew each other, but his love in his old age is the tree the seed of which was planted in the long ago. It is the same in essence, though it has developed. In the experience of at least half the married couples around us it sprang into life in an hour, sometimes in a moment. For good or ill, for joy or sorrow, two persons meet, and a subtle influence passes connecting them consciously from thenceforth. It was so with these two. Miss West's genius and mental power attracted the young student, but it was herself that he loved. It might have to be fought against and crushed, torn out of his heart with bitter pangs, as many a man has had to do with ruthless hand lest he lose his soul, or it might grow and flourish approved by his conscience; but it was there and must be recognized.

As he stood in the doorway, hat in hand, a woman's form rose from a chair in the room and stepped forward.

"Mr. Ransom, I believe."

"The same, Miss West."

They bowed, and soon the girl he still must call the lost Atlantis girl and our Leroy were engaged in conversation. Could it be possible that this poem of his fancy was a real person, and was talking to him? Such a talker! Why, she sallied forth in conversation with the most perfect self-possession and with the ease of the skimming swallow. Leroy felt himself at home before many words were spoken, and even became brilliant himself. As he looked at her he was stirred with greater admiration, if possible, than before. He never asked himself whether she was beautiful, but he knew that somehow or other she had won his homage, and he paid fealty to her. To him as he sat there in that parlor on that pleasant summer evening, she was a paragon of "womanly womanliness," as he would have said—an ideal woman, the woman he had been waiting to meet, having a heart great with the possibilities of love.

"A rather bold, careless girl who is not sufficiently observant of the proprieties," some critic remarks. "Here is your heroine receiving a young gentleman who has never been introduced to her, and is actually treating him as a friend. She must be unmaidenly."

Not so. Miss West was a lady in the true sense of the word, but she was gifted with reasoning powers, which, we hope, even in this frivolous nineteenth century, is a characteristic not unladylike. The application Leroy had made was passed upon by her reason and approved. It was unconventional, but not unreasonable. As the young man wished to know her, and was manly enough to say so frankly, she would meet him on his own terms. If the acquaintance proved unprofitable or uncongenial, she had the power to dissolve it at any moment, and she had no fear of her decision in such a case being resisted by a man so honest and sensible as her correspondent.

Beside this, it happened that Miss West knew more of Leroy than he did of her, and she wondered that he had been driven to writing, as she was acquainted with ladies who were friends of his own. Evidently they had not talked of her to him as they had talked of him to her. She knew him well by reputation, and his character interested her. On her side she had wished that she knew him, and thought that if ever they were brought together she would try to do him good. Who could tell but some earnest word for her Master spoken in season might touch a heart encased in unbelief. If he had really the intelligence for which her friends gave him credit, he must be vulnerable to some shaft of truth. A careful study would reveal the joints of his armor, and a hand guided of God might penetrate better than when one "drew a bow at a venture." She thought often of him, especially after hearing him speak at the Franklin Society, and wished that his forcible logic, his quick wit, and his eloquence were being used in Christ's service. Then came his letter, and, as she read it, she reasoned:

"Here is a man of energy. He pushes through the childish laws of straight-laced etiquette and goes right to the point at once, and I like such energy of purpose if it is not misdirected. Besides, he honorably asks for my company by this note instead of devising some strategy by which to obtain an introduction, and I like that. Then, why is not this note as good for the purpose of introduction as some one, for instance, who knows no more about him or me than we know of each other, except that he happened to say a word or two to us? Yet such an introduction would be perfectly valid according to rules of etiquette. He is evidently a young man of good character. Then I have a curiosity to form the acquaintance of such a character as he must be. He is original. I see marks of originality in this note. And then he is fully conscious, as I see by his letter, that it is a little irregular, which fact shows that he must be considerably interested. Why disappoint him? I will accept in spite of the rules. No harm can come of it, and there is no violation of common sense. Who knows what may not come of it?"

They went to church. It must be confessed that Leroy thought more about the girl at his side than of worship, song, or sermon. To have achieved such a measure of success was, in his estimation, something to be proud of. He wondered whether Francis Train was there, and in his heart he blessed him on account of the compact they had made together, and which had stimulated him to such rapid action.

After church they returned to Miss West's parlor and talked. Their conversation turned on literature. Now, Leroy might have been called a literary enthusiast. Nothing gave him such delight as to sit with a friend and talk about the writings of the good and the great. He soon discovered a similar sentiment in Miss West. In fact, before the evening was over he found that she was not only a voluminous reader, but a careful one also. The best poetry, fiction, history, and philosophy had been carefully studied by this winsome girl, who seemed to have lost none of her charm by her communion with dull scholars.

The young man was wary in his conversation. With unerring intuition he felt that all his hopes of the future with regard to her turned upon this interview, and that, if at the outset he revolted her by his scepticism, he might never recover the ground he would lose. Being unaware that she already knew of it, he carefully guided the conversation away from topics that might require an avowal from him. He would not desert his colors, but he would not flaunt them in the face of one who must dislike them until it was necessary in common honesty. Avoiding, therefore, books on religion and philosophy, he introduced the topic of the works of fiction, with which she was evidently familiar.

"Yes," Miss West said, "I have read, I think, all the works of Dickens, all of Thackeray, some of Anthony Trollope and Bulwer Lytton, and most of the English writers of the first class, and perhaps a few of the second. Hawthorne and James and Howells, of course, I have read. In the intervals of study I have used them to unbend the mind, and have found them beneficial. My practice has been to give an hour to them in the evening as a sedative, that I might place a little rippling stream between the field of hard toil and the land of dreams. I think it is enough to work in the daytime without exhausting one's brain by solving problems in one's dreams."

"That is an excellent idea, Miss West," said Ransom. "I knew I should learn something from you. I know the feeling of exhaustion too well that one has in the morning after a vain attempt to solve problems in a nightmare. I will certainly try your method. So you spend your days in Clayville and your nights in London under the guidance of your authors?"

"Oh, no, not always. I do not desire travel of that kind, and it seldom comes to me. I meant that if one must dream, it is better that it should not be about one's work. If the shades of the great writers of fiction will forgive me the admission, I will just whisper to you in confidence that what I desire them to do for me, and what their works do generally produce, is a state of blissful vacuity of mind, which is just the right state to invite refreshing, dreamless sleep. Beside that, why should I go to London? My favorite Howells would not take me there. Whenever would he take any one out of Boston? I do not believe he knows of the existence of any other city except in a vague way as the lands of barbarism."

"That is so; I have been making a new study of Dickens in comparison with Thackeray, and so I hastily associated London with the reading of fiction. But your notion of 'blissful vacuity' amuses me;" and Leroy rubbed his hands and laughed a merry, ringing laugh. "What a crushing criticism!"

"I do not mean it unkindly. I bless the man who can give me an invigorating sleep. He does me a kindness far greater than a writer who distresses and excites me."

"Why, that is like eating opium."

"Oh, no. It does no harm to the mind analogous to that opium does to the body. When the mental powers have endured a long strain they are wearied, and refuse to do good work until they are relieved. This fiction administers the relief, the tension gradually relaxes, and recuperation follows. I have a right to that indulgence, I think. I do not seek it as a stimulant."

"I recognize the distinction and agree with you. Have I not said I shall follow your example?"

From this the conversation passed into criticism of individual authors and comparison of them. To his surprise, Leroy found that Miss West was an admirer of George Eliot, and ranked her at the head of English novelists. This admission aroused such pugnacity as he could feel toward so fair a disputant, and the discussion waxed warm, until a glance at his watch warned Leroy how quickly time had flown.

"I must go," he said, "but I forgot to ask. You have come to the N. S. College only this spring like myself, have you not?"

"Yes," she replied. "I took the course at the W—— Normal School, but still feeling myself sadly deficient, I have concluded to take the course here."

"Which is right, I say; for the college course is meagre enough, and much less can the Normal give the needful amount of culture. I believe that our young men and women ought to take thorough courses of study, with all the appliances for information in the different departments, and the best place to get such a training is at a good college, like the N. S., for instance."

"I agree with you, Mr. Ransom. I have seen so many with a mere smattering of knowledge—a little of everything and not much of anything; and so many skimming institutions as we have encourage shallow scholarship."

"Well, I'm glad we agree so well on this subject, as well as in our literary tastes." Then his lip trembled slightly and his brow reddened somewhat as he continued, "Since we are acquainted now, and agree so well, I should be pleased, Miss West, to call on you again next Sunday evening."

She slightly inclined her head and replied, "I shall be pleased to have you call."

He said good-night and walked home on air.

"I say, Burt, I've reached the land of corn and wine. Let me tell you, I've met the most congenial girl I ever saw. What a treat it is to get acquainted with a young woman of real mental calibre in the midst of so much female shoddy, and among so many who can't talk anything but soft nonsense, nor read anything but trashy novels! She's a perfect literary lady. She seems to have a knowledge of the whole realm of literature. It is not a mere compendious knowledge derived from a college course, but an actual familiarity with the authors themselves and their works. She not only knows about them, but knows them. I have seen a good many women, but I never met such a congenial girl in all my life; and such a fluent talker."

Thus he went on with his eulogium until his room-mate was actually aroused to interest.

"I guess I must get acquainted with her, too," said Burt.

"Oh, you needn't mind—at least, not till I am a little more intimate with her. I'm jealous of any one who looks at her."

He didn't sleep any that night either—foolish boy! And yet his love affair did not interfere with his studies. He had too much power of mental concentration for that. He recited well enough, and at society he performed his part.

WARNING TO JUDAS AND PETER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 22, John 13: 21-38. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 10: 12.

The Failures of God's Children—Foreseen by the Lord—Unbelief and Self-reliance Producing Failure—The Root Sin—Judas Never a True Man—The Limit of Christ's Power—The Troubled Disciples—An Incident in a London Institution—The Token—The New Commandment.

"LET him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. 10: 12); "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov. 16: 18). It is not necessary that God's children should fall. "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not" (1 John 2: 1). "Unto Him which is able to keep you from falling" (Jude 24)—"guard you from stumbling" (R. V.). Yet how much there is of failure among God's children! And Jesus sees it long before it ripens into action. He sees the temptation afar off, and He sees when the door by which Satan can find access is left open. In His love He has recorded for our profit the failures of many of His people, that we may learn through them to avoid the steps by which they fell.

Abraham failed when he feared to acknowledge Sarah as his wife, when he went down into Egypt, as though God were unequal to the task of caring for him. Unbelief and self-reliance were the doors by which Satan entered. He failed in the same way when he took Hagar for a wife, when he joined Sarah in a human plan to bring about the fulfilment of God's promises regarding his seed. Isaac, through the same spirit of unbelief, fell into Abraham's sin in also denying his wife. Jacob, after he had learned to know God at Bethel, manifested doubt as to whether God would fulfil His promises, and sought, like Abraham, to bring about their fulfilment. He had recourse to stratagem that he might obtain his father's blessing, and also, later on, that he might obtain his promised riches in flocks and herds, and thus showed that he entertained a suspicion of God's proving unfaithful to His Word. Moses, again, when God sent him to Pharaoh, entertained doubts as to whether his mission would be successful, and obliged God to give him Aaron as a spokesman. Here, again, it was through unbelief that Satan entered in, and so in his last fall, when he struck the rock, God's judgment upon him, that he should not enter into the promised land, was because

MOSES BELIEVED HIM NOT

(Num. 20: 12). Perhaps few men have believed God more fully than did Moses: "He endured, as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11: 27); therefore his falls stand out in striking contrast to his ordinary life in God. The root sin of all sins is unbelief, and this is the door which is most often left open by all children of God; the door through which Satan most often gets an advantage. Self-love and self-will are closely connected with unbelief. All anxiety for self springs from a doubt that He careth for us.

Jesus, after washing the disciples' feet and teaching them thereby so to do one to another, said, "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with Me hath lifted up his heel against Me" (Ps. 41: 9). This was one of the sorest trials which Jesus had to bear. Once before He had said, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" (John 6: 70). The word is translated "slanderer" (1 Tim. 3: 11), "false accusers" (11 Tim. 3: 3; Tit. 2: 3). Jesus had long ago seen the defection in Judas. How far Judas had been a true man and a changed man when Jesus first called him we do not know, for it is not recorded. One thing is quite clear: however much he believed in Jesus, however much he had preached the Gospel, healed the sick and cast out devils in His name, there was something nearer to his heart than Jesus. The man had never yielded himself "a living sacrifice"; his own was still his darling passion. If he had believed fully in the love which Jesus had for him, and that his interests for time and for eternity were safer with Jesus than in his own hands, Judas would not have been a thief (John 12: 6). Jesus had called Judas to such a place of nearness to Himself, that He said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth Me; and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me." Judas, equally with each of the other disciples, might have been a representative of Christ in the world—an instrument to bring men into contact with God! And Judas was on the point of throwing away a position which angels might have coveted, for a few coins—a little contemptible earthly advantage. "We must look to the main thing," says the man of the world, in his heathenish reference to money, the God in which he trusts. But here was a disciple, an apostle, who was ready to sacrifice Jesus Himself for an earthly advantage! "Jesus was troubled in spirit, and testified, saying, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that shall betray Me." One of you! It had been an easy matter to raise Lazarus from his grave; neither human will, nor yet the unbelief of Lazarus, stood in the way; but here was a disciple turning away from Jesus, and so not only proclaiming to the world how low a disciple could fall, but also committing suicide on his own soul which Jesus Himself had thus no power to stop. "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good Word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away (literally 'falling away' or 'while they fall away') to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame." Jesus can weep over a Jerusalem which will not that He shall gather her children under His wings; can be troubled for a Judas whose obstinate falling away makes his renewal unto repentance impossible, but in righteousness He can do no more. But He said of this, as of other things yet to come upon Him, "From henceforth I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass ye may believe that I am" (14: 29, R. V.). As in the Old Testament God's constant aim with His people and with the heathen was, "that ye may know that I am the Lord," so, in the New Testament, the Lord Jesus sought to teach His disciples and the Jews that He is the "I am" (John 6: 24, 28; 8: 58; 13: 19).

The disciples, too, were troubled, "doubting of whom He spoke." They "looked one on another," but did one the other. Peter, ever the ready spokesman, beckoned to John, who lay on Jesus' breast, that he should ask Jesus. Oh how much better it is to bring anything to Jesus than to judge and condemn. In a religious institution in London a sovereign ($5) was missing from the room of one of the poorest of the inmates. Who could have taken it? The servants and the nurse said they knew nothing of it. The heads of the establishment asked the Lord to give them this token, that if it were the nurse, she should of her own will desire to leave. Three days after, the nurse, who knew nothing of this prayer, said she wished to leave at once. Thus did the Lord easily show who was the evildoer and rid the house of a dangerous person. John asked Jesus, "Lord, who is it?" Jesus answered, "He it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it." Two days before Judas had agreed with the chief priests to betray Jesus to them for thirty pieces of silver, the price of a slave (Ex. 21: 32; Zech. 11: 12, 13). Now Jesus gave the sop to Judas. But something happened which Jesus alone saw—"Satan entered into" Judas, and "Jesus said unto him, That thou doest, do quickly." None of the disciples knew the import of the words, and had it not been that the possession of Satan made Judas quite another man, how could he have borne such a rebuke? "He then, having received the sop, went immediately out; and it was night." It was night in that man's soul, a night which knows no morning. Poor, lost, undone Judas, "the son of perdition."

As the traitor went out, the atmosphere was purified. Then Jesus said, "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him. If God be glorified in Him, God shall also glorify Him in Himself, and shall straightway glorify Him." Thank God, in this very hour of sadness we see Jesus "for the joy that was set before him," enduring the cross (Heb. 12: 2). He saw before Him how fallen men could be made "an habitation of God through the Spirit;" "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." His words seem, just now, to have been broken utterances, and unconnected; but oh, how precious! "Little children," He said (using the same expression which John loved to use afterward), "yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek Me; and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you." In every way He sought to prepare them for His death, but they did not understand.

A NEW COMMANDMENT,

I give unto you, That ye love one another even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (R. V.). "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another." Nothing on earth is so mighty as love, for "God is love," and all real love to one another is God in one of His children responding to God in another of His children. But divine love is like Christ's love to us. His is eternal and cannot change; it is independent of what we are, and could not retaliate a slight. It has in it no particle of self, it loves from above. And it is only thus that we can love one another unbrokenly. We cannot satisfy the demands of a selfish love, but we can love from above. This is something above the world's level, it is a moral miracle.

Peter, who was always inclined to think himself an honorable exception to the rest of the disciples, questioned Jesus as to where He was going. "Jesus answered him, Whither I go, thou canst not follow Me now, but thou shalt follow Me afterward." He said, "Why cannot I follow Thee now? I will lay down my life for Thy sake." But not only had Judas failed, but Jesus told Peter how even he—the zealous, eager, devoted Peter—should thrice deny Him.

Thy Healer: God's Dealings With Soul and Body, Edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, a magazine devoted to holiness and healing, published in London on the first and fifteenth of every month. Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1886 should be sent to Mrs. M. An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 328 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

MY WORK.

"ALL members have not the same office."—Rom. xii. 4.

I could not do the work the reapers did,
Or bind the golden sheaves that thereby fell;
But I could follow by the Master's side,
And watch the marred face I loved so well!
Right in my path lay many a ripened ear,
Which I would stoop and gather joyfully;
I did not know the Master placed them there,
"Handfuls on purpose" that he left for me.

I could not cast the heavy fisher-net,
I had not strength or wisdom for the task;
So on the sun-lit sands, with spray-drops wet,
I sat, and earnest prayers rose thick and fast.
I pleaded for the Master's blessing where
My brethren toiled upon the wide world-sea;
Or ever that I knew, His smile so fair
Came, bringing sweet encouragement to me.

I could not join the glorious soldier band,
I never heard their thrilling battle-cry;
The work allotted by the Master's hand
Kept me at home while others went to die.
And yet, when victory crowned the struggle long,
And spoils were homeward brought, both rich and rare,
He let me help to chant the triumph song,
And bade me in the gold and jewels share.

Oh, Master dear! the tiniest work for Thee
Finds recompense beyond our highest thought;
And feeble hands that worked but tremblingly
The richest colors in Thy fabric wrought!
We are content to take what Thou shalt give,
To do, or suffer, as Thy choice shall be,
Forsaking all Thy wisdom bids us leave,
Glad in the thought that we are pleasing Thee!

—Eva Travers Poole.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SCRIBNER'S ADVERTISEMENT.

NEW YORK, AUG. 7, 1886.

WE know that this is not the time of year to sell many books, but we have now ready a cheap edition of books by Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson which is attracting remarkable attention in both England and America, and it is worth while that every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should know about it. The book is entitled "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." This is what Mr. James Payn, the famous English novelist, says of it in The Independent:

"It is a work of incontestable genius. Nothing, in my judgment, by Edgar Allan Poe, to be generous, is to be compared to it; it has all his weird and eerie power, but combined with a graphic realism that immensely heightens the effect. I read it in a four-wheeled cab the other night, by the help of a reading lamp, as I travelled through miles of snow-bound streets, quite unconscious of the external circumstances of that melancholy journey. What is worth mentioning, because otherwise a good many people will miss it, is that a noble moral underlies the marvellous tale."

It is a story which imparts a noble lesson, and so powerful that it commands our respect as well as our admiration.

We send a good paper-bound edition to any address, on receipt of 25 cents; the cloth library edition for $1.00. So far 24,000 copies have been sold.

Mr. Stevenson's newest story is just ready. Sent, postpaid, for 50 cents in paper; $1.00 in cloth. It is a tale of Scotch Highland life—we merely give its title. Like "Dr. Jekyll," it is a notable book—out of the common.

KIDNAPPED:
Being Memoirs of David Balfour in the Year 1731.

How he was Kidnapped and Cast Away; his sufferings in a Desert Isle; his Journey in the Wild Highlands; his Acquaintance with Alan Breck Stewart and other notorious Highland Jacobites; with all that he suffered at the hands of his Uncle, Ebenezer Balfour of Shaws, falsely so called.

It was a remarkable fact, frequently referred to in the early months of this year, that Mr. Tilden had survived several prominent men who were expected to outlive him. When his name was mentioned for the Presidency in 1880, and objections were made on the ground that he might not live out his term, it was urged that if he died Mr. Hendricks would be there to succeed him. Yet Mr. Hendricks died, and Mr. Tilden lived on. General Hancock, it was said, could not be open to the objection urged against Mr. Tilden, yet he died before Mr. Tilden. General McClellan, another Democratic leader, also died before the infirm "sage of Grey-stone." But now Mr. Tilden has gone. On August 3d he was seized with an attack of indigestion, to which he was subject, and for the first time in his long life his constitution failed to throw off the disorder. The pulse declined, the breath came in rapid gasps, and by midday on August 4th the great statesman was dead.

of Mr. Tilden were prominent in the early history of Massachusetts. Mr. Tilden took considerable trouble in tracing his pedigree, and one of his last labors was to put in connected narrative the result of his researches. He completed it, and dictated the preface only the week before he died. In it he says that he had prepared it, because he thought "it might be of use to the younger members of the family, as it showed them that they had sprung from an honest, sturdy race, of whom they could be proud." He appears to have rightly considered that there was more reason to be proud of ancestors honest and sturdy than ancestors who were robber barons or lawless oppressors of the people. The earliest representative of the family that Mr. Tilden was able to trace was John Tylden, who lived in the vale of Tylden, County Kent, England, in 1463. Some of his descendants still reside there, and one of them is, or was recently incumbent of the church at Tenterden.

Nathaniel was the first of the family to come to America. His younger brother Joseph was one of the "merchant adventurers" who were consignors of the Mayflower. Nathaniel did not sail in that historic craft, but in the good ship Ann, which sailed for America in 1634. He was one of the ten commissioners who founded the town of Scituate, Mass., in that year. He was connected by marriage with the families of both Governor Winslow and Governor Bradford. The next generation resided at Lebanon, Conn., and there John Tilden, the grandfather of the deceased statesman, was born. The Tildens of that day were brave pioneers, and took a prominent part in the Indian wars and in the War of Independence. They were firm friends of Thomas Jefferson, and his political allies. During the war John Tilden became acquainted with Samuel Jones, a gentleman of position, who had volunteered from his home in Cornwall, Conn. The friendship of the two families survived the war, and was cemented by the marriage of John Tilden's son, Elam, with Samuel Jones's daughter, Polly. Of that marriage the late Samuel Jones Tilden was issue.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

In 1790 John Tilden and his family, with the Jones family, removed to Canaan, Columbia County, N. Y., and the name of the town was changed, probably by their influence, to New Lebanon, which name it still bears. There Samuel Jones Tilden was born on February 9th, 1814. He was, therefore, in his seventy-third year when he died on August 4th. He received from his father a careful training, and in 1832, being then eighteen years of age, he entered the Sophomore Class in Yale College. He was a weak, delicate lad, whose early years had been spent in study and in listening to the conversation of his father's friends instead of in the rustic sports of stronger boys of his own age. The conversations, however, were worth listening to; for Elam Tilden counted among his friends many famous men, who made New Lebanon their favorite resort. Among them was Martin Van Buren, William L. Marcy, Silas Wright, Azariah C. Flagg, Edwin Crosswell, editor of the Albany Argus; Michael Hoffman, and the Livingstons. Thus the youth was in intimate association with the members of "the Albany Regency," which for many years dominated the politics of the State of New York. In their company his political principles were formed, and the effects of their influence showed themselves in his character to the last. His was made during the memorable campaign of 1832. General Jackson was the Democratic candidate for re-election to the Presidency, with Martin Van Buren on the same ticket for the Vice-Presidency. Henry Clay was at the head of the Republican ticket, and William Wirt had been put up by the men who at that time were making their opposition to Freemasonry their political standing ground. Efforts were being made to effect a coalition between the anti-Masons and the Republicans, and the fortunes of the Democracy depended largely on the success or failure of that effort. William L. Marcy was running for the Governorship as a Democrat, and Francis Granger as the coalition candidate.

The subject of the coalition had been frequently discussed in the hearing of young Tilden. Familiar with the subject, he wrote an essay upon it. He read it to his father, who submitted it to Mr. Van Buren, then at Lebanon Springs. Van Buren was so impressed by it, that he immediately had it signed by the leading Democrats in the State, and published in the Albany Argus, as "An Address to the People of New York." The Albany Evening Journal attributed it to Mr. Van Buren. The defeat of the coalition and the election of Marcy and the Democratic electoral ticket were largely the result of the impression produced on the public mind by this address. This remarkable political paper at once made its youthful author the familiar of Van Buren, Wright, Marcy, and Crosswell. His suggestions were listened to, and the services of his pen eagerly sought.

At Yale College Mr. Tilden was a classmate of William M. Evarts, Chief-Justice Waite, Professor Lyman, Professor Silliman, and Edwards Pierpont. He had been there but a short time when his delicate health, overtaxed by too attentive application, gave way, and he returned to the old homestead, as his friends and physicians feared, a physical wreck. From infancy he had suffered from weak digestive powers, and his sedentary habits aggravated the disease. An active out-door life, however, soon recuperated his strength, and in 1834 he entered the University of New York, where his academic education was completed. He then commenced the study of law in the office of John W. Edmunds, of New York. He also attended the law school of the University, where Benjamin F. Butler and Judge Kent were among the lecturers. His continued and increased. He took an important part in the contest which followed the disastrous financial collapse of 1837, advocating Van Buren's scheme of a separation between the Government and the Treasury. Though only twenty-three years of age, he did not hesitate to measure swords with Senator N. P. Talmadge, and in the opinion of the audiences he was victorious over his experienced opponent.

AS A LAWYER,

Mr. Tilden's career was successful from the first. He was admitted to the bar in 1841, and opened an office in Pine Street, New York. He neglected his business during 1844 to take part in the Presidential campaign. He entered into it with all his energy, and with Mr. H. G. Langley and Mr. O'Sullivan founded the Democratic daily newspaper, the Morning News. All through the campaign he gave to the newspaper freely of time and money, and wrote many of its most effective editorials. After the election, however, his interest in journalism ceased; he gave his share to O'Sullivan, and returned to his law office. In 1845 he was elected to the Assembly, and also took a prominent part in the constitutional convention which began its sessions after the Assembly adjourned; but after that he temporarily withdrew from politics to concentrate his attention on his law practice. He saw that his independence in politics would largely depend on his financial status, and was resolved to win such a fortune as would place him above the temptation of sacrificing his political principles for the spoils of office.

The character of Mr. Tilden's mind showed itself in his studies. To him it became a delight to unravel the intricacies of some mysterious case, and having separated the threads, to knit them together in a strong and comprehensive form. Such a case he had in the contest over the election of his father's old friend, Azariah C. Flagg, as comptroller of the city. From the very data of his opponent, without calling witnesses, Mr. Tilden, by a mathematical and logical analysis, reconstructed a lost tally list, showing the number of tickets, candidates, and aggregate votes, and proved conclusively that the return for Mr. Flagg was correct, and won the case. Charles O'Connor, associate counsel, spoke of Mr. Tilden's opening as one of the most he had ever heard. As counsel for the Burdell heirs, Mr. Tilden had a still more intricate case. His argument and his adroit examination of one hundred and forty-two witnesses convinced the court that the claimants to the estate had constructed a claim as fraudulent as it was skilful. The power of metaphysical analysis and logical concentration he displayed in that case made him one of the most famous among the rising young lawyers of the day. Afterward came the suit of the Cumberland Coal Company, of Maryland, against its directors, which Mr. Tilden fought with a courage and energy, combined with keen penetration, that attracted the notice of corporations, and brought him an enormous practice. Unfaithful trustees and directors grew to dread the name of the man whose sagacity seemed to divine their motives and plans, and whose patient industry traced every step of their tortuous path.

As with many other prominent Democrats, the period of the war was to Mr. Tilden a time of misunderstanding and painful embarrassment. In opposing the Republican Party and in deprecating its policy as liable to lead to secession, they had prepared the way, in that time of violent excitement, for suspicions of their loyalty. Mr. Tilden did not escape, but it was always maintained by him and his friends that though he could not support President Lincoln's administration, he never wavered in his loyalty to the Northern cause. It is certain that the declaration which the Democratic Party issued in 1862 of its adhesion to the Union and the war to preserve it, was from his pen. Nevertheless, Mr. Tilden's part in the struggle was passive rather than active, and he continued to attend to his business, while anxiously watching events.

THE TWEED RING

created the emergency which at last drew Mr. Tilden away from his lucrative practice into public life. In 1866 Tweed and his confederates were in the zenith of their power. The Legislature and the judiciary were both under their control, and the mayor and corporation of New York City were practically helpless. At this juncture Dean Richmond died, and Mr. Tilden succeeded him as chairman of the Democratic State Committee. His position was a difficult one, for every avenue of attack on the ring was closed by bribery. Tweed could be removed from office only by impeachment on charges preferred by the mayor, who was his tool, and could be tried only before the bench of Common Pleas, every judge of which, save one, was his creature, and in the Legislature he had just bought a majority at a cost of $10,000 a head. By these means the ring was able in 1870 to steal more than one half of all the money paid out of the city treasury, and by the end of 1871 its plunder amounted to over sixty millions. In that year came the exposure. Some of the secret accounts of the ring were published, and the indignation of the citizens was aroused.

Mr. Tilden cast in his lot with the reformers, and proved a most valuable coadjutor. He went into the bank where all the cheques of the ring had passed, and during many days' arduous labor analyzed their accounts, and traced out their division of plunder. Here he obtained the only proof which would stand before a judicial tribunal. These steps formed the iron wedge which made the only entrance into the stronghold of the ring, and by which it was riven, and at length broken into fragments. He also bore a most important part in the impeachment of Judge Barnard, and at a critical juncture saved it from defeat. In the interest of this great work Mr. Tilden relinquished all his professional and private business for a year and a half, with a large income, giving up all his time to incessant and earnest labor.

GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

The rascality of the Tweed Ring was only a gigantic development of a spirit which was permeating society at that time in other States and in the national capital. Gangs of schemers were to be found wherever there was public money, engaged in attempts at plunder. Such a man as Mr. Tilden was the public need of the day. The financial scandals of General Grant's second term showed that it was not sufficient to put an honest man in office. The plunderers would hoodwink him and compromise him if they could. What was needed was a man not only incorruptible, but shrewd and vigilant. The people were aware of the fact, and it was therefore not surprising that the man who had crushed the Tweed Ring should receive the nomination for the governorship of New York. Mr. Tilden was elected in 1874 by a majority of 50,317 over General Dix. He immediately commenced a careful scrutiny of every department of the State Government. He speedily discovered that a ring held control of the canals, and were manipulating the revenues for their private advantage. The Legislature was promptly summoned, and the facts exposed in a masterly document, which could not be confuted or ignored. The Canal Ring fell as the Tweed Ring had fallen, and Mr. Tilden's fame spread through the nation.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE.

His honors were thick upon him when the National Democratic Convention met in St. Louis in 1876. He was nominated on the second ballot, and his chief competitor, the late Thomas A. Hendricks, accepted the second place on the ticket. The result is still fresh in the memory of our readers. Mr. Tilden carried New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana in the North, and it was an undisputed fact that he had 184 votes in the Electoral College. The returns showed that he had 196 votes, or 11 more than were necessary to elect him; but the returns were disputed, and the special tribunal appointed to decide being composed of eight Republicans and seven Democrats, declared, by a strict party vote, that Rutherford B. Hayes was elected President by a majority of one in the Electoral College. Every one can remember the excitement, the indignation which were aroused in the country. A word from Mr. Tilden then would have kindled it into flame, but it was not spoken. Though he and his party were convinced that he was fairly elected, Mr. Hayes was peacefully inaugurated, and Mr. Tilden submitted to what he believed to be a wrong.

The nine years that have passed since then have been years of peaceful and scholarly retirement. At his magnificent residence of Greystone (a picture of which appears on the first page, for which we are indebted to the kindness of the publishers of the Daily Graphic), and at his house in Gramercy Park, New York City, Mr. Tilden lived surrounded by his books and his pictures. Some of his relatives were constantly with him, and the men who succeeded him as leaders of his party resorted to him for counsel. He might have secured the Democratic nomination for the Presidency in 1880, and again in 1884, but he declined it in advance, feeling that age and physical infirmities disqualified him for the gigantic tasks which he was convinced a Democratic President ought to undertake.

BEQUEST TO THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Tilden never married. Since his death vague rumors of an early disappointment in love have been circulated, and a lady still living is mentioned who, it is said, won the heart of the statesman in his youth, but was unable to return his affection. Mr. Tilden remained constant to this early but hopeless attachment, and never asked any other lady to become his wife. At his death Mr. Tilden's property was worth about five million dollars. Certain sums, amounting in all to about one million, he directs by his will shall be set aside to provide an income for his sister and his nephews and nieces, the principal at their death to revert to the estate. The whole estate he leaves to three trustees, who were his intimate friends, to be used at their discretion for the public good. Mr. Tilden directs them to expend part of it in founding a free library at his native place—New Lebanon—and another at Yonkers, in the neighborhood of which Greystone is situated. He suggests that the remainder shall be used in founding a free library in New York, but leaves the question to the discretion of his trustees.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Little Girl's Definition.—Mr. King said at a recent meeting: "A little girl whose father had just signed the pledge was playing on the street with some other children, and shouting as loudly as she could, 'My father has joined the teetotalers, my father has joined the teetotalers.' She was calling in such a way as to attract the attention of a number of men who were passing, and one of them stepping forward, held the child by the arm, and said, 'Child, what do you mean by teetotal?' 'Please, sir,' said the little girl, 'it means that I shall always have something to eat now.'"

Safe on a Rock.—Mr. Wight observed: "A Christian lady was dying; she had almost reached the border land of heaven, when a Christian friend came in to see her. She was past recognizing him, but he bent over her and said, 'Dear sister, you are fast sinking.' She made no response, and again he said in a louder voice, 'Dear sister, you are fast sinking.' A third time he repeated these words, when she slowly opened her eyes, and said, 'Did you ever hear of any one sinking through a rock? For I am a sinner trusting in the Rock, Christ Jesus, and on that Rock my feet are firmly planted.' Would that many more had the simple faith and beautiful confidence of this child of God, who so fearlessly passed through the valley of the shadow of death!"

Made Rich through Great Loss.—Mr. M'Keith related: "The other night in my meeting one of the workers, a man well on in years, came to bid me good-by, for we were leaving the district. He had been working with great earnestness all the week, and I said, 'Do you always work with as much energy in the inquiry meeting as I have noticed you do this week?' 'I always do what I can,' he replied. 'How long is it since you have been in the work?' I asked. 'It is just three years since I gave myself up to the service of Christ; I did not know Him before that.' And then I asked him to tell me about his conversion, and he said, 'About three years ago my wife and I were careless, godless people, trampling on His commandments and giving no heed to His Word, but living just to please ourselves. But God Himself began to deal with us in a strange way. He took one of our children, then a second, then a third, and a fourth from us. When we had buried the fourth we sat, sad and lonely, mourning over our hard lot, and I said, 'Let us go out and try and get some comfort.' We wandered up one street and down another, and were turning to go home, when we passed a band of Christian friends singing at the corner of a street. One of them stepped over and invited us into the church, and after some urgent pressing we entered. At the close of the meeting we yielded ourselves to Christ. The good seed had been sown, and we were only too willing to do so. That night we went home rejoicing that although He had taken away our children, He had given us Himself."

A Rich Mean Son.—At a Recent Meeting the Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "There was a man I knew who was an elder of a church. A brother elder told me that once he asked him if he would take money to a poor woman, as he himself could not find time; and his reply was, 'No, I would rather not; I do not like to go to that woman; she always talks to me about my mother.' Oh, the mean man; it was because he had risen in the world, and his mother had been only a laundress! But the church had very soon more reason to be ashamed of him. It had to pay down a large sum of money for the embezzlements of that man who was ashamed of his humble though honest mother. He had neglected to carry out the ancient commandment of the Lord, 'Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.'"

The Marked Testament.—Mr. Calder said: "A young man went to a friend who had often helped him in his trouble, and said to him, 'There is a young girl, a friend of mine, for whom I am exceedingly sorry. Both her parents are addicted to strong drink, and their only daughter is almost distracted, for she does not know to whom to turn for help; for she has not yet heard that blessed One say, 'Come unto Me.' 'I will tell you what to do,' replied his friend; 'instead of writing her a long letter of sympathy, buy a New Testament, and carefully mark all the passages which speak of God's love, and send it to her.' The young man took his friend's advice, and some time afterward he received a beautiful letter from the once almost broken-hearted girl, thanking him for the New Testament, and especially for the passages which he had marked. 'For,' she said, 'through them I have found rest in that great Saviour who loved me and gave Himself for me.'"

A Cure for Heart-Break.—A Worker Related that a wealthy merchant had an only son, for whom he toiled and slaved. His boy would be rich and enjoy all the power money can give. But death came and claimed the object of so many fond schemes. The father was heart-broken. He refused to be comforted. His minister visited him, and was greeted with, "You preach, sir, that God is a God of love. If He is, how can He take my boy from me?" The good man replied with a little parable: "A shepherd who loves his sheep builds comfortable folds for them, and furnishes them with everything needful. When all is ready he seeks to bring them in; but to his astonishment they will not come. He endeavors by many a plan to persuade them, till at last he takes a lamb out of the flock and carries it in. Then the parent sheep follows. So, my friend," the minister went on to say, "God made ready a glorious home for you, and asked you to enter it; but you would not. All pleadings fell unheeded on your world-stopped ears. Now He has taken your child to heaven, that you may follow him thither. Will you?" His eyes were fixed upon the minister; without another word both knelt to pray. When they rose from their knees the light of peace had fallen upon the face of the broken-hearted father.

THE NONDESCRIPTS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Last Sunday, Aug. 15, 1886.

"Other sheep I have which are not of this fold."
—JOHN 10: 16.

Classified Christians—Boys in a Lame Man's Orchard—A Scattered Flock of Sheep in Scotland—Various Folds—The Good Shepherd Finding his Sheep—I. Among Non-Churchgoers—Churches Like Skeleton Leaves—Like an Armory—Mr. Ancient and the Wrecked Atlantic—II. Among Rejecters of Religion—An Experiment Invited—Testimony of Laymen—The Desert of Doubt—III. Among the Victims of Evil Habit—The Limit of Hope—A Dying Nobleman's Lament.

THERE is no monopoly in religion. The grace of God is not a little property that we may fence off and have all to ourselves. It is not a king's park at which we look through a barred gateway, wishing that we might go in and see the deer and the statuary, and pluck the flowers and the fruits in the royal conservatory. No, it is the Father's orchard, and everywhere there are bars that we may let down and gates that we may swing open.

In my boyhood, next to the country school-house, there was an orchard of apples, owned by a very lame man, who, although there were apples in the place perpetually decaying and by scores and scores of bushels, never would allow any of us to touch the fruit. One day, in the sinfulness of a nature inherited from our first parents, who were ruined by the same temptation, some of us invaded that orchard; but soon retreated, for the man came after us at a speed reckless of making his lameness worse, and cried out: "Boys, drop those apples, or I'll set the dog on you!"

Well, my friends, there are Christian men who have the Church under severe guard. There is fruit in this orchard for the whole world, but they have a way of accosting outsiders, as though they had no business here, though the Lord wants them all to come and take the largest and the ripest fruit on the premises. Have you an idea that because you were baptized at thirteen months of age, and because you have all your life been under hallowed influences, that therefore you have a right to one whole side of the Lord's table, spreading yourself out and taking up the entire room? I tell you no. You will have to haul in your elbows, for I shall to-day place on either side of you those whom you never expected would sit there; for, as Christ said to the Jews long ago, so He says to you and to me: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

MacDonald, the Scotchman, has four or five dozen head of sheep. Some of them are browsing on the heather, some of them are lying down under the trees, some of them are in his yard; they are scattered around in eight or ten different places. Cameron, his neighbor, comes over and says: "I see you have thirty sheep; I have just counted them." "No," says MacDonald, "I have a great many more sheep than that. Some are here and some are elsewhere. They are scattered all around about. I have four or five thousand in my flocks. Other sheep I have, which are not in this fold."

MANY FOLDS.

So Christ says to us: Here is a knot of Christians and there is a knot of Christians, but they make up a small part of the flock. Here is the Episcopal fold, the Methodist fold, the Lutheran fold, the Congregational fold, the Presbyterian fold, the Baptist and the Pedo-Baptist fold—the only difference between these last two being the mode of sheep-washing; and so they are scattered all over, and we come with our statistics, and say there are so many thousand of the Lord's sheep; but Christ responds: "No, no; you have not seen more than one out of a thousand of My flock. They are scattered all over the earth, and 'other sheep I have, which are not of this fold.'"

Christ in my text was prophesying the conversion of the Gentiles with as much confidence as though they were already converted, and He is to-day, in the words of my text, prophesying the coming of a great multitude of outsiders that you never supposed would come in, saying to you and saying to me: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

I. In the first place I remark, that the heavenly Shepherd will find many of His sheep

AMID THE NON CHURCH-GOERS.

There are congregations where they are all Christians, and they seem to be completely finished, and they remind one of the skeleton leaves which by chemical preparation, have had all the greenness and verdure taken off of them and are left cold and white and delicate, nothing wanting but a glass-case to put over them. The minister of Christ has nothing to do with such Christians but to come once a week, and with ostrich feather dust off the accumulation of the last six days, leaving them bright and crystalline as before. But the other kind of a church is an armory with perpetual sound of drum and fife, gathering recruits for the Lord of hosts. We say to every applicant: "Do you want to be on God's side, the safe side and the happy side; If so, come in the armory and get equipped. Here is a bath in which to get cleansed. Here are sandals to put upon your feet. Here is a helmet for your brow. Here is a breastplate for your heart. Here is a sword for your right arm, and yonder is the battlefield. Quit yourselves like men."

There are some here who say: "I stopped going to church ten or twenty years ago." My brother, is it not strange that you should be the first man I should talk to to-day? I know all your case; I know it very well. You have not been accustomed to come into religious assembly, but I have to make to you. You are going to become one of the Lord's sheep. "Oh!" you say, "it is impossible; you don't know how far I am from anything of that kind." I know all about it. I have wandered up and down the world, and I understand your case. People of God, pray for that man! "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

When the Atlantic went to pieces on Mars Rock and the people clambered up on the beach, why did not that heroic minister of the Gospel of whom we have all read sit down and take care of those men on the beach, wrapping them in flannels, kindling fire for them, seeing that they got plenty of food? Ah, he knew that there were others who would do that! He says: "Yonder are men and women freezing in the rigging of that wreck. Boys, launch the boat!" And now I see the oar-blades bend under the strong pull; but before they reached the rigging a woman was frozen and dead. She was washed off, poor thing! But he says: "There is a man to save;" and he cries out: "Hold on five minutes longer and I will save you. Steady! Steady! Give me your hand. Leap into the life-boat. Thank God, he is saved!" So there are those here to-day who are safe on the shore of God's mercy, but I see there are some who are freezing in the rigging of sin, and surrounded by perilous storms. Pull away, my lads! Let us reach them. Alas, one is washed off and gone! There is one more to be saved. Let us push out for that one. "Clutch the rope, oh dying man! Clutch it as with a death-grip. Steady now on the slippery places. Steady! There! Saved! Saved!" Just as I thought. For Christ has declared that there are some still in the breakers who shall come ashore. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

Christ commands His

and when I go fishing I do not want to go among other churches but into the wide world; not sitting along a small creek where eight or ten other persons are sitting with hook and line, but, like the fishermen of Newfoundland, sailing off and dropping net away outside forty or fifty miles from shore. Yes, there are non-churchgoers here who will come in. Next Sabbath they will again be in the religious service. They are this moment being swept into Christian associations. Their voice will be heard in public prayer. They will die in peace, their bed surrounded by Christian sympathies, and be carried out by devout men to be buried, and on their grave be chiselled the words: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." And on Resurrection day you will get up with the dear children you have already buried, and with your Christian parents who have already won the palm. And all that grand and glorious history begins now. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

II. I remark again, the heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many of His sheep among those who are positive

REJECTERS OF CHRISTIANITY.

I do not know how you came to reject Christianity. It may have been through hearing Theodore Parker preach, or through reading Renan's "Life of Jesus," or through the infidel talk of some young man in your store. It may have been through the trickery of some professed Christian man who disgusted you with religion. I do not ask you how you became so; but you frankly tell me that you do reject it. You do not believe that Christ is a divine being, although you admit that He was a very good man. You do not believe that the Bible was inspired of God, although you think that there are some very fine things in it. You believe that the scriptural description of Eden was only an allegory. There are fifty things that I believe that you do not believe. And yet you are

AN ACCOMMODATING MAN.

Everybody that knows you says that of you. If I should ask you to do a kindness for me, or if any one else should ask of you a kindness, you would do it. Now I have a kindness to ask of you to-day. It is something that will cost you nothing and will give me great delight. I want you to experiment to try the power of Christ's religion. If I should come to you, and you were very sick, and doctors had given you up and said there was no chance for you, and I should take out a little bottle and say: "Here is a medicine that will cure you; it has cured fifty people, and it will cure you," you would say, "I have no confidence in it." I would say, "Won't you take it to oblige me?" "Well," you would say, "if it's any accommodation to you I'll take it." My friend, will you be just as accommodating in matters of religion? There are some of you who have found out that this world cannot satisfy your soul. You are like the man who told me after the service was over:

"I HAVE TRIED THIS WORLD and found it an insufficient portion. Tell me of something better." You have come to that. You are sick for the need of divine medicament. Now I come and tell you of a Physician who will cure you, who has cured hundreds and hundreds who were sick as you are. "Oh," you say, "I have no confidence in Him!" But will you not try Him? Accommodate me in this matter; oblige me in this matter; just try Him. I am very certain He will cure you. You reply: "I have no special confidence in Him; but if you ask me as a matter of accommodation, introduce Him." So I introduce Him—Christ, the Physician who has cured more blind eyes and healed more ghastly wounds and bound up more broken hearts than all the doctors since the time of Æsculapius.

That divine Physician is here. Are you not ready to try him? Will you not as a pure matter of experiment before Him now? Hold nothing back from Him. If you cannot pray, if you do not know how to pray any other way, say: "O Lord Jesus Christ, this is a strange thing for me to do! I know nothing about the formulas of religion. These Christian people have been talking so long about what Thou canst do for me. I am ready to do whatever Thou commandest me to do. I am ready to take whatever Thou commandest me to take. If there be any power in religion, as these people say, let me have the advantage of it."

STATE YOUR CASE

Will you try that experiment? I do not at this point of my discourse say that there is anything in religion; but I simply say, try it—try it. Do not take my counsel or the counsel of any clergyman, if you despise clergymen. Perhaps we may be talking professionally; perhaps we may be prejudiced in the matter; perhaps we may be hypocritical in our utterances; perhaps our advice is not worth taking. Then take the counsel of some very

RESPECTABLE LAYMEN

—as John Milton, the poet; as William Wilberforce, the statesman; as Isaac Newton, the astronomer; as Robert Boyle, the philosopher; as Locke, the metaphysician. They never preached or pretended to preach, and yet putting down, one his telescope, and another his parliamentary scroll, and another his electrician's wire, they all declare the adaptedness of Christ's religion to the wants and troubles of the world. If you will not take the recommendation of ministers of the Gospel, then take the recommendation of highly respectable laymen.

Oh, men sceptical, and struck through with unrest! would you not like to have some of the peace which broods over our souls to-day? I know all about your doubts. I have been through them all. I have gone through all the curriculum.

I HAVE DOUBTED

whether there is a God, whether Christ is God. I have doubted whether the Bible was true. I have doubted the immortality of the soul. I have doubted my own existence. I have doubted everything; and yet, out of that hot desert of doubt, I have come into the broad, luxuriant, sunshiny land of Gospel hope and peace and comfort; so I have confidence in preaching to you and asking you to come in. However often you may have spoken against the Bible, or however much you may have caricatured religion, step ashore from that rocking and tumultuous sea. If you go away adhering to your infidelities, you will not sleep one wink to-night. You do not want your children to come up with your scepticism. You cannot afford to die in that midnight darkness, can you? If you do not believe in anything else you believe in love—a father's love, a mother's love, a wife's love, a child's love. Then let me tell you that God loves you more than them all. Oh, you must come in! You will come in! The great heart of Christ aches to have you come in, and Jesus this very moment—whether you sit or stand—looks into your eyes and says: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

III. Again I remark, that the heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many sheep among those who have been

FLUNG OF EVIL HABIT.

It makes me mad to see Christian people give up a prodigal as lost. There are those who talk as though the grace of God were a chain of forty or fifty links, and after they had run out there was nothing to touch a very bad case. If they were hunting and got off the track of the deer, they would look longer among the banks and the bushes for the lost game than they have been looking for that lost soul.

People tell us that if a man has delirium tremens twice, that he cannot be reclaimed; that after a woman has fallen from her integrity she cannot be restored. The Bible has distinctly intimated that the Lord Almighty is ready to pardon four hundred and ninety times; that is, seventy times seven. There are men before the throne of God who have wallowed in every kind of sin; but, saved by the grace of Jesus and washed in His blood, they stand there radiant now. There are those who plunged in the very lowest hell of abomination, who for the tenth time have been lifted up, and, finally, by the grace of God, they stand in heaven gloriously rescued by the grace promised to the chief of sinners.

I want to tell you that God loves to take hold of a very bad case. When and when the club-room casts you off, and when society casts you off, and when business associates cast you off, and when father casts you off, and when mother casts you off, and when everybody casts you off, your first cry for help will send the Eternal God clean down into the ditch of your suffering and shame. The Good Templars cannot save you, although they are a grand institution. The Sons of Temperance cannot save you, although they are mighty for good. Signing the temperance pledge cannot save you, although I believe in it. Nothing but the grace of the Eternal God can save you, and that will if you will throw yourself on it.

A man said to me: "Unless God helps me I cannot be delivered. I have tried everything, sir; but now I have got into the habit of prayer, and when I come to a drinking saloon that God will take me safely past, and I pray until I am past. He does help me." For every man given to strong drink there are scores of traps set, and no one but the everywhere-present God can see that man through. Oh! they talk about the catacombs of Naples, and the catacombs of Rome, and the catacombs of Egypt—the burial places under the city where the dust of a great multitude lie; but I tell you New York has its catacombs, Nashville has its catacombs, and New Orleans its catacombs, and Boston its catacombs, and Philadelphia its catacombs, and every town and city neighborhood its catacombs. They are the underground restaurants, full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. Young man, you know it. God help you!

There is no need of going into the art gallery to see in skilful sculpture that wonderful representation of a man and his sons wound around with serpents. There are families represented in this audience that are wrapped in the martyrdom of fang and scale and venom—a living Laocoon of ghastliness and horror. What are you to do? Do not put your trust in bromide of potassium, or in Jamaica ginger, or anything else that apothecaries can mix. Put your trust only in the Eternal God, and He will see you through. Some of you do not have temptation every day. It is a that comes every six weeks, or every three months, when it seems as if the powers of darkness kindle around about your tongue the fires of the pit. It is well enough at such a time, as some of you do, to seek medical counsel; but your first and most importunate cry must be to God. If the fiends will drag you to the slaughter, make them do it on your knees. Oh, God! now that the paroxysm of thirst is coming again upon that man, help him. Fling back into the pit of hell the fiend that assaults his soul this moment. Oh, my heart aches to see men go on in this fearful struggle without Christ! There are here those whose hands so tremble from dissipation that they can hardly hold a book; and yet I have to tell you that they will yet preach the Gospel, and on communion days carry around the consecrated bread, acceptable to everybody, because of their holy life and their consecrated behavior. The Lord is going to save you. Your home has got to be rebuilt. Your physical health has got to be restored. Your worldly business has got to be reconstructed. The church of God is going to rejoice over your discipleship. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

While I have hope for all prodigals there are some people for whom I am not so hopeful. I mean those who have been church-goers all their lives, who have maintained outward morality, but who, notwithstanding twenty, thirty, forty years of Christian advantages, have never yielded their hearts to Christ. They are

THE GOSPEL-HARDENED.

A sermon has no more effect upon them than the shining of the moon on the city pavement,

As Christ says: "The publicans and harlots will go into the kingdom of God before them." They have resisted all the importunities of divine mercy, and have gone, during these thirty years, through most powerful earthquakes of religious feeling, and from God than ever. After awhile they will lie down sick, and some day it will be told they are dead. No hope! But I turn to outsiders with a hope that thrills through my body and soul. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold." You are not Gospel-hardened. You have not heard many sermons during the last few years. As you came in to a religious meeting to-day everything was novel, and all the services are suggestive of your early days. How sweet the opening hymn sounded in your ears, and how blessed it is in this place! Everything suggestive of heaven. You sigh, and you have noticed that there is always a sigh in the wind before the rain falls. There are those here who would give anything if they could find relief in tears. They say: "Oh, my wasted life! Oh, the bitter past! Oh, the graves over which I have stumbled! Whither shall I fly? Alas for the future! Everything is dark—so dark, so dark! God help me! God pity me!"

Thank the Lord for that last utterance. You have begun to pray, and when a man begins to petition, that sets all heaven flying this way, and God steps in and beats back the hounds of temptation into the kennel, and around about the poor wounded soul puts the covert of His pardoning mercy. Hark! I hear something fall. What was that? It is the bars of the fence around the sheepfold. The shepherd lets them down, and the hunted sheep of the mountain bound in; some of them, their fleece torn with the brambles; some of them, their feet lame with the dogs; but bounding in. Thank God! "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

MR. McALL'S THANKS TO AMERICA.

THE quarterly report of the American McAll Association was issued last week, and forms exceedingly interesting and encouraging reading. It shows that the work of spreading the Gospel in France is flourishing, and that, thanks to the energy and devotion of Mrs. Mariné J. Chase, Miss Frances Lea, and their earnest coadjutors, America is rendering efficient aid to the evangelists. "Last year," says Mr. McAll, "very nearly one third of the entire income of the mission was given by American friends."

Respecting the progress of the work, Mr. McAll says: "The actual increase of attendance, as shown in our report for 1885, has been most cheering. In Paris, without addition to the number of stations or sittings, the year's aggregate increase, counting old and young, has been sixty-one thousand, that in the entire mission eighty-five thousand. It is, indeed, still the sowing time here; we are daily coming in contact with people who never before in their lives heard the Gospel, and there remains even yet an immense introductory work to be achieved in dissipating widespread and almost national misconceptions of and prejudices against the Gospel. But we now see around us, as the fruit of years of toil and watching, Christian lives, Christian families, and Christian workers. And, while our fraternal societies tend much to the religious culture of the new converts, we rejoice to see many of them, both in Paris and in the provinces, uniting with the surrounding French churches.

"The large proportion of men to be seen in many of our rooms, together with the fixed attention accorded to the directest utterances respecting man's fallen state and salvation by the death of Christ, resistlessly proclaim that a deep want of the soul is coming to be widely felt, a want which sophisms and Nihilism are found to be unable to supply."

The quarterly report is a pamphlet of seventy two pages. It may be obtained for five cents from Mrs. Chase, 1622 Locust Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

MILITARY PIONEERS OF THE CHURCH.

THE flourishing Christian work now in progress in California radiating from the centre of St. Paul's Church, Benicia, is the subject of a lengthy report published in this month's Spirit of Missions. The Right Rev. Dr. Wingfield, Missionary Bishop of Northern California, has now, it appears, taken charge of the work, and has thrown into it the tremendous energy for which he is famous. The church building has been enlarged for the fifth time, and an attractive and commodious edifice has been erected for Sunday-school purposes. The latter has nearly one thousand pupils, of whom nearly three hundred have made profession of faith in Christ. Connected with the church is St. Mary's Hall in which a large number of girls are receiving a religious education, and St. Augustine College in which boys are trained for Christian service.

The most remarkable feature about this valuable institution is that it had its origin in the efforts of two officers of the United States Army. There were no religious services in Benicia prior to 1854, but in that year among the troops sent there on frontier duty was an earnest Christian officer, Captain E. D. Townsend, who was deeply concerned by the spiritual destitution prevailing. No clerical help was obtainable, so Captain Townsend applied for and received the sanction of the Protestant Episcopal Church to hold services as a lay reader. On November 24th, 1854, he held his first service in the court-room, and continued to hold them as long as his regiment remained there. When the regiment was removed it seemed as if the means of grace must cease, but the providence of God ordered it otherwise. In the regiment that succeeded it was another Christian officer, Captain J. McAllister, who, hearing what his brother officer had been doing, promptly took hold of the work and carried it forward until it became so important that the Rev. D. F. McDonald was assigned to regular duty there, and the first modest church building was raised.

TRANSMITTED FAMILY TRAITS.

A REMARKABLE and suggestive fact has been observed by President I. F. Cox, of La Grange, Ga., who has been for thirty years at the head of one of the most famous colleges for ladies in the country. It confirms the belief observant philosophers have long held in the power of heredity. Christian parents cannot pay too much heed to it, for if they have self-knowledge they will know what are the temptations that will have most power over their children, and what are the sins to which they will be prone (Prov. 22 : 6).

In company with President Cox a reporter of the Atlanta Constitution recently went through the college and entered the chapel-room, while it was yet in the early morning. The stage was crowded with young girls, practising their graduation music. They were all dressed in the simplest of muslins; some with Shaker bonnets, and others with no headgear at all. One demure little maiden at the piano was possessed of clear-cut Grecian features. "She is a Georgian, though," suggested President Cox, "and prettier girls than live in Georgia were never seen." President Cox has seen in his thirty years' experience there his pupils graduate, receive the congratulations of their admirers on Commencement night, and then drop out of college life, only to be struck a few years later with the remarkably familiar features of some new scholar, who came, perhaps, from Texas or from Arkansas.

"I often forget myself," said President Cox, "and call them by names which were familiar to me years before. They are the daughters of those who had gone out from under my control, and are sent here by their mothers to run the same course. It is wonderful to see, not only the transmission of form, figure, and expression, but the similarity of acquired habit which passes from mother to daughter." Many incidents related were of a striking character. Not only were these daughters so much resembling their mothers that the Commencement of fifteen years ago seemed like a dream, but attachments sprung up between the daughters of mothers who had been similarly devoted to each other. The standing of the scholars, too, was something remarkable. The written record, for instance, of almost any given scholar, might be placed against the written record for the corresponding year of the mother's school life, and they would be found to be practically identical.

AN INDIAN YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

AT the recent Y. M. C. A. Convention of Minnesota and Dakota held at St. Paul, Minn., a Dakota Indian delegate described how the first Indian branch was organized. It is a most significant fact that while wholly in the dark about the constitution of such societies and their methods of work, they had an instinctive idea of, or rather were divinely guided to, the best source of light. The delegate's speech is thus reported in the American Missionary:

"About eight years ago some young men wished to have a Young Men's Christian Association, and asked me what I knew about it. I told them that I knew nothing of the constitution or methods of the Young Men's Christian Associations, so they did nothing at that time. But three or four months later they again spoke of it, yet we knew not how to make a constitution. But they said we will have a Young Men's Christian Association. Then we had a meeting and talked it over. And they agreed that even though they did not have the Y. M. C. A. constitution and rules to go by, they would work according to the words of Jesus, and would seek out the ways in which young men might benefit each other, and they would bring into meeting any who did not attend, and would make contributions to carry the Gospel to the wild Indians.

"This was the beginning of our Young Men's Christian Association. It was made without any constitution, but was made upon the rules of Jesus. Therefore we remember one of His words, 'Abide in Me and I will abide in you.' The branch cannot bear fruit unless it is united to the vine." Upon this our Young Men's Association made its first growth. Their desire has seemed to be, to keep with Jesus. Therefore, my friends, remember us, so that much fruit may grow among us to the glory of God our Father."

ASTONISHING FIGURES.

A BUSINESS man of New York who seems to have a genius for figures has been at some pains to tabulate the results of the work in which the great Bible and Tract Societies of America and England are engaged. Following are a few of the totals which his calculations have furnished.

The receipts of the American Bible Society last year were $523,910, and of the British and Foreign Bible Society were worth $1,156,196, a total of $1,680,106. The total issues of the American Society last year were 1,437,440 and of the British Society 4,123,904. The total of the two societies 5,561,344. The British and Foreign Bible Society was established in 1804, and the American Bible Society in 1816. During their entire history to the close of last year the two societies have received $71,639,682, and their total number of issues of copies of the Word of God 155,198,515.

Add to these figures those furnished by the tract societies of the two lands which are working hand in hand with the Bible societies in the cause of Christ, through the mighty engine of the printing-press and the result is prodigious. The London Religious Tract Society was established in 1799 and the American Tract Society in 1825. The two societies together have in their subsequent history produced a quantity of religious literature equivalent to the quantity that would be needed to supply every man, woman, and child on the face of the earth today with a two-page tract. The receipts of the tract societies and Bible societies combined have been over $112,000,000.

These figures indicate that in spite of scurrilous attacks on the Bible which are made by infidels; in spite of the sneers and insidious depreciation of sceptical scholars, the Church of the nineteenth century has lost no jot of its faith in the Bible, and has given practical proof by its money gifts that it still believes in it as the message of God to a lost world.

RELIGION IN THE LIFE.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

YOU may take the Presbyterian, the Methodist, the Baptist, the Christian, the Catholic, and all the books, and they all agree on these three propositions, brethren, that salvation means deliverance from the guilt of sin, and from the dominion of sin, and from the love of sin. Is not that so? Does not every book define it that way? Salvation means deliverance from the guilt and the dominion and the love of sin; and no man is safe in the Gospel sense until he is saved in this threefold way. That is it. The purity of the Christian character.

I will tell you how we work it. You cannot go into sin without cost and fearful risk. It is dangerous, brother. Here I illustrate the point. A man is sitting on the top of a large five-story building; he is sitting on the comb of the roof, and I see him whittling with a penknife; and all at once the penknife slips out of his hand and slides right down to the edge of the building. He sits there and looks at it, and says, "I wish I had that little knife." But something says to him it is only worth a half dollar; that is all it cost. Well, he thinks, "I know that it is not worth much, but I would like to have it; I believe I will go down to try to get it." And something says that it is very dangerous, indeed; and it is risking too much for too little. Ah, but he says, "Other people have gone that close to the edge of buildings and did not fall off; I will try it;" and he walks and slips right down; he eases himself until he gets to the edge of the building, grasps the knife, and his hold slips and he is crushed into jelly on the walk below. But he got the knife. He got the knife. Many a time a girl, or boy, or man, or woman has been introduced into some place where God disapproved. They have said, "I'll risk it," and gone in, and are lost forever.

There is an imperviousness to sin in the character of a man who is born of God. If a man told me this morning that Brother McConnell came last night to his room, and stole his watch and ran away with it, I could not believe it. I would say, Brother McConnell cannot steal your watch; it is against his purpose,

AGAINST HIS WAY OF LIFE;

I know he did not do it. If I see a train on the Vandalia line running to St. Louis and a man tells me she is going to Indianapolis, I say she can't go to Indianapolis. She's going full tilt the other way. That man can't go wrong. Why? Because he is going right. He cannot sin because he is born of God. There is the idea of preoccupation.

There is Job standing there. Here is the devil appearing before God. The devil looked at Job—that deceived Adam—and said: "Let me take his property away from him and he will curse you." God said: "Take everything away from him, but keep your hands off him." When a message came to Job that his sheep and cattle and camels were destroyed, and one piece of property and another, and at last a message that his children were dead, dear old Job said, when the last prop was knocked from him, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord" (Job 1 : 21). I imagine the devil said, "Why, Adam fell at the first temptation, but here Job stands, secure, when the last earthly prop is taken from him." Then the devil said to the Lord, "If you will let me afflict his body and his health he will curse you to your face." The Lord said, "I can bank on Job, take everything he has on earth, except the breath of his nostrils."

THE SAME DEVIL

The devil went to work on Job, and the next thing we read that became of Job, he was afflicted from head to foot. He lay in the ash heap, and scraped himself with a potsherd. His wife walked up and said, "Job, your body is a mass of putrefaction. Curse God and die." Job looked up and said: "Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in Him" (Job 13: 15). And the devil stood and gazed, and said: "Wonder of wonders! There he is, with every earthly prop swept away, yet he says glory to God, and is more loyal to Him than he was in his prosperity." The devil got Job's friends and they turned loose on his character, the immortal part of him, and at last Job stands up in the sublimity of his strength and says, "I have maintained my integrity. I have not done wrong." Then God stepped on the scene and called Job out and He took Job out and made his latter days more blessed than his former. I tell you, brethren, that if you stand up for God Almighty He will stand up for you.

Thank God for

in this world. And I want to say to you this: If I was a young man I would want religion. If I was an old man I would want it. If I was rich I would want religion. If I was poor I would want religion. If I was sick I would want religion. If I was well I would want religion. If I was living I would want religion. If I was dying I would want religion. If I was in heaven I would want religion. If I was in hell I would want the blessed peace that the Gospel of the Son of God can give. There is religion.

"It is religion that can give sweetest pleasure while we live;

It is religion must supply solid comfort when we die."

As long as the star of hope shines over my pathway then all you need to do is to tell me my duty. Tell me what I ought to do and how to do it, and I am in with you with all my might. Tell me to pray in my family—all right. Thank God for the privilege. Tell me to attend upon the openings of the church—thank God. Open the church and ring the bell. You will always find me present. Tell me I must visit the sick—glory be to God, that is a great privilege. I will go see them. Tell me I must help the poor—I will divide my last dollar with them and then I will give them the half that I kept if they need it worse than I do. Anything, O God,

ANYTHING WILL BEAT GOING TO HELL.

Anything in the universe is nothing compared with heaven. Now, Lord, speak, and I will hear; and if heaven is to be obtained upon Thy conditions, let me know what they are, O Lord, and I will fill them, the best a poor fellow like I am can fulfil the conditions of God. That is it. I see people shirking their duty and hiding out from responsibility. Brother, I cannot help it. I am going to take every chance to do good in the world and to do everything that helps everybody else. I am going to adopt that in my platform. That shall be one of the until God says "It is enough, come up higher." Oh, I cannot understand how people on the way to heaven want to shirk religious duties and religious responsibilities. Oh, my brother, let me beg you to-night whatever God tells you to do, that thing lies between you and heaven. Pick it up and go along with it and say, "Lord, help me to bear, help me to do, help me to suffer Thy will in all things."

St. Paul, right on this line, said: "I will throw aside every weight; I will lay down everything that hinders the soul; and I reach the point where if my coat gets in the way, off with it; if my shoes are in the way, off with them; if my hat is in the way, off with it; I will run into the streets of God bareheaded, coatless and shoeless if that is necessary to make the gates in safety. That is the language of a man in earnest. And I will tell you, brother, the angels of God look over the parapet of heaven and watch with increasing interest the soul that is running with all its ransomed powers to make the city of God in safety and peace, and make their future home in heaven forever. Will you start out to-night? Take up your cross. Do your duty, be faithful to God. Be faithful to right, brother, and some day we will get to heaven. Religion is the best thing on earth, and there is nothing in heaven better than religion. Gracious Father, give us the peace of the Gospel to be our heritage.

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

By Rev. E. Cornwell.

The Prophetic Import of our Time—A Photographic Resemblance—The Culminating Period—Three Signs—Two Characteristics of our Time—The Decline of the Papacy—Approaching Interposition of Christ.

IT is not one great public change, nor any remarkable public events, by themselves, which stamp the special character of awful importance or prophetic import on our time, so much as the singular and simultaneous combinations of the changes and events which are now passing before us. Neither is it these by themselves which constitute the emphatic crisis of our time, though these combinations are indeed adapted to awaken and astonish the world; but it is the extraordinary—almost photographic resemblance—once and again seen—between these concurrent great changes and events before us, and the signs predicted by the ancient prophets, and especially of those announced by Jesus Christ, which were to precede immediately the awful close both of the Jewish and of the Christian dispensation and the opening grandeur of the coming one. It is this marvellous correspondence, widening and intensifying from year to year, which is evidently designed to arrest our deepest attention to the urgent inquiries—Are we, or are we not, living in the great era predicted and designated by Daniel—"The time of the end?" And are not these changes and events now simultaneously occurring, the heaven-appointed signs of still more awful and rapidly approaching revolutions—judgments—glories?

It is the extreme probability, yea, certainty of this being the case which invests the period wherein we live with a thrilling importance to each of us.

By a reference to the last chapter of the Prophet Daniel, it will be seen that the expression, "Time of the end," once and again repeated, is of this dispensation, when a flood of light will be poured on the prophetic Scriptures, which, up to that time, will have been comparatively veiled, even to the Church of God. For what other can be the import of the expressions—"The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end."

Let us then inquire, What are some of the clearly-predicted signs of "the time of the end," by which we may ascertain, beyond a doubt, whether or not we have arrived at this grand decisive period. Let us consider each of them of colossal magnitude, which are distinguished by the Spirit of God, in the prophecy of Daniel, from several others, seeing that from their great prominence they must be distinctly and universally known when they appear. These are now patent to the whole world.

Two of these three special signs, which have already for many years, as facts, arrested the minds and excited the astonishment of all, are thus described by the angel to Daniel: "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book, even to 'the time of the end'" (at which time); "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." In other words, when a period has actually begun which shall be distinguished above all preceding eras for the rapid travelling to and fro of vast multitudes, and for the no less speedy diffusion of knowledge, both natural and spiritual, over the world, then know that that period has come—"the time of the end." These prophetic words have indeed been amply fulfilled during the present century. Never before have they been accomplished on so mighty a scale and with such marvellous rapidity over the world.

But while these predicted signs show to all that we are living in the "time of the end," the following sign shows no less clearly that the exact period when that time actually arrived was of the true Church of God from her lengthened obscurity, sufferings, and depression, and the sudden commencing descent of Roman Catholic political dominion or kingly power to destruction. These contemporaneous events are predicted in the closing part of the seventh chapter of Daniel, where the turning of the captivity of the Church of God is described as taking place at the very time when their long-continued oppressors are consigned by the awful sentence of the "Ancient of Days," to absolute, though progressive destruction. The same deliverance of the Church of Christ at the termination of the long period of her oppression is again predicted in the eleventh chapter of the prophecy (verse thirty-fifth) as distinctly marking the commencement of the "time of the end"—"And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge them, and to make them white, even to the time of the end."

If, then, the predicted sign of the arrival of the long-looked-for time of the end and of the commencing emancipation of the Church of Christ is most clearly declared to be the commencing destruction of Popish dominion, which was to be consumed and destroyed to the end, the decisive question at once presents itself—Has that foredoomed destruction of Popish kingly power really begun?

THE FIRST FATAL STROKE, was given to the civil power of the Pope of Rome at the French Revolution in 1792, followed, as it was, by the successful invasion of his territories, and by the taking of himself once and again a prisoner. It was the appointed death-knell of his kingly dominion, and was also the first jubilee sound that the year of commencing deliverance had come to the true Church of the Redeemer. That deadly stroke at Popish dominion was the signal of the speedy coming of a new life, new energy, and a new career of glorious prosperity to the people of the living God.

More than half a century has now elapsed since the civil dominion of the sovereign of Rome began to pass away. Have the general aspects of the cause of God during that interval corresponded in some degree to this glorious anticipation? Have they presented additional and striking evidence that we are really living in the "time of the end," and that God quickly began, after the close of the long period of His people's captivity and fearful oppression to act on a great scale, for the speedy regeneration of the Church and of the world? Undoubtedly they have. Abundant evidence may be adduced, not only to attest this marvellous change, but also to establish our confidence in the joyful expectation of the most glorious interposition of Christ ere long, for His cause and people, till at length "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and be satisfied."

He who has borne with His Church, and brought her hitherto, will not leave her at any stage of her chequered progress. He will no longer allow her to settle down in any condition resembling that almost stillness of death which characterized her condition about the commencement of the last century; nor will He much longer permit her present slumbering and sleeping Laodicean lukewarmness to continue. But He will suddenly, ere long, awaken her, like the wise and foolish virgins, by an unexpected call, to the high objects of her collective existence, to a sense of her vast privileges and responsibilities, and to what He is about to accomplish.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Action in the Matter of the New York Custom House caused general discussion last week. Mr. Hedden's resignation occasioned no surprise. The wonder was that he had been collector so long. In appointing Sterling as weigher he showed his true character, and it was evident that while the Custom House remained under his control there was constant danger of the administration being compromised by his acts. Nevertheless, his quitting the Custom House so soon after the death of his patron, Hubert O. Thompson, had a significance sure to excite comment. It was inevitable that though there might be many good reasons for a change of collector, it would be said that the change at this time was due to Mr. Thompson's death rather than Mr. Hedden's maladministration. The business part of the community, however, care little about the President's motives, but are deeply concerned in the honest and efficient administration of the Custom House. If that result is achieved by the change they will not care whether the new collector belongs to one or another section of the party. But the interest the general public take in the appointment intimately concerns the President. His selection will show whether the pledge of civil service reform which the people have not forgotten is to be observed. Mr. Daniel Magone, of Ogdensburg, who is the new collector, has the honor of Mr. Cleveland's administration in his keeping.

The State Department has Sent Mr. A. G. Sedgwick, of New York, as a special envoy to Mexico to investigate the case of the imprisoned editor, Cutting. His instructions are simply to ascertain and report to this Government the full and exact facts of the case, and he is given no diplomatic powers. His whole duty is to find out what Cutting did, what he was tried for, how he was tried, and all the circumstances surrounding the case. He has no authority to enter into negotiations with anybody in Mexico, nor to discuss with anybody there any question of law which has arisen or may come up. After he has found out all about the arrest and trial and conviction, including the records of the court, he is to report the result to the State Department, and then his mission will be ended. The peculiarity of this commission is that Mr. Bayard was supposed to know all the facts before he made the peremptory demand for the surrender of Cutting. The conviction in all parts of the country, except Texas, increases that it would be worse than folly to go to war with Mexico about Cutting. It is admitted that he broke the Mexican law by publishing his libel in Mexico though it was printed in the United States. The question of principle involved is, however, an important one, as Mexico claims the right to punish a United States citizen for a crime committed in his own country if a Mexican is a sufferer by it.

The Further Reduction in the Price of Silver has been followed by an intimation from the great mining camp of Butte City, that some curtailment in production is under consideration. If the movement should become general the depreciation in the value of the metal may be checked. It is stated by the Director of the Mint that last year the production of silver in the United States was $51,600,000, as against $48,800,000 for the year 1884, an increase of $2,800,000. Of the total production, the United States Mints used for the manufacture of "dollars" $28,697,767, or 56 per cent. There was in the country January 1st, 1886, $218,259,761 in silver dollars, of which the Treasury has, uncovered by certificates, $72,538,825 and the people hold either in coin or certificates $138,780,408. The remainder is in the national banks. The Association of American Bankers at their convention at Boston, Mass., on Friday, passed a resolution expressing their alarm at the continued coinage of silver dollars.

Destructive Forest Fires were Reported from Wisconsin last week. In the central, northern, and north-western districts the woods are on fire for miles, and several villages have narrowly escaped destruction. At De Pere the Presbyterian church was burned, and the business part of the city was in peril for some hours but was eventually saved. In Eaton township many farms have been utterly destroyed. The dead bodies of sheep and cattle lie around burned to a crisp. In some cases the families of the farmers saved their lives only by getting down into the wells. Few of the farmers had any insurance, and many are consequently completely ruined. A traveller who rode out six miles from Bellevue says that in the course of his ride he did not see a bird or any living thing.

The Indictment and Arrest of Rollin M Squire, the Commissioner of Works of New York, and Maurice B. Flynn, who is known as "the boss of the city," caused an excitement last week unprecedented since the days of the Tweed scandal. Commissioner Squire had already been summoned by the mayor to show cause why he should not be removed from office, and his cause was under investigation when the Grand Jury indicted him and Flynn. They were both arrested and held to bail in ten thousand dollars each. The Grand Jury charge them with conspiracy. It appears that in December, 1884, when Mayor Edson nominated Squire for the office he holds, there was a doubt whether the aldermen would confirm the nomination. Squire had a conference with Flynn and Thompson, and signed an agreement to run the office and make appointments and discharges as Flynn might direct, if Flynn, on his part, secured the votes of the doubtful aldermen for his confirmation. The aldermen's votes were "secured" and Squire has been in office ever since. Flynn appears to have found the arrangement profitable as long as Squire fulfilled his bargain. Later, however, they have not been on good terms and the agreement has come to light. How much the city has lost is not yet known. The penalty for the offence is a year in the penitentiary and a fine of five hundred dollars.

Lord Salisbury's Speech at the Lord Mayor's dinner on August 11th does not encourage the hope of an enlightened solution of the Irish difficulty at his hands. There would be small chance of a patient's recovery if treated by a physician who made such mistakes in his diagnosis and treatment as the British Premier made in explaining the Irish maladies. Referring to the events of the last few days, that is, the riots in Belfast, he said they "demonstrate that Ireland is not yet inhabited by a concordant and homogeneous people. It is too early to enter into details, but it is the duty of every government to devote its whole energies to freeing the loyal people of Ireland from the constraint and restraint exercised upon them, whether in the form of riot, or in the more dangerous, insidious, and effective form of outrage and intimidation." That is a remarkable lesson to draw from the riots. Unprejudiced observers would have supposed that the loyalists who have been fighting the police, sacking houses, and turning the city into a pandemonium did not need to have "the whole energies" of the Government used to free them from "constraint and restraint." They now number 190,000 while the Catholics are 50,000. If they are to be freed from the restraints which during the riots appeared to sit so lightly upon them, the scenes to which Lord Salisbury alluded will be eclipsed by a general massacre. He went on to say: "It is our duty to restore in Ireland that social order, the loss of which is the only just cause of its discontent." The whole civilized world, outside of England, is at issue with Lord Salisbury in this opinion, top. Ireland has many just causes of discontent of which the loss of social order is a result rather than a cause. It is one of the saddest omens for the future of that unhappy country that its fortunes are committed to the care of a statesman so blinded by prejudice that he mistakes the source of her misery and talks so foolishly about the remedies applicable to her disorder.

The Belfast Riots were Temporarily Checked by the troops during the middle of last week. On Monday the mobs were fighting desperately, and eleven rioters were killed and about four hundred wounded. On Tuesday the arrival of fresh regiments which replaced the police in the disturbed districts overawed the mob, and though the Orangemen succeeded in tarring a Catholic workman and another outbreak on a large scale seemed imminent, the danger passed, and order was maintained until Saturday night, when the soldiers noticed mischievous boys collecting stones as ammunition in preparation for a battle. Several boys were promptly arrested and measures were taken to suppress an outbreak. Soon after midnight fighting was reported from several quarters simultaneously, and by three o'clock on Sunday morning bullets and stones were whizzing through the air in every direction. The struggle was maintained for several hours until the Riot act was read, and the foot soldiers charged the mob and cavalry cleared the streets. Sunday night was quiet in all the districts where the soldiers were present in force, but it is not believed that the trouble is over. In some way the rioters are getting more firearms, pistol shots being more frequent on Sunday morning than at any previous time in the riots. A Protestant magistrate who has taken a prominent part in the efforts to restore order says: "I regard the Protestants as entirely in the wrong in this rioting. The Catholics have done their utmost to keep the peace and to prevent the exasperation of the Orangemen. . . . I think that if the Catholics were let alone they would not trouble the Orangemen in the least."

The Relations of the Pope and the French Government are far from cordial. The Pope has recently sent an envoy to the Chinese court and the French regard the act as a rebuff. For the last twenty-five years all the Roman Catholics in China, of whatever nationality, have been under the protectorate of France. Their numbers, constantly fluctuating, have been variously estimated, but it is probable there may be as many as two millions of them now in China. The missionaries, whether French, Italian, Spanish or Belgian, have always travelled under the protection of French passports. This circumstance has naturally given France very considerable moral influence in China, and this is now annihilated by the action of the Pope. In future the Roman Catholics will have a representative at the Chinese court in the person of the Pope's envoy, and will not require French passports. Whether the Roman Catholics will be as safe under the moral protection of the Pope as under the material protection of France remains to be seen, but as the Pope has taken the initiative in the matter there will be no difficulty in their fixing the responsibility of any loss they may sustain.

Remarkable Success is Attending the Meetings the Rev. E. P. Hammond, the children's revivalist, is holding in Norway. The latest reports say that the services in Christiana are in Mr. Hammond's opinion in some respects the most wonderful he has ever conducted. The vast hall is thronged night after night, and it seems almost impossible to disperse the congregation, so eager is their interest to hear the word of truth.

The Morning Star, the Children's Missionary ship, has a new captain, and the Young Men's Christian Association of Oakland, Cal., has a new general secretary. Captain Bray, who has commanded the missionary ship since 1878, and who did much toward arousing the interest of the public in the work and securing funds for repairs and new ships as they were needed, has resigned his command. He has accepted the appointment of Secretary of the Oakland Young Men's Christian Association, where his energy and administrative capacity will have abundant scope for exercise. The new captain of the Morning Star is Captain N. W. Turner, of San Francisco, whose seamanship and Christian character are highly commended.

Dr. Deems is Doing an Excellent Work at Greenwood Lake, N. Y., in making the branch Church of the Strangers there a permanent building. The tent has been a means of good in a place sadly in need of Gospel preaching. It is now to become a neat, substantial wooden church. Any church undergoing repairs and having discarded pews or other fittings on its hands, could materially aid in the good work by presenting them to Dr. Deems or selling them to him at a low rate.

The Murdered Minister of Sioux City whose death was mentioned in these columns last week was well known throughout Wisconsin. The Madison Prohibitionist says: "Mr. Haddock has always made himself prominent in doing hard and effective work against the saloons wherever he has been. He was once brutally assaulted in a Wisconsin town when returning home after delivering a telling temperance address. Although his two assailants were armed and knocked him down, he succeeded by the aid of his cane in putting them to flight and wrestling a revolver from one of them. Brother Haddock was a member of the church militant. Pleasant but forcible in speech, he lived up to his theories and worked as he talked. Sioux City had in him a well selected leader in their fight with liquor. His murder is but a legitimate outgrowth of a brutal traffic."

At the Convention in Connection with the faith work of Dr. Cullis recently held at Intervale Park, N. H., an astonishing report was given of the progress of the work. It now comprises twenty-five different missions or institutions, extending round the world. Twelve of these—seven homes for the sick and destitute, two churches, a college for the training of workers, a city mission and a tract repository—are in or near Boston. There are three missions for the Chinese in California, three in the Southern States for the Freedmen, and three in India; also a number of tract repositories, all these being supplied with workers from among those trained in faith principles in connection with the Boston work. None of the workers receive any salary, and all are expected to have faith for their own work. During the twenty-two years that have passed since its commencement over $700,000 has been received from God in answer to prayer, besides multitudes of other gifts. There are at present some fifty patients in Consumptives' Home, four in the Spinal Home, four in the Cancer Home and fifteen children in the Orphans' Home; all are in destitute circumstances and all are surrounded with loving care and Christian sympathy. Dr. Cullis said that three fourths of the consumptives in the home were there through their drinking habits. No reply was made to the recent strictures which a prominent Methodist clergyman has made in the Century on faith healing. The testimony of many present who had been healed were considered the best answer to the arguments against it.

Eight Headstones in the Cemetery of a City in New York State, have a remarkable narrative connected with them. They stand in a row, and are exactly alike except in the names on them. A stranger visiting the locality last week noticed them and inquired about the circumstances. He was informed that they are memorials of the entire family of a well-known physician, whose eight children died in eight consecutive weeks. In the town where the physician resides an epidemic of diphtheria broke out recently. He thoroughly studied the disease and became very successful in treating it. At last he gained such confidence in his skill that he began to boast that he could cure any case, and, being a man notorious for his profanity he went so far as to defy "the Almighty to produce a case of diphtheria which he could not cure." In less than a week his youngest child was seized with the disease, and in spite of the doctor's skill grew worse and died. One after another his other children took the infection and died, until all the eight were gone, and the last was buried just two months after his blasphemous defiance was uttered. It was an awful answer to the challenge his pride had prompted (Isa. 45:9).

An Affrighted Mother had a Narrow Escape at Port Ewen, N. Y., recently. She was rocking her child to sleep when she heard a buzzing sound similar to that made by a bee. At the same time she felt something on her back, to which she paid no particular attention. After a few moments, the buzzing sound being again heard, this time close by the side of her head, she looked around and was horrified to see a snake of large size. The reptile quickly wound itself around the upper part of her arm, and its tongue darted in dangerous proximity to her face. Uttering a loud cry, she threw her child to the floor and ran out of the house, screaming for help. The noise brought a number of neighbors to the scene, by whom she was rescued from her dangerous assailant. Soon after her arm began to swell, the coils of the snake being plainly visible by black and blue ridges. She had been sitting on the grass during the evening, and it is supposed that the snake must have attached itself to her dress. Had the mother been less prompt in putting the child out of harm's way and seeking assistance, one or both might have lost their lives. If a similar promptitude was shown when the soul is in peril under the assaults of Satan, many might be saved who perish eternally by trusting to their own strength until it is too late (II Peter 2:9).

A Juvenile Coquette Has Been Boycotted in an Ohio town. The Cincinnati Commercial states that at a well-known school in an adjacent town there is a young lady whose beautiful face and winsome ways have captivated every boy there. There have been many competitors for her favor who have vied with each other in providing candies, ice-cream and lemonade for the delectation of the little beauty. It seems that the young lady has been capricious, fickle, and not careful in the observance of her promises. One boy after another has had cause to complain that although she has accepted his presents and promised him her company at some forthcoming entertainment, she has deserted him, when the time came, for some newer acquaintance, and has even been known to promise herself to several boys for the same entertainment, and, when the promises fell due, to take her pick of the crowd and leave the others without compunction. So many boys had been sufferers at different times that a meeting of them was held at which it was resolved that as they had been "slighted, misgusted, and cruelly treated" by the young lady, each and every one pledged himself "not to speak to her, smile at her, or take her to any party, or treat her to ice-cream or lemonade" for a year, under penalty of a fine of fifty cents for each offence. It may be hoped that this severe treatment will prove a wholesome discipline to the little lady, checking at the outset of her career the bad habit of unfaithfulness to her promises, which is all too common in the world and in the Church. How many Christians are there who, looking back over their past lives, do not remember vows they have made to their Saviour in sickness or trouble that have been broken (Eccles. 5:4, 5)!

Darkness is Preferred to Moonlight by Railroad engineers, says a prominent railroad president. He declares that in the course of a long experience he has found that all engineers dread moonlight nights. They try the nerves to their utmost. Engineers like to run on dark nights. On a moonlight night the trouble with them is no trouble at all—shadows. An engineer, looking out from his engine, sees before him all manner of shadows. He is sure that the dark shadow across the track he sees is a man or a rock, or some kind of an obstruction. He doesn't know, and he is kept in a state of nervous excitement all the time. Going around curves, along hillsides, many curious shadows are outlined on the track, and very often an engineer is so worked up over a night's ride that he is scarcely able to perform his duties. In the dark he goes ahead with composure, trusting to the signals that all is right, but in the moonlight his imagination is constantly terrifying him by transforming empty shadows into fatal obstructions. The Christian has a similar experience in his journey through life. While he walks by faith he is at peace, but when he looks ahead in his own feeble light he is appalled by the difficulties before him (Prov. 3:5, 6).

A Policeman Patrolling in his Sleep had a singular experience recently. A reporter of the News, of Savannah, Ga., conversing with a policeman during one of the close, hot nights last week asked him if he did not sometimes get sleepy. "Yes," said the man, "and I had a funny time a few nights ago. I had been up at court two mornings in succession and had been caught besides on fire detail, so I was pretty well worn out when I went on duty at night. I heard the clock strike eleven when I was at West Broad. I dropped asleep as I walked, and when I woke up I was coming up Gas House hill. It was dark and I could not tell what time it was, so I hurried on, and at the first lamp I looked at my watch. It was twenty minutes after midnight. I had walked the whole length of the street, and had been down the hill and along the cotton presses. It had been raining hard, and I had been walking through all the shower without waking up." The policeman being worn out by duty was entitled to sympathy, but it may be hoped he will not get into the habit of patrolling in his sleep or his value as a watchman will deteriorate. Clergymen who are practically the watchmen of the Church should be on their guard against this tendency. Some of them do their duty very mechanically (Isa. 56:10, 11).

Criminals Breaking the Law in Jail Have been detected at Atlanta, Ga. In the county prison there some sixty of the worst malefactors in the State are confined. Among them is a man from Heard County, who is imprisoned on a charge of murder. A determined effort to break jail was made on August 10th, and the search that followed revealed the fact that an illicit whiskey still has been run in the prison, and has been in operation for months. The Heard County murderer had in his cell a small stove and a kettle. He had been an illicit distiller in his day, and his first work on entering jail was to improvise a worm and still, getting the different articles at different times. The worm was made of an india rubber tube. The prisoners in his cell would save up their corn bread until a sufficient quantity was obtained, when the stiller would make a fair article of corn whiskey. The secret was well kept by the prisoners, who were thus enabled to get their dram occasionally. It is a significant fact that while undergoing punishment for their crimes, the men were not reformed but went on adding crime to crime. This is a common tendency which seems to have been overlooked by the theologians, who are hoping that even in hell the lost will repent and reform (Rev. 16:11).

HIDEOUS DISCOVERY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: all these evil things come from within, and defile the man."—MARK 7: 20-23.

Religious Quacks—Profitless Discussions—The Mouse who Eats the Wafer—I. The Swarm of Sins—Some Lightly Regarded of Men—Wonderful Variety—None Defensible—The Devil's Sermon in London—II. The Nest Sins Come From—The Evolution of the Heart—From Sinful Thought to Sinful Act—III. The Defilement when they Come out—IV. The Only Cure—Cleansing and Power Assured.

How weary the Saviour must have been of the idle prattle of the Scribes and Pharisees! They are forever talking about washing hands before meals, and washing pots and cups; and He is all the while occupied with the great griefs and sins of men, and how He can save them from the wrath to come. He must have felt as some true physician feels who looks upon a patient, marks the serious nature of the sickness, and plans a remedy, while some quack is boasting his nostrums or performing ridiculous signs, and passes over the dying man. Truly, I think every spiritual man must have a feeling of disgust every now and then as in these days he reads dissertations upon the cut of a priestly garment, or the position of an altar. Have you never read what is to be done if a little wine be spilt upon the cloth of the holy table, or how the cup used in the mass is to be rinsed again and again, and carefully drained by the person ministering? Have you never heard of arguments concerning the fate of a mouse which was so irreverent as to eat the holy wafer?

it all seems. Men are diseased to the heart with sin, and ready to die and pass before the judgment-seat to receive the condemnation which must lie upon those who continue in sin; and meanwhile the teachers of the people are either busy with vain ceremonies or dreaming over equally vain philosophies.

The Saviour makes short work of human traditions and authorities. Your meats and your drinks, your fasting thrice in the week, your paying of the tithe of mint, anise, and cummin, your broad phylacteries and fringes; He waves them all away with one motion of His hand, and He comes straight to the real point at issue. He deals with the heart and with the sins which come out of it. He draws up a diagnosis of the disease with fearless truthfulness, and declares that meats do not defile men, that true religion is not a matter of observation or non-observation of washings and outward rites; but that the whole matter is spiritual, and has to do with man's inmost self, with the understanding, the will, the emotions, the conscience, and all else which makes up the heart of man. He tells us that defilement is caused by that which cometh out of the man, not by that which goeth into Him. Defilement is of the heart, and not of the hands.

I. First, this morning, think, dear brethren, with deep self-abasement, of

THE SWARM OF SINS.

I seem to have broken open a wasp's nest, and the stinging creatures fly out, in number numberless. Here are thirteen words, each one of them teeming with all manner of evils. Matthew, when he condenses the Saviour's utterances, mentions seven of these horrible things, one of which is omitted here; but Mark is more full in this instance, and mentions thirteen items of abomination. The very names of them are a pain to the ear. Let us bow our heads in sorrow as we read the muster-roll of this legion of terror: "Evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, thefts, murders, covetings, wickednesses, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness."

Now, notice first, that this awful catalogue, this horrible list of the unclean birds that find a cage within the human heart, begins with things that are lightly regarded among men—"evil thoughts." "We shall not be hanged for our thoughts," cries one. I wish that such idle talkers would remember that they will be damned for their thoughts; and that instead of evil thoughts being less sinful than evil acts, it may sometimes happen that in the thought the man may be worse than in the deed. He may not be able to carry out all the mischief that lurks within his designs, and yet in forming the design he may incur all the guilt.

THOUGHTS ARE THE EGGS

of words and actions, and within the thoughts lie compacted and condensed all the villainy of actual transgressions. If men did but more carefully watch their thoughts, they would not so readily fall into evil habits; but men first indulge the thought of evil, and then the imagination of evil; nor does the process stay there. Picturing it before their mind's eye, they excite their own desires after it; these grow into a thirst and kindle into a passion. Then the deed is speedily forthcoming; it was long in the hatching, but in a moment it comes forth to curse a whole lifetime. Let us pray God to purge us in the inward parts, lest haply, by entertaining vain thoughts as lodgers within our hearts, they take up their residence, become masters of our lives, and drive us onward to the outward sins which shall utterly pollute and defile us in the eyes of our fellow-men. Since this indictment begins with evil thoughts, who among us can plead guiltless? Since evil thoughts are the first of sins, we had better meet the charge with immediate repentance and an instant faith in the only Saviour.

Rising in evil thought, sin flows through a black country full of varying immoralities, until it falls into the Dead Sea of "foolishness." How often have I heard it said of a vicious life, when it has ripened into horror: "The man must have been mad! He was not only wicked, but what a fool he must have been! The devil himself seems to have forsaken him. He acted craftily enough at one time; but afterward he went against his own interests, and insured his own destruction."

In this list you have

of sins. The list is not complete, and was not intended to be. It would be very difficult in words to compose a full roll, though it were written within and without, which should comprise all kinds of evils. But you have here "deceit," which seems to dread the judgment of men, and therefore would delude it; and then you have "pride," which defies all mortal condemnation, and lifts itself above its fellows. You have here different forms of the lust which seeketh after pleasure, at any expense, in the form of "fornications" and "adulteries;" and then you have the "covetousness" which clings to its gold, and will consent to no outlay which it can avoid. Sin is a contradictory thing which blows hot and cold; it hurries men, like fitful winds, this way and that, yet never in the right direction. "We have turned every one to his own way," but all to the wrong way.

How evil, my brethren, each one of these sins may be it is not possible for us to know; but there is no one of them that is defensible. They are each one of them vile before God, and some of them are mischievous toward men. Evil thoughts mainly blacken the man's own mind, but when he expresses them in disputations they destroy the love of truth in others: adulteries, as violations of the marriage vow, shake the very foundations of family life: fornications, which to-day are winked at as though they were scarcely offences, defile two persons at once in body and in soul. Actual murders follow frequently upon unbridled passion; but forget not that the command, "Thou shalt not kill," may be broken by anger, hate, malice, and the desire for revenge. Many a murderer in heart may be among us this day, being angry at his brother without a cause. He that conceiveth and hideth malice in his soul is a murderer before God. This form of evil breeds

ALL MANNER OF HARM.

Thefts in all their shapes are also injurious to the commonweal. By this we mean not only robberies, but all taking from others unjustly, such as the oppression of the poor in their wages, the taking of undue advantage in trading, the incurring of debts without hope of being able to pay, and the like—these are varied forms of dishonesty, and are full of injury to others. Covetousness—the greed to get, and the greed to keep, the adding field to field until the man seems eager to be left alone in the earth; the grasping of excessive riches, and the creation of poverty in others by crushing their humbler enterprises: all this is evil, though some applaud it as business sharpness.

Need I mention the ills which come of wickedness, deceit, and lasciviousness? These are poisons in the air deadly to all who breathe them. I sicken as I think how man has plagued his fellow-men by his sins. But I will not go through the list, nor need I; the devil has preached upon this text this week, and few have been able to escape the horrible exposition.* A foul exhalation has entered into every house in this great city, polluting the very atmosphere, and spreading moral infection. Oh for a hurricane to sweep away the pestilent vapor! Within a narrow space a multitude of iniquities have gathered like vultures upon a mass of carrion. What a collection of sins may meet in a single story! How soon doth one transgression call to its fellows, till "a little one has become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation!" Alas, alas for the multitudes of sins!

II. Now, secondly, I want to indicate from which they come. Now that we have seen these evil beasts, we will go and look at their den. Let us make a journey thither. No, you need not feel for your money to pay your fare; I am not going to take you very far; I do not ask you to quit your homes, or even your pews. There is not even need for you to stretch out your hand to feel for this foul nest of unclean birds: you can keep your hand upon your bosom, and it will not be far off from the lair wherein these evil things are lurking, ready to leap forth whenever occasion offers. Our Lord Jesus Christ says, "All these evil things come from within." "For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts." The source from which these rivers of pollution proceed is the natural heart of man. Sin is not a splash of mud upon man's exterior, it is a filth generated within himself.

Now this is a very different story from that which we sometimes hear from thoughtless people. "Oh, yes, he used to swear, he was unkind to his wife and family; no doubt he took too much drink; but he was

A GOOD-HEARTED FELLOW."

What an awful lie that is! His heart could have been no better than that which came out of it. Yet how common it is to say, when a man dies: "Well, poor man, he is gone! There was no fear of God or man about him; he was a passionate, drunken man, and so full of vice that no one was safe near him; but he was good at bottom." A likely story, is it not? The water which came up in the bucket was black and putrid; but no doubt at the bottom of the well it is clear as crystal! Do you believe it? Our Saviour makes short work of the lie that the life may be impure, and yet the heart be good.

Another fine theory of modern times is disproved by our text. According to this evolution doctrine, as applied to theology, the new birth is a development of that which is naturally within the heart. I hope we may be spared such births and evolutions. According to this theory, we have had some fine specimens of regenerate people of late; for we have heard of evo-

* [The aristocratic divorce case of Crawford and Dilke was being tried, and the newspapers were full of loathsome details.]

lutions or developments which have brought out from within evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, and wickednesses of more than average proportions. God save us from all development of the sin which dwells in man! Regeneration is much or the development of natural goodness. It is described in Scripture as a new creation, and as a resurrection from the dead. It is not the cleansing of the carnal mind, but the implantation of a spiritual nature. It is not a shaping, and feeding, and washing, and purging of what is already in fallen man: it is a putting into us of a life which was never there before. It is a supernatural work of God the Holy Ghost: it is a miracle of grace, a work of God alone. Out of the heart, if the volcano be permitted to pour forth its lava, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, and such like. The Saviour compels us to see how bad the natural heart must be in itself, since that which comes out of it is so vile. Who could bring such unclean things out of a clean heart? The source must be foul if the streams are so filthy. These evils must be within, or else they could not come from within.

MORE THAN REFORMATION,

Sin must be within us naturally, since the best training does not prevent it.

from the sight or hearing of evil, kept as it were within a glass case, yet run to it when the restraint is removed. As the young duck which has been reared in a dry place yet takes to the water as soon as it sees a pond, so do many hasten to evil at the first opportunity. How often it happens that those young persons who have been most shut out from the world have become the readiest victims of temptation when the time has come for them to quit the parental roof! It must be in them, or it could not thus come out of them. In many cases evil cannot be the result of mistaken education nor of ill example, and yet there it is: the seed is in the soil, and needs no sowing.

Moreover, put a man where you may, and seclude him as you please, sin will still break out from him, and therefore the sin must be somewhere within, hidden away. Do we not know this? Hasten away and dwell alone as a hermit where rumor of pollution and iniquity can never reach you from abroad, and still you will find the cauldron within boiling and bubbling up with evil. A door must be well listed if it is to shut out temptation. Nay, shut the door and hermetically seal it, and sin has already entered with yourself, for it is within you. Until you are delivered from that evil man, yourself, you are not delivered from tendencies to wickedness. The heart of man is the seed plot of iniquity, and the nursery of transgression. As the multitudes streamed forth from the hundred gates of Thebes, so do sins proceed from the heart. O Lord, have mercy upon us, and give us new hearts and right spirits!

III. Thirdly, and briefly, let us notice for a minute

which is caused by the coming out of these evil things. While they lie within us asleep they are bad enough; but when at last they pour forth into our lives, and buzz abroad in our acts, then they cause grievous defilement, and make us unclean. In some cases they cause a defilement which our fellow-men see, and, seeing, begin to cry out against us, and even to banish us from their society. Where that is not the case, sin always causes defilement to the man himself. He goes from bad to worse, from worse to worst. Sin is like a ladder. Few reach the height of iniquity at once: the most of men climb from one evil to another, and then to a third and a fourth. Sin hardens men to further sin. He who is a moral monster was not always such. By sinning much he learned to sin more. Even if sin be speedily repented of, its damage is not readily repaired; if its writing be erased you can see where it used to be. Even the passage of a momentary thought over the mind will leave a stain. See, then, the defiling power of sin.

Here is the main point—the man out of whose heart these evil things proceed is

DEFILED BEFORE GOD.

I know that many will not think much of this; but that indifference only proves the hardening nature of sin. Only think of it: the sinful man is common and unclean before God. He is not fit to enter the sanctuary of God, nor to come into His holy presence. Sinful man cannot commune with a holy God. You do not mind that, you say. Ah me! how alienated from God are your hearts! If it were not so, we should judge that the most horrible thing in the world is for a man no longer to be able to speak with his Maker, nor his Maker to look favorably upon him.

By and by it comes to this, that God cannot bear this defiled one anywhere in His universe, among holy beings, any more than men can bear lepers in common society. The just God is driven to find a place where the wilfully unclean may be placed apart "where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched." At last the great High Priest will look upon the defiled one, and looking at him, and seeing his leprosy of sin still upon him, that priest will say, "Depart! depart!" Oh, the terror of that final word! I dare not dwell upon his awful result of choosing sin and refusing mercy. I the more readily cease from this theme because my last point is that upon which I would dwell as long as possible.

IV. Hear me, then, while I speak of

for this evil. Oh, sirs, your hearts must be cured of sin! Not merely the outcome of your heart, but the heart itself must be purged from defilement; for as long as sin comes forth from your heart it shows that the heart is still sinful. The heart must be changed, or you can never meet God with acceptance, nor be found among the glorious throng who behold His face and find a heaven in the sight. You must be renewed in the spirit of your minds, or you cannot dwell forever with God. How is this to be done? I answer, it is impossible—impossible with man.

How, then, can we be made fit to dwell with God? Must we despair? Must we die utterly broken-hearted? Listen; for all the defilement that has fallen upon any one here, even though all the defilement of my text should have met upon one single individual, there is cleansing. With God there is plenteous redemption and measureless mercy. For adultery, for murder, for blasphemy, for all manner of sin, there is forgiveness. The Lord rejoices to blot out the transgressions of repenting sinners, for He delighteth in mercy. Oh, that men would seek pardon through Jesus Christ, who is exalted on high to give repentance and remission!

"Yes," say you, "but pardon is not all we want." Most true; it is not all we need. We need to have the inward source of sin taken away. This also is provided.

IT IS POSSIBLE

for us to be born again: glory be to God for that. It is written, "Sin shall not have dominion over you." To be sanctified is as great a favor as to be justified. Purity of heart is to be had by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ; is not this good news? Those who receive Jesus receive power to become sons of God; and this means holiness. Those who become children of God are made like the Firstborn, and they grow up into Him in all things. Grace reigns in them through righteousness unto eternal life.

Brethren, it may be well to make laws to restrain fornication, theft, and blasphemy; but the only sure cure for all sin is the grace of God in the heart. Are they going to stop dogs from going mad by muzzling them? Dogs will go mad with their muzzles on; and so will men sin despite the restraints of law. So long as hearts are evil, evils will proceed from them. The only physician for sin is the Lord Jesus; and His heavenly surgery lies in the renewing of the heart by grace through the Holy Ghost who works by the Gospel. My brethren, keep to the old Gospel; keep to the one remedy which has healed so many. No new theories for us; we accept the old and tried everlasting Gospel of the blessed God. Pray for a blessing upon this burden of the Lord which with a heavy heart I have delivered to you.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS. EXTRAORDINARY MEMORIES.*

THE Greeks made Mnemosyne the mother of the Muses, and for us, under a less poetical form, memory is the indispensable bond of union of the intellectual faculties. The senses reveal to us the external world, the intellect apprehends the sensations, and rising from material notions to abstract conceptions, embraces all that man is permitted to learn or know; but it is the memory which enables us to record, as in a book, facts and results, to compare and to judge, to express thought by language, and to share the thoughts of others. Without memory man would not recognize the ties of blood, of friendship, or of gratitude; the past would have no existence for him; his life would only embrace the present moment, and would flow on like the period immediately succeeding birth. Deprived of experience, impelled by blind instinct, isolated in creation, he could not exist with organs which render necessary everything of which he would be deprived. We cannot, therefore, imagine the human race without memory, and in order to find an organization without this faculty, we must descend to the lowest grades of animal life.

Memory is of a compound nature; partaking of body and of spirit, it is a reflection, an image of ourselves, since it carries us back to every moment that has impressed our lives. An exact and enthusiastic historian of the facts which she recounts to us, she seems to add to our existence the hours already passed; but as she approaches epochs she rudely makes us sensible of the flight of time. It may be happiness that makes us recall hours of pleasure, or in misfortune we may remember them with that pain of which the poet sings. She shows us the faces of all who have had a part in our existence, sometimes an isolated portrait, and at others a crowded gallery; a minute object, a plant, a rock, or the grandest scenes in nature; a word, or the entire work of a writer; a fact, or the history of a people. She carries us back in an instant to the most vivid impressions or to the most abstract conceptions, whether of the senses or the intellect. In taking the form of sensation or of thought, she makes us traverse time and space with a swiftness of which nothing material can give us an idea; we might indeed say that time and space have no existence for the memory, if she did not in surmounting them awaken the idea of the one or the other. Obeying the behests of the will, memory retraces a scientific doctrine as a whole and in detail, the nicest distinctions of the most violent dispute, the series of systems of philosophy—all, in a word, that science or the most profound erudition has been able to classify in the mind.

We find everywhere the records of extraordinary memories, great numbers of which come down to us from antiquity. Mithridates spoke twenty-two languages or dialects according to Aulus Gellius, and forty according to Pliny. Scipio, the Asiatic, knew most of his legionaries by name; Julius Cæsar, Hortensius, Lucullus, Adrian, and many others prove that a powerful memory is not incompatible with a superior mind. Pic de la Mirandole was a fresh example in the fifteenth century, as were also Leibnitz and Haller in the eighteenth. The last-mentioned cites a German, named Müller, who spoke twenty languages, and in our day we have Cardinal Mezzofanti, who spoke nearly fifty, exclusive of dialects, conversing with the pupils of the College of the Propaganda, who had come from every quarter of the globe.

It is related also that Scaliger learned Homer by heart in twenty-one days, and the other Greek poets in four months; and we are assured that Magliabecchi could dictate whole books after having read them once; and if some of these examples of prodigious memory are not verified, they are at least rendered very probable by those which are incontestable.

It was an extraordinary memory which enabled the young Sicilian shepherd, Mangiamela, to calculate mentally with such rapidity that the members of the Academy of Sciences could scarcely follow him, even with the aid of the most expeditious processes. But the very ordinary intellect of this young man proves that in his case memory was a faculty out of all proportion to the others—a circumstance often observed, especially in children.

In former times the musicians of the Swiss troops in the service of France were forbidden, under severe penalties, to play their national airs, and especially the "Ranz des Vaches," as it caused the soldiers to desert, or made them homesick. Taste and smell are not less powerful in awakening memory, even after many years have passed.

A NEW SHIP CANAL.

(See Illustration.)

AN enterprise in which the American cotton and machine trades are closely concerned has been launched in England. Its object is to diminish freight charges and consequently the cost of productions. Hitherto the cargoes of cotton, grain, machines, etc., supplied by the United States to the English market have been landed at Liverpool, whence they have been carried to the various seats of industry in England by rail at a heavy outlay. With cotton, for example, the Manchester manufacturer has to pay three charges: first, the prime cost of the cotton; second, the freight across the Atlantic; and third, the freight from Liverpool to Manchester. It is now proposed to reduce the last charge to one half existing rates by the construction of a ship canal from Liverpool to Manchester.

The enterprise is a gigantic undertaking in a country so diminutive as England, where every square foot of land is an object of consideration, and has an appreciable value. The canal to be of really practical utility needs to be wide enough and deep enough to admit the largest vessels, and it is therefore proposed to make it twenty-six feet deep, which is the depth of the Suez Canal, and one hundred and twenty feet wide at the bottom. The length of the canal is to be thirty-five miles, and the cost of the land required is over four million dollars. The cost of construction is estimated at nearly twenty-nine millions. The initial steps have also been very expensive. It was necessary to obtain an act of Parliament in order to acquire possession of the land needed, and this was resisted by the parties whose interests the canal would injure. The Liverpool people who would lose in dock rentals and the railroad companies who would lose freight lobbied against the act with all their might, and for four years succeeded in preventing its passage. The projectors of the canal have already spent seventy-three thousand dollars in overcoming the opposition. That stage is now passed, and they have to meet the financial and engineering difficulties.

Messrs. Rothschild, the famous Jewish financiers, are running the financial part of the undertaking, and they propose to raise forty million dollars in shares of fifty dollars each. The chief engineering difficulty is that the terminus of the canal at Manchester is sixty feet six inches higher than its connection with the Mersey at Liverpool. This will involve the construction of four locks distant respectively from Liverpool twenty, twenty-seven, twenty-nine, and thirty-three miles. The towns of Salford, Warrington, and Partington lie on the route, and at each town a dock is to be constructed besides a monster dock at Manchester (a picture of which is here given). The water area of these docks will be eighty-five acres, and the wharfage will extend over four miles. All these works can be completed in four years by twenty thousand men. It is somewhat remarkable that it was between these same cities of Liverpool and Manchester that the first important line of rail road was constructed in 1830, by George Stephenson.

A SILENT PREACHER.

A SINGLE verse written on paper now yellow with age hangs on the wall of a nobleman's study in England. It has a remarkable history, and has in two notable instances, at least, been blessed of God to conversion. The verse was originally composed by Dr. Valpy, the eminent scholar and author of standard school-books. He was converted late in life, and wrote this verse as a confession of his faith:

"In peace let me resign my breath,
And Thy salvation see;
My sins deserve eternal death,
But Jesus died for me."

On one occasion the eminent Dr. Marsh was visiting the house of Lord Roden, where he held a Bible reading with the family. He mentioned Dr. Valpy's conversion by way of illustration in the course of his remarks, and recited the verse. Lord Roden was particularly struck with the lines, wrote them out, and affixed them to the wall of his study, where they still are.

Lord Roden's hospitable mansion was often full of visitors, among whom were many old army officers. One of these was General Taylor, who served with distinction under Wellington at Waterloo. He had not, at that time, thought much on the subject of religion, and preferred to avoid all discussion of it. But soon after the paper was hung up, he went into the study to talk with his friend alone, and his eyes rested for a few moments upon the motto. Later in the day Lord Roden entering his study came upon the general standing before the paper and reading it with earnest face. At another visit the host noticed that whenever General Taylor was in the study his eyes rested on the motto. At length Lord Roden broke the ice by saying, "Why, general, you will soon know that verse by heart." "I know it now by heart," replied the general, with emphasis and feeling.

A change came over the general's spirit and life. No one who was intimately acquainted with him could doubt its reality. During the following two years he corresponded regularly with Lord Roden about the things which concerned his peace, always concluding his letters by quoting Dr. Valpy's verse. At the end of that time the physician who had attended General Taylor wrote to Lord Roden to say that his friend had departed in peace, and that the last words which fell from his dying lips were those which he had learned to love in his lifetime.

A young relative of the family, an officer lately returned from the Crimea, also saw it, but turned carelessly away.

Some months later Lord Roden received the intelligence that his young acquaintance was suffering from pulmonary disease, and was desirous of seeing him without delay. As he entered the sick-room the dying man stretched out both hands to welcome him; at the same moment repeating Dr. Valpy's simple lines. "They have been God's message," he said, "of peace and comfort to my heart in this illness, when brought to my memory, after days of darkness and distress, by the Holy Ghost the Comforter."

A LOATHSOME DISEASE HEALED.

IN the current number of Thy Healer there is a remarkable testimony given by a former sufferer whose restoration to health astonishes all who knew him. As the writer states his full name and address there was no difficulty in investigating his narrative. It is dated from 17 Clarence Street, London (N.), and signed Frederick Peirce Norcombe. This is his statement: "I was a great sufferer from what Sir Henry Thompson and other medical men call lupus. I have been to many hospitals, and seen many diseases, but I never saw one worse than mine. It was awful—worse than cancer. I used to cover the wounds over with about a dozen pieces of very thin rag, and then cover this with ointment, and thus imitate the color and appearance of the skin so that I could pass through the streets unnoticed. But this used to take me about an hour every day. Things went on thus for about fourteen years. Two years ago, a friend very often asked me to go to a meeting at Deptford, but I would not go. I did not care about it; I did not believe in Christianity; I did not believe in the Saviour. However, at last I went two or three times, and, while there, I was convinced that Jesus was really the Saviour of the world. Then I took to praying, and one night, about eleven o'clock, after I had been at a meeting in the New North Road, I asked the Lord to look upon me, so afflicted, despised, and looked upon, as it were, with contempt, and to heal my affliction, as no medical man in country or town could do it. About three o'clock in the morning the thought came to me, forcibly as if it were Christ's answer to my prayer, 'Thy faith hath made thee whole,' and I fancied I was healed; and when I put my hands about the diseased parts, they were all healed. That was some two years ago. I have neither taken medicine nor seen a medical man since, and the Saviour has been very precious to me; all my fears have been banished."

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leonard S. Keyser.*

A Sceptic's Unrest.

THE Sunday which was to afford the opportunity for a second interview with Miss Carrie West was eagerly anticipated. Leroy counted the days to it as school-boys count the days to vacation. Her entrance into his life had revolutionized it, quickened its forces, and given it a sprightliness and vigor of movement it had not developed before. Simply by force of character and charm of manner she had unconsciously cast a spell over the young student, which he felt was affecting his whole being. It stirred his ambition, too, for, over and above his desire to distinguish himself on his own account, was now the thought that Miss West would witness his triumph and would esteem him the more for it.

Sunday morning dawned a beautiful, bright day. Leroy's mind was full of the evening's appointment, and he felt that it would be bent upon that, wherever he might be. He longed for the freedom of the country, the invigorating air, and the rapidity of movement which harmonized with his mental condition. To sit quietly in church listening to sentiments with which he did not agree was an ordeal he could not endure in his highly nervous exhilaration. He looked longingly out of the window, and determined to go for a walk, if he could only persuade his friend Burt to accompany him. Just then Burt entered, and Leroy said:

"Henry, I vote for staying away from church this morning. What do you say? Those preachers always tell the same old story, and never argue a question. I go Sunday after Sunday to hear solid argument, but they always take things for granted. They assume the premises, and their premises are just what I don't believe. So let's stroll through the woods and over the hills to-day, and see what nature can teach us."

"That will suit me," said Burt, taking his hat and walking out with Leroy. "Nature is the best of teachers, because she is so unobtrusive. If you don't want to learn you need not. You can admire or worship. If you want to learn, her book is always open. And it's no use quarrelling or disputing with her. She goes on her way in majestic indifference to opposition. If you are right you are happy; if you blunder you suffer. That is the teaching I like; but I do not blame the preachers as you do. Their position is quite logical. If a man presents himself in a church, his appearance there implies that he has accepted the premises you refer to. Why should the preacher labor to prove that there is a God before people who would not be there if they were not already convinced of it?"

"The preacher the other Sunday night had two unconvinced auditors that we know of."

"Yes, but we were the illogical parties. The preacher was quite logical in assuming that we had come to worship. If he had known that we disagreed with his premises, he would not have been justified in neglecting the hundreds of persons there to deal with us. Let us be fair even to our opponents."

"Then you think we should not go to church with our opinions?"

"I do not say that. I would not close my ears to teaching, even when I cannot agree with it. There are many valuable lessons to be learned from the preachers. They reach the same practical conclusions by their reasoning as we do by ours. Valor, honesty, purity, veracity, self-denial, are virtues that they teach as we do. They urge a motive that does not move us, but we believe in the result."

"The preachers do not reach it themselves, nor do their hearers," said Ransom.

"That is so; the failure is due to human frailty and the inadequacy of the motive. The object is good."

"Yes, I agree with that," said Leroy. "My belief is that they cannot attain it unless they discard the Jewish superstitions."

"Well, let every man travel his own road in this free country. We cannot lay hold of the preachers, and force them into our path. All we can do is to decline to travel with them ourselves. I am not indorsing them. All I am contending for is that you are criticising them unfairly, and I believe I have proved my point."

"Possibly, though I do not admit it; but I am not in good form for argument to-day."

"So I perceive. You are evidently becoming indolent and effeminate. That girl that you fancy comes from lost Atlantis is monopolizing your thoughts. She will end by softening your brain. By the way, you have never told me where she does come from."

"I do not know, and I do not care," Leroy answered, bluntly. "Wherever she comes from she has brought an invigorating atmosphere with her. She has the positive element in her character that we have lost. We doubt and question and wonder and are certain of nothing; she seems quite sure of everything. It is a pleasant thing to have, even if it is a delusion. Of course we are driven to it. I know that. And once having the eyes opened, we can never go back; but I do not know that we are acting wisely in opening other people's eyes. It is a very negative kind of boon we carry to those who hear us. They are no better for believing in it. It takes away more happiness than it brings."

"Ah!" said Burt, "but we have nothing to do with consequences. The light we have we must disseminate; that is our duty. A man is the better for shaking off delusions and believing in the truth, whether he is happier or not. Happiness is not the goal of human ambition."

"I know that; but I crave something of the assurance and content of believing firmly in something. I wish I had something else to proclaim than 'I do not believe.' I hate having to tell a man he is wrong, without being able to tell him what is right and true."

"Sorry you are so discontented. I imagined you were an earnest seeker after light, and were trying to get others to seek too. It is no business of ours to set up a school of theology or philosophy; but we can do a service by striking the shackles off some fellow-man's feet and putting him on the road we are upon. We may become his disciples, or he ours. Who cares, so long as we have no desire but to discover truth. For my own part, I think the pursuit one worth living or dying in."

"So do I. Do not suppose I am turning back. I am speaking of the sacrifices one makes in the pursuit. I should not talk as I do if we were not fellow-travellers. You know that I have never concealed my attitude on religious questions. Every one knows it. As we make progress peace and rest may come, and then all will be well; but the path is trying at times. I feel it especially so this morning."

"Yes, you are daunted, I see. I never expected that love and robust philosophy would mix well. Give up the love, my boy, and stick to philosophy. She is a better mistress."

Leroy made no answer, and the remainder of their walk was taken in silence, broken only by few and casual remarks on the objects around them. Leroy was deeply meditative, and his cogitations disturbed him. They were new to him, for heretofore he had never doubted that he was wise in declaring his scepticism and attacking religious faith and doctrine at every opportunity. It was the calm, strong, unshaken faith Miss West evidently possessed which had suggested the doubt now, and his friend had not wholly dispelled it. He went over again in his mind his old, well-worn arguments, dwelling on them and examining them, seeking to confirm himself in his position of antagonism to religion, which, he was satisfied, was the only conceivable attitude possible for him. Burt's suggestion that his love was enervating him piqued him, and spurred him to greater effort after the old-time conviction. He thought and brooded and pondered until by the time he returned to his old study he was once more the alert, uncompromising opponent of the Bible and Christian theology, as his friends knew him.

Although he professed to disbelieve the "old antiquated Book," as he called it, and the doctrines generally believed in by the Church, yet he could not be contented in his unbelief, but was constantly flinging in the foreground his objections to religion. This was partly a result of his sincerity; for what he believed he must proclaim. He was of a frank nature, and whatever was in his heart was sure to show on the surface. Out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spoke. He would not advocate any subject he did not believe, or even keep silent about it for the sake of popularity or favor. At one time he was refused a situation in a school on the ground that he was an avowed infidel. He would not deny it, although it lost him the position.

This proneness to advocate his sceptical views was also partly the result of his towering ambition. There is a natural tendency to intellectual pride among unbelievers. The very fact that they challenge the general sentiment and the general ability to decide what is true; that they dare to disbelieve truths of such great importance against the decisions of Christendom, smacks, they think, of intellectual superiority. Why, are they not opposing the learned doctors of the Church? In their estimation this shows that they have investigated and thought more than the great mass of the people, preachers, theologians, and college faculties included.

And so our young sceptic would make known his sentiments in season and out of season, privately and publicly, in the class-room and in public debate or oration. In this way the college generally came to understand that he was thoroughly imbued with antagonism to the Scriptures. It won him some notoriety, some of it of an unenviable kind; for some naturally regarded him as a dangerous character. He was not exactly a caviller. He did not rely so much on the petty little objections to the Bible so often made by little-minded sceptics, but it was the seeming antagonism of science to Scripture, the apparent contradiction of nature to some of the fundamental doctrines of religion, the seeming disorder of the world, that troubled him.

We cannot say that he was insincere. "Oh," says some one, "there are no sincere infidels; they don't believe what they advocate!" But hold, my friend. Have you ever been a sceptic yourself? If not, you are incompetent to judge. If you have been a sceptic and have been insincere, be careful your hypocrisy does not follow you into religion.

We do not say there was no insincerity in him. Christians sometimes beat back, by mere force of will, certain thoughts, aye, and truths too, that will obtrude themselves upon their minds, instead of letting them have their free course. In this way our young sceptic would sometimes stifle convictions. He was sincere in this, that he wanted to be sincere, and that he wanted the truth; and we believe that the sceptic who is earnestly in search of light will be led at last by the Almighty Hand to the great fountain of truth.

We believe that the following will be found a pretty good test of the sincerity of unbelievers generally. If a man puts down his foot and says without qualification, "I don't believe the Scriptures," "I don't believe in the existence of God," we may decide that he is not honest; for how can a sincere man speak thus on such awful questions, when our faculties are so limited and we know so little about anything? But when a man says, "I cannot help it, but I doubt the veracity of the Scriptures," "I do not know, but I doubt whether there is a God," we may be pretty sure that he is as sincere as the unregenerate heart can be.

And yet, as you will presently see, Leroy was not always as honest as he should have been. In the heat of discussion, or under some provocation, he would make use of arguments and hard expressions that he would not have used when in solitary self-communion or with friends like-minded with himself. But this is common to all men, and might be a test of many a man's sincerity, even to himself.

There is also a tendency in the sceptic, especially if he be one of the boisterous kind and given to much discussion, to lose his high tone of character. He may not become mean or vicious, but his morals will retrograde. This is a gradual, but certain process. Let a young man who has been brought up under religious influences imbibe sentiments of unbelief, and he will soon lose his conscientious scruples about many sins. For example, there was a time when Leroy would not have dared to utter a profane word, but now, under a provocation, he could take sacred names irreverently upon his lips. It is a proverbial fact that almost all unbelievers gradually lose that finer moral sense which discriminates fundamentally between right and wrong. Their higher moral instincts are one by one undermined. This explains why so many of them call sin merely a weakness, or accident, or lapse.

There was a truce to all self-examination and self-communing when Leroy commenced his preparations for the evening. He gave himself up to the luxury of anticipation, and was in his happiest mood as he set out to keep his appointment with Miss West. He was resolved, as before, to give religious subjects a wide berth, and keep steadily to literary topics. In this he succeeded during the early part of the evening, but later, by one of the plain direct questions which the young lady was fond of injecting into her conversation, she brought him fairly to bay.

They were just clear of the dispersing congregation on their way home after service, when Miss West said: "What did you think of the sermon, Mr. Ransom?"

There was no honorable escape from the home question but in confession. "I am afraid my answer will shock you," said Leroy; "but I should be cowardly to conceal my views. The fact is, Miss West, I did not believe a word of the sermon, and I disliked its tone."

"Indeed! Pray tell me what there was in the tone that was offensive? It seemed to me very plain and earnest."

"True; but it was the assumption of superiority—the self-satisfied, dogmatic air of the preacher in regarding himself and those who believe with him as surely right, and every one who differed with him as surely wrong. I expect he has never read the incontrovertible arguments of the great sceptics of the age, American, English, French, and German? How can Christians know that they are right and all these wrong?"

"Did he not say Christians know this by experience?"

"Yes, I believe he did."

"Ah! that is a very important matter, Mr. Ransom."

"What experience do you mean?"

"The experience of conversion and the influence of the Spirit of Truth on the soul," she answered; "that's what Christians always mean by experience—an inner consciousness of truth."

"I don't believe in it; I have never had such experience. Those great sceptics have not, and I believe it is just a superstitious fancy."

"Mr. Ransom," she exclaimed with animation, while her eyes shone and rendered her more lovely, "have you ever tried to get this experience?"

"No, I have not, I believe."

"Then do you think you are capable of forming a judgment upon it? Let me assume a plain case. Suppose I have been east of town several miles, and on coming back, I tell you there is a fountain of sparkling and delicious water there. You say you do not believe it—it is only fancy. Then another and another comes and tells you of the spring. Still you persist in unbelief. Then I say, 'Don't take my word for it, but go and see for yourself.' Would you be acting the part of the philosopher to insist that you didn't believe in the fountain because you never saw it yourself?"

He struggled for a moment desperately to regain his lost footing. He might have answered any other person promptly, but the argument coming from her lips almost splintered the foundation of his confident unbelief. He replied,

"The cases are not analogous."

"Why not?" She kept him right to the point.

"Because, if God gives this experience, which Christians speak of, He must be a personal being, and consequently He can come to us; but your imaginary fountain could not. Now, if God is good and could do so, why does He not manifest Himself to all and not only to a few? This proves that there are some people who fancy that there is such an experience, when it is all—"

"Stop right there, please. God has designed that we should come to this experience of truth by a certain plan outside of which it is as impossible to obtain this consciousness as it is to see the fountain without going to it."

"These are only assertions. How do you know that this is true?"

"By experience," she replied, with a laugh and yet a reverent earnestness.

"Then you are no further than you were before. I repeat, I never had such experience," he said, triumphantly.

"I see you can believe in people's sincerity and judgment on any subject except religion; but here we are at home. Come in a while, if you wish, and we'll change the subject—at least, for a time."

JESUS COMFORTING HIS DISCIPLES.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 29, John 14: 1-14. Golden Text, ver. 1.

The Lord's Injunction—Trouble Everywhere—The Injunction not a Mockery—Obedience made Easy—Trouble Transferred—Room in Heaven—The Prepared Places—The Way—To What He Leads—Why Some Prayers are Unanswered—The Indwelling Father—The Promised Power—The Hindrance.

"LET not your heart be troubled." "Not troubled? How can I help being troubled?" says one; "I am doing all I can to serve the Lord, and my wife and children do all they can to hinder me. Not troubled? Why, I cannot enter the house without trouble staring me in the face, and the worst of all is that in my own spirit there is what troubles me, I cannot prevent feelings of anger and indignation when I think that my family, instead of being a help to me in the work of God, are my hindrance, my humiliation, and my sorrow."

"Not troubled?" says another. "Why, I have done my best to transact my business as a Christian man should, and unprincipled men have set up in opposition to me, and are taking away all my trade; I cannot meet my liabilities; and how shall I bear it, that I, an elder in the church, must become bankrupt?" "Not troubled," says an anxious wife, "when my husband is spending all we have on drink and debauchery; when my children are growing to follow his example, and to despise their mother; when all my prayers are unanswered, my strength of body is declining, and God seems to have left me?" "Not troubled," says one who is mentally depressed, "when God covers Himself with a cloud that my prayer cannot pass through? He cannot forgive me, I am lost. How can I but be troubled?" Our blessed Lord

DOES NOT MOCK US;

He shows us the way out of all our troubles, "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me." When He commands us to "be careful for nothing," He tells us how this is possible, "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. When He tells us to cast all our care upon Him, He also tells us, "He careth for you." What does all this mean? Just this—that He who "bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (1 Pet. 2:24), and made Himself responsible for them, bears also all our burdens, and that not in a sentimental way, but He really, practically undertakes them, takes the tangled skein into His own hand and unravels it, deals, in His Almightiness, with impossibilities, and makes them possible. "Believe also in Me," He says; "believe that I do care for thee, that I do undertake that wife and that family, and do make Myself responsible to convert them; and so rejoice, let your prayer and supplication for them be 'with thanksgiving,' because they are passed over into My hands, and I take the charge of them and of thee." "Believe in Me—that I make that business of yours My own, as soon as you drop the care of it into My hands; that that husband, and that family, and that weak body are My charge, and that I make them My field of labor, as soon as you believe in Me, and give Me credit for doing what I say; and, therefore, let not your heart be troubled." A troubled heart is always an unbelieving heart. How can we be sad when all power and all love has undertaken our case, and it is being carried through by God? Believing in Him, we rest in the midst of trouble, because

THE BURDEN IS UPON ANOTHER.

"In My Father's house are many mansions (abiding places, R. V.). . . . I go to prepare a place for you." Room in heaven, and every place there prepared for the coming occupant! What a home feeling it gives one! As population increases, selfishness increases, too, the struggle to live becomes desperate, and the desolate thought on the hearts of thousands is, "There is no room for me." There are plenty of workmen, but too few situations for them; plenty of willing hands, but not enough work for them to do. In every department of life there is the same story, "No room for you." Oh, how glorious to go out of overcrowded cities to the place of many mansions! And it is just like the heart of God to make such a provision. There is an abiding place yonder for every one of His children, and room for all. Oh, it is so blessed to know that even now, even here, we have a hearty, glad welcome from our Father whenever we go to Him on any errand! It is His joy to receive us and to bless us.

Jesus said, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." Thomas demurred to this; he had not learned the lesson which Jesus had again and again taught, that He must die and be raised again the third day. He said, "We know not whither Thou goest, and how can we know the way?" Thomas did not understand His answer, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; no man cometh unto the Father but by Me. If ye had known Me, ye should have known My Father also; and from henceforth ye know Him, and have seen Him." I am "the Way"—how that simplifies everything! Jesus is the Way to the Father, Jesus is the Way to salvation, to sanctification, to healing, to happiness, to power, to unity among brethren, to the hearts of sinners—the Way to everything but sin. He is "the Truth"—whatever there is of truth is only Christ Himself. He is "the Life"—life for soul and body, "the Resurrection and the Life." If we try to make our own way of holiness, or of usefulness, or of power, our hearts will be troubled, we shall be full of anxiety. It comes from our taking upon ourselves the part which Jesus claims as His. If we demand of ourselves truth or life, and are disappointed that we do not come up to our own expectations of what we ought to be, our hearts are troubled. It is because on this point; we are counting on ourselves instead of on Him. "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me." The reason why so many prayers are unanswered is, that many, in the secret of their hearts, come to God independently of Jesus. They may use the words, "For Christ's sake," but there is an underneath feeling that they have some right to approach God. They are conscious of their own earnestness, of their own need, of the purity of their own intentions; they are conscious of their devotion to God; but in all this there is no dependence on Jesus. It is when we are conscious of Jesus, not of ourselves—of His right to approach God, of His precious blood shedding for us, of His righteousness, of the all power which is given unto Him—that we come unto the Father without a doubt. Philip did not understand his Master. He said, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." And Jesus answered him, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in My Father and My Father in Me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself; but

THE FATHER THAT DWELLETH IN ME,

He doeth the works." Jesus was the express Image of the Father's Person (Heb. 1:3), yet the disciples saw it not. The Father who dwelt in Him did the works which He did, and spoke the words which He spoke. And, just so, when we are yielded up to Him, Jesus dwells in us by the Holy Ghost, that He may live out His life in us, that He may think, speak, and act in us, as His Father did in Him. He never glorified Himself, but only the Father, and He pleaded with His disciples, and pleads with us still, "Believe Me that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me; or else believe Me for the very works' sake;" as though to say, "If you don't believe because it is so blessed to believe, yet, because there is no other way of doing the works which a lost world needs, believe on Me for the very works' sake." "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto My Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in My Name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in My Name, I will do it."

Pentecost and pentecostal times were but a sample of the fulfilment of this promise. In those first wonderful ingatherings, the works which Jesus did were done, multitudes were healed, and greater works were done in the conversion of souls than ever had been manifest during His sojourn on earth. What hinders this from being the normal state of things in this age of the Holy Spirit? He has been given and never recalled by God. What hinders?

ONLY OUR UNBELIEF.

Look abroad on the Church. What do we see? trouble, care, anxiety, division, weakness—all signs of unbelief. Jesus foretold that while we are in the world we "shall have tribulation," and even "through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (John 16:33; Acts 14:22); yet He provided that our hearts need not be troubled, because we are to cast our care upon Him who careth for us—i.e., as soon as it arises transfer it by faith to Jesus, and believe He takes it. Jesus left no legacy of trouble or burden to His disciples. "Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." This peace is our right, it is Christ's last will and testament in our favor, and He lives to insure it to us. There is no selfishness in accepting the peace which Jesus gives us, it is His own peace, in which He lived and worked on earth, the peace of knowing that His Father was responsible for all His life, and so of always lying back and resting upon Him. From the world we get trouble, but Jesus gives "not as the world giveth;" and so He repeats, "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." Our part is only to "let." He will do all, if we only let Him; He will work, if we only yield, and accept His constant peace.

SO TIRED.

So tired I fain would rest,
But, Lord, Thon knowest best:
I wait on Thee.
I will toil on from day to day,
Bearing my cross, and only pray
To follow Thee.

So tired; my friends are gone,
And I am left alone,
And days are sad.
Lord Jesus, Thon wilt bear my load
Along this steep and dreary road,
And make me glad.

So tired; yet I would work
For Thee, Lord, hast Thon work
Even for me?
Small things, which others, hurrying on
In Thy blest service swift and strong,
Might never see.

So tired; yet I might reach
A flower to cheer and teach
Some sadder heart:
Or for parched lips perhaps might bring
One cup of water from the spring
Ere I depart.

So tired; yet it were sweet
Some faltering tender feet
To help and guide.
Thy little ones whose steps are slow,
I should not weary them, I know,
Nor roughly chide.

So tired; Lord, Thon wilt come
To take me to my home,
So long desired.
Only Thy grace and mercy send,
That I may serve Thee to the end,
Though I am tired.

Guizot takes rank among the most illustrious representatives of his age and nation. The style is easy, familiar, clear and entertaining, and the publishers have done a good service in giving to the public in so fresh a form this best work of a modern French historian.—Advance, Chicago, Ill.

It is a wonderfully full and attractive history by one of the first historians of his age—a history worthy of being the last production of the brain and pen of Guizot. His country needs no better historical monument; the student needs no better history.—Interior, Chicago, Ill.

The matchless brilliancy of Guizot's style, graphic descriptions of men and events, painstaking minuteness of detail, the lucidity and ease, and the admirable philosophic reflections, all combine to render it worthy of the description it bears as the most popular history of France. It is as fascinating as a novel, and as life-like as a theatrical representation of the events and personages it describes. How the set can be sold for that price remains, after much reflection, a

THE COST Of the Imported Edition, with substantially the same illustrations, is $36.00, while this is certainly the best in form and the most satisfactory for the library. "From the pen of a master. How

Mr. Alden can give the eight volumes for $6.00, and this on good paper, and clear type, including the multitude of illustrations is a thing we have ciphered over, but we fail to understand it."—Christian Leader, Boston, Mass.

France has had a history second to no country on earth. Histories innumerable have described her deeds of chivalry and glory. But in accuracy, brilliancy, and all that goes to make a history, none compare with the fascinating pages of Guizot. He is as brilliant as Macaulay and as painstaking as Hume. This edition is profusely illustrated and they are illustrations that do illustrate.—American Baptist Reflector, Chattanooga, Tenn.

HENRY MARTYN, the Eminent Missionary and Bible Translator—Scenes in his Life.

REV. HENRY MARTYN,
Missionary to India and Persia.

Born at Truro—Student Life—Conversion—The Man of One Hour—Senior Wrangler—Becomes a Missionary—First Sermon—Appointed a Chaplain in India—Hospital Visitation—Sets Sail—Dangerous Voyage—On a Field of Battle—Work in India and Persia—Illness and Death.

AMONG the devoted men who have consecrated their lives to the work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen, the famous missionary whose portrait appears on the first page is conspicuous. With talents which placed him in the first rank of scholars at the early age of twenty years, he relinquished the brilliant career open to him in his own land that he might carry the Gospel to a dark land, where he died utterly worn out by labor before reaching his prime.

Henry Martyn was born at Truro, Cornwall, on February 18th, 1781, and died at Tocat, in Persia, on October 16th, 1812, at the early age of thirty-one years. His father began life as a miner, but educated himself and succeeded in obtaining employment as chief clerk in a merchant's office in Truro. He was an earnest Christian man, and was extremely anxious that his son should grow up in the fear of the Lord.

The youth was of a studious disposition. He learned quickly, having a most retentive memory. By the time he had passed his sixteenth year he was able to enter college, and accordingly, in October, 1797, Henry Martyn became a student at St. John's College, Cambridge. He cherished a strong ambition to obtain a distinguished place in his class, an ambition awakened in a large measure by the amiable desire of giving pleasure to his father.

In the summer of 1799 he visited his family in Cornwall, and there he found in one of his sisters

A FAITHFUL MONITOR.

An enlightened and devoted Christian herself, she perceived with deep pain her brother's need of conversion. At first he felt annoyed and irritated by what she said. "The sound of the Gospel," he remarked, "conveyed in the admonitions of a sister, was grating to my ears." Conscience whispered that she was right, but the love of the world still prevailed in his heart. Again and again did his sister plead with him to give himself to Christ. Frequently during their long rambles by the sea she would, when they rested for a time on the rocks, take out her Bible and read a passage in spite of Henry's manifest impatience (see Illustration No. 1 on first page). Her efforts were, to all appearances, in vain. Nevertheless, when leaving for Cambridge in October, he promised her that he would read the Bible with reverence and regularity; but on being settled at college, mathematics engaged all his thoughts. The sudden death of his father in January, 1800, was the event which first gave his thoughts serious direction to religion, and he began to read the Bible with an earnest desire for salvation.

SENIOR WRANGLER.

He continued his studies with assiduity so intense that he became known among his associates as "the man of one hour." But his labors were bearing fruit. At the ensuing examinations in January, 1801, he felt justified by his proficiency in entering his name for something more than a pass examination. He proposed to compete "for honors." The result proved that he had not overestimated his acquirements. The highest distinction in the university for the year was bestowed on Henry Martyn. His name appeared on the list at the head of the whole university as "Senior Wrangler," and the honor it reflected was the greater, in that he had not yet completed his twentieth year. He received the congratulations of his fellow-graduates (see Illustration No. 2) with calmness. He was not satisfied. His words are memorable: "I obtained my highest wishes, but was surprised to find that I had grasped a shadow." Nevertheless, he returned to the university the following year when he was elected "Fellow" of his college, and carried off the highest prize for Latin composition.

During this period of his residence at Cambridge he attended the ministry of the famous Rev. Charles Simeon, whose friendship he had also the high privilege to enjoy. It was at Simeon's hearth that he determined to relinquish his intention of adopting the law as a profession, and to give himself up to the ministry of the Gospel. And it was a casual remark of Simeon's on the good effected by a single missionary, Dr. Carey, which first suggested to him

THE IDEA OF MISSIONARY SERVICE.

The perusal of the "Life of Brainerd" confirmed the impression; and, after much prayer and anxious thought, Henry Martyn determined to devote his life to the work of Christ among the heathen. He received ordination at Ely, on October 23d, 1803; but as it was not intended that he should leave immediately for his designated field of service in India, and as a further special training under the care of the saintly Simeon, could not but be beneficial, he began his new career as curate to Mr. Simeon, in Trinity Church, Cambridge; undertaking, at the same time, the charge of the parish of Lolworth, a small village in the neighborhood. There it was, on the Sunday after his ordination that he preached his first sermon on the words: "If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come" (Job 14:14). After delivering his second sermon at this place, on the succeeding Sunday, he mounted his horse to ride back to Cambridge.

AN AGED CHRISTIAN

who had been one of his hearers joined him, and walked by the side of his horse for a considerable time, intent on giving him good counsel. The old man grew very earnest as they proceeded, warning him to reflect, that if any souls perished through his negligence, their blood would be required at his hand. He exhorted him to show his hearers that they were perishing sinners; to be much engaged in secret prayer; and to labor after an entire departure from himself to Christ (see Illustration No. 3).

Mr. Martyn and his youngest sister had the misfortune, early in 1804, to lose their patrimony. Thus a serious obstacle was placed in the way of his becoming a missionary. It seemed to him scarcely right that he should leave England while his sister was unprovided for, but he would not relinquish the idea of a missionary life. He resolved on going to India as a government chaplain, if he could obtain the appointment. This position would open up to him a large field of usefulness among the heathen, and at the same time afford such an income as to obviate the pecuniary difficulties which stood in the way of his leaving England.

While this affair was pending, Mr. Martyn continued to labor as curate. He exerted himself especially in visiting the sick poor. His diary contains many records of these visits.

A VISIT TO THE POORHOUSE

may be given in his own words as a specimen of this work: "Visited the hospital ward and read John 11 there, with a poor man, in whose room I was struck with the misery that presented itself. He was lying, in his clothes and hat, upon the bed, dying; his wife was cleaning the room as if nothing was the matter, and on the threshold was the daughter, about thirty years old, who had been crazy for thirteen years (see Illustration No. 4). Her mother said that the poor creature sometimes talked of religion; so I asked her several times before I could arrest her attention, who came into the world to save sinners? After several wild looks, she answered: 'Christ,' and then talked on as before. The dying man was almost insensible to anything I could say. He had formerly been a respectable innkeeper in the town, but the extravagance of a son brought him to poverty, and his daughter, who foresaw it, to insanity."

Having obtained the appointment of

GOVERNMENT CHAPLAIN

in India, Mr. Martyn spent a part of the summer of 1804 in a series of farewell visits to friends in his native county. Many tender ties bound him to Cornwall. It was still the home of all his nearest relatives; many other beloved friends resided there; and, above all, it was the home of Lydia Grenfell, a lady whose religious sympathies were in unison with his own, and to whom he attached himself with that peculiar depth and strength which characterized all his affections. But there were obstacles in the way of their union, and they were to part without any engagement as to the future. At length, on April 7th, 1805, he preached his farewell sermon in Trinity Church, Cambridge, and the next day took his departure for London, whence on July 17th he set sail in the Union, East Indiaman.

Nine months were spent by Mr. Martyn on his voyage to India, which then involved a voyage down the western coast of Africa, around the Cape of Good Hope, and up the eastern coast. They had stormy weather, and soon after crossing the line, on October 30th, the Union passed the night within a very short distance of a dangerous reef of rocks, which proved destructive to two other vessels. The reef lay exactly across the track of the Union, and had not the second mate, who was on watch, called up the captain and first mate, as soon as danger was discovered, they would inevitably have been wrecked; their escape was almost miraculous. Pieces of the ships that were dashed against the rocks floated by them, and many of those who had been cast on the reef were seen making signals for assistance (see Illustration No. 5). Happily, the shipwrecked crew were all saved, with the exception of three officers, who were devoured by the sharks while trying to swim to the Union.

The Cape of Good Hope was reached on January 3d, 1806, and the soldiers on board landed, there being danger to the colony from a war then going on between the Zulus and the Boers. A battle was raging at that very time, and Mr. Martyn begged to be allowed to go

ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

In a letter sent subsequently to his friend Mr. Simeon, he described in detail what he endured while engaged in this disinterested errand of love and mercy, and among other things, said: "A Hottentot, who had had his thigh broken by a ball, was lying in extreme agony, biting the dust, and uttering horrid imprecations upon the Dutch. I told him that he ought to pray for his enemies; and after telling the poor wretched man of the Gospel, I begged him to pray to Jesus Christ. But our conversation was soon interrupted; for, in the absence of the surgeon, who had gone back for his instruments, a drunken Highland soldier suddenly came up, and challenged me with the words, 'Who are you?' 'An Englishman,' I answered. 'No,' said he, 'you are French,' and levelled his musket at me. As I saw that he was intoxicated, and did not know but that he might actually fire out of mere wantonness, I sprang up toward him (see Illustration No. 6), and told him that if he doubted my word he might take me as his prisoner to the English camp—but that I certainly was an English clergyman. This pacified him, and he behaved with great respect."

Early in May, Calcutta was reached, whence he travelled to his post to which station he had been assigned. His first duty related to his immediate charge—the Europeans of the station and of the surrounding district; and he soon found that their ideas of a chaplain's duty and his were widely different. They desired the merest formal routine of outward religious observances; he felt that he must watch for souls as one that must give account.

But while thus faithfully performing the duties of a pastor, he never for a moment lost sight of his chief object in going to India—the conversion of the heathen. He set himself vigorously to the task of learning Sanscrit and Hindostanee that he might preach to the people in their own tongue.

In April, 1809, he was removed from Dinapore to Cawnpore, and he made the journey of four hundred miles at an unfavorable time for travelling. He was weak and ill on his arrival, but he commenced his labors immediately. His appointment required him only to preach to Europeans, but while he did not neglect them he was especially desirous of

PREACHING TO THE NATIVES.

He had already translated the parables into Hindostanee with a short, simple commentary upon them. His first native congregation was composed of the mendicants of Cawnpore. They assembled before his house in immense numbers, presenting an affecting spectacle of extreme wretchedness. To this congregation he preached the Word of life. After that regularly every Sunday he preached at the same place to a crowd of five or six hundred of these miserable creatures (see Illustration No. 7).

Meanwhile, he had learned Persian and Arabic, and labored ceaselessly to get the New Testament translated into those languages. Labors so exhausting, combined with preaching regularly in English and Hindostanee, broke down his constitution. No sooner was the work of the Persian and Arabic Testaments complete than he broke down completely, and was ordered to take a voyage for the restoration of his health. He thereupon decided to

to get his Testaments into circulation. Accordingly, Mr. Martyn proceeded to Shiraz, which he reached on June 9th, 1811. It is the Persian seat of learning. The news of this strange visitor, and of his object in coming soon spread; and he was continually visited by all classes of persons. And all were welcome, high and low, learned and ignorant; to all he was eager to tell of a crucified Saviour. Nor were his efforts to spread the knowledge of the truth confined to private conversions. Hazardous as public discussions were in a city like Shiraz, Mr. Martyn, with undaunted courage, readily entered into such whenever opportunity offered.

His first disputation was with the Moojtuhid, or professor of Mohammedan law, a man of high rank and great influence. It took place at the residence of the professor, whither Mr. Martyn was invited. "About eight o'clock at night we went," he says, "and after passing along an avenue, we entered a fine court, where was a pond, and by the side of it a platform, eight feet high, covered with carpets. Here sat the Moojtuhid in state, with a considerable number of his learned friends (see Illustration No. 8). The great man opened the argument, and spoke with much fluency, endeavoring, however, to avoid close discussion." When he concluded, Martyn spoke, and was heard with close attention.

He resided at Shiraz for ten months, preaching and arguing with the Persian scholars, the one representative of Christianity among all that assemblage of Eastern scholars. At their conclusion Mr. Martyn recorded in his diary his solemn conviction that they were the most useful months of his life. His physical strength, however, continued to decrease, and a return to his native land offered the last frail hope of saving his life. A Tartar guide was engaged to take him to the frontier of Persia on his way to Constantinople, whence he would sail for home. The man seems to have been a brutal fellow, anxious to complete his task, though it might kill his charge. He insisted on travelling night and day, in spite of Mr. Martyn's protestations of weakness. Going at break-neck speed across the plains (see Illustration No. 9), he reached Tocat by October 15th. The next day he was too ill to proceed, and finally gave up hope of ever seeing his native land again. He lay all alone, far from friends who would have taken sad pleasure in soothing his last hours. Before night his bright spirit had quitted its frail tabernacle, which had been worn out in the service of his Master before attaining the thirty second year of his age. A simple monument (see Illustration No. 10) was raised by his friends to commemorate his grand, self-sacrificing life.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Disappointed Young Lady.—A Christian friend remarked at a recent meeting: "I shall never forget the case of a young girl to whom I spoke of the power of the cleansing blood of Christ. I recall the night now when I urged her to decide for the Saviour, and her reply was, 'I will think over it.' She put the matter aside, intending at some future time to settle it; of course she did not intend to be lost; she was young, and thought she had plenty of time before her. Ah! she little knew what lay just ahead of her. Do any of us know? Three days afterward I was called to her death-bed, but before I arrived she was gone, and had died without a ray of hope."

A Rich Infidel's Wish.—The Rev. Mr. Cumming said: "A gentleman lately told me the story of a friend of his who was an infidel. He was an invalid, and was much confined to his room. One day the gentleman went in to see him, and turning to him, the invalid said, 'Oh, I wish I were dead, I wish I were dead!' 'Why?' 'Because there is no use in my living; life is of no value. I wish I were dead,' groaned the poor infidel. He had grievous bodily disease, and being also destitute of all hope for the future, life was rendered to this very rich man perfectly unendurable, and his only wish was for death, as though that would improve or mend matters, instead of bringing upon him his everlasting doom."

Famished in the Midst of Plenty.—"A Ship was wrecked in the South Atlantic, and some of the men got into a small boat, their only provision being a few hard biscuits. They rowed about in the ocean for several days, and their biscuits gave out. They were almost famished, when a vessel picked them up, and they all rushed for the cask where the fresh water was kept, and began to drink. 'What are you doing?' the captain asked, surprised at the eagerness of the men to get the fresh water. 'We are dying of thirst,' replied the men. 'You were sailing in fresh water when we picked you up,' the captain said. They had been near the mouth of a fresh river, although they knew it not. How many, like these men, are running about seeking to satisfy an empty void, and they will not stoop down and drink of the water that Christ is freely offering."

On the Credit Side of the Ledger.—"A Middle-aged, well-to-do man entered a business house recently, and said to the cashier: 'I have got a debt lying against me.' The cashier after asking particulars as to the name and when the debt was contracted, turned up the ledger, and found that the debt had been paid. 'I cannot take cash for this debt; it has been paid some time ago.' 'There is a mistake somewhere,' answered the gentleman. 'I incurred the debt before I went to America, and it troubled me so much that I came home for the purpose of paying it, so I insist upon your taking the money, for it has not been paid.' The cashier again looked carefully over the ledger, and said, 'No, there is nothing against you here; all has been paid. I cannot take the money.' When Jesus went upon the cross He paid the full penalty of every sin. Nothing did He leave for us to pay. When will people believe that this salvation is a free gift?"

A Student Ashamed of His Mother.—The Rev. Mr. Carstairs remarked: "A fellow-student of mine had very poor parents, but they had a great desire to give their son the very best possible education; and if you had looked into that home, you would have seen much pinching and self-denying on the part of those parents to give their boy a university training. Once, when he was away at college, they went up with proud hearts to see him, for was it not with great efforts on their part that he was there? He was walking in the street with a fellow-student when he met them, and he tried to avoid them. You ask me why? Because he was ashamed of them in their simple dress, and he was not going to own them until his friend had gone. That man reached the Presbyterian ministry, but he did not long stay in it. He fell from his position, and the broken-hearted parents followed him step by step. He went down lower and lower, until a fellow-minister and myself have rescued him again and again from police cells. Oh, the foulness of heart of one who is ashamed to own his mother, however poor! And yet there is still a greater sin; to be ashamed of that self-sacrificing love that nailed to the cross the Son of God."

A Reckless Young Man's Arrest.—The Rev. Mr. Henderson observed: "Some people do not believe in instant conversion. I remember the case of a very reckless fellow who lived in this city. One night when in his home a spirit of restlessness seized him; it grew so strong that he felt that if he did not do something to calm himself he would go out of his mind. He went out, and walked out of the town, and did not stop until he rested beside my church, many miles from the city. He was worn out with his long walk, and was leaning against the wall when a lady passed him, and he, noticing that the church was lighted, asked her if it was to be opened that night. She said that it was, for it so happened that we were going to have an evangelistic meeting there that evening. He thought he would go in simply to have a rest, but with no desire beyond that; the Lord, however, was there waiting to meet with him. He was convicted of sin, and led to yield himself to Christ, and has since lived as one to whom God had imparted some of the meek and lowly spirit of our Saviour."

Return of an Ejected Demon.—Mr. Rae remarked: "Not long ago I was passing down one of our streets with a friend, when he suddenly stopped before a small shut-up shop, and remarked in a sad tone, 'There is a grievous incident connected with that shop. Two sisters once lived there, who fell under the power of strong drink. First one and then the other was led to give it up, and more than that they were thought to be really converted to Christ. For a number of years they lived quiet and peaceful lives. But there came a day that the younger of the two fell ill, so ill that her sister became alarmed, and urged her to take a small quantity of spirits. At first she refused, declaring that although she died she would not touch it. Her sister pressed it upon her, telling her that it was her duty, till at length she yielded, and drank a small quantity. What seemed affection was really cruelty. The old appetite was rekindled, and from that time she freely indulged in it. Her sister soon joined her, and both became worse than they had ever been. A few days ago the younger died through drink, and her sister died on the following day from the same cause, and both now are lying dead in the house.'"

An Effective Chorus.—Mr. Campbell White, in speaking of the good that one may do in singing or speaking when they themselves are quite unaware of it, said: "On one occasion I was at one of Mr. Moody's meetings in the far east of London. At the close of a very impressive address, I noticed a woman sitting near the platform who was weeping bitterly. I went down and spoke to her, while the choir sang that beautiful hymn, 'Only trust Him.' I could make nothing of her, for when I spoke her tears only flowed the faster. At Mr. Moody's request the choir repeated the chorus again and again, and I said to the woman, 'Just listen to the words of that hymn.' She ceased weeping, and I stood by to see 'the salvation of the Lord.' As the words rang out sweet and clear upon the still night air:

'Only trust Him, only trust Him, only trust Him now:
He will save you, He will save you, He will save you now.'

the face that was covered with grief and care gradually softened, and then it grew bright; a wonderful change passed over her countenance, as she entered into the light and liberty of Jesus Christ, and learned what it was to trust Him."

RUTH'S COMPREHENSIVE CHOICE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Aug. 22, 1886, at Grimsby, Ont.

"Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."—RUTH I: 16, 17.

Naomi's Sorrowful Journey—Ruth's Five Choices

—I. The Christian's God—The World's God—A Black-Starred Deity—Who Naomi's God was—II. The Christian's Path—Dangerous and Toilsome—The Courage Needed—III. The Christian's Habitation—The Antechamber of Heaven—A Perpetual Guest—The Father's Influence in a Family—IV. Christian Associations—V. The Christian's Death and Burial—What the Dying Want—Radiation Needed—A Good Story in Stone—An Eternal Companionship.

FAMINE in Judah. Upon fields distinguished for fertility the blight came, and, at the door of princely abodes want knocked. Turning his back upon his house and his lands, Elimelech took his wife Naomi and his two sons, and started for the land of Moab in search of bread. Getting into Moab his two sons married idolaters—Ruth, the name of one, Orpah the name of the other. Great calamities came upon that household. Elimelech died and his two sons, leaving Naomi, the wife, and the two daughters-in-law. Poor Naomi! in a strange land and her husband and two sons dead. She must go back to Judah. She cannot stand it in a place where everything reminded her of her sorrow. Just as now, sometimes you see persons moving from one house to another, or from one city to another, and you cannot understand it until you find out that it is because there were associations with a certain place that they could no longer bear.

NAOMI MUST START

for the land of Judah; but how shall she get there? Between Moab and the place where she would like to go, there are deserts; there are wild beasts ranging the wilderness; there are savages going up and down, and there is the awful Dead Sea. Well, you say, she came over the road once, she can do so again. Ah! when she came over the road before, she had the strong arms of her husband and her two sons to defend her; now they are all gone.

The hour of parting has come and Naomi must be separated from her two daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah. They were tenderly attached, these three mourners. They had bent over the same sick-bed; they had moved in the same funeral procession; they had wept over the same grave. There the three mourners stand talking. Naomi thinks of the time when she left Judah with a prince for her companion. Then they all think of the marriage festivals, when Naomi's two sons were united to these women who have now exchanged the wreath of the bride for the veil of the mourner.

Naomi starts for the land of Judah, and resolve to go a little way along with her. They have gone but a short distance when Naomi turns around and says to her daughters-in-law: "Go back. There may be days of brightness yet for you in your native land. I can't bear to take you away from your home and the homes of your kindred. I am old and troubled. Go not along with me. The Lord deal gently with you as ye have dealt with the dead and with me." But they persisted in going, and so the three travelled on until after awhile Naomi turns around again and begs them to go back. Orpah takes the suggestion, and after a sad parting goes away; but Ruth, grand and glorious Ruth, turns her back upon her home. She says: "I can't bear to let that old mother go alone. It is my duty to go with her." And throwing her arms around weeping Naomi she pours out her soul in the tenderness, and pathos, and eloquence of my text: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

Five choices Ruth made in that text, and five choices must we all make if we ever want to get to heaven.

I. In the first place, if we want to become Christians, we must, like Ruth in the text, choose

THE CHRISTIAN'S GOD.

Beautiful Ruth looked up into the wrinkled face of Naomi and said: "Thy God shall be my God." You see it was a change of gods. Naomi's God was Jehovah; Ruth's god was Chemosh, the divinity of the Moabites, whom she had worshipped under the symbol of a black star. Now she comes out from under that black-starred divinity, and takes the Lord in whom there is no darkness at all; the silver-starred divinity to whom the meteor pointed down in Bethlehem; the sunshiny God of whom the Psalmist wrote: "The Lord God is a sun." And so, my friends, if we want to become Christians we must change gods. This world is the Chemosh to most people. It is

A BLACK-STARRED GOD.

It can heal no wounds. It can wipe away no sorrows. It can pay no debts. It can save no undying soul. It is a great cheat, so many thousand miles in diameter and so many thousand miles in circumference. If I should put this audience under oath, one half of them would swear that this world is a liar. It is a bank which makes large advertisement of what it has in the vaults and of the dividends that it declares, and tells us that if we want happiness, all we have got to do is to come to that bank and apply for it. In the hour of need, we go to that bank to get happiness, and we find that the vaults are empty, and all reliabilities have absconded and we are swindled out of everything. Oh, thou black-starred Chemosh, how many are burning incense at thy shrine!

Now, Ruth turned away from this god Chemosh and she took NAOMI'S GOD.

Who was that? The God that made the world and put you in it. The God that fashioned the heaven and filled it with blissful inhabitants. The God whose lifetime study it has been to make you and all His creatures happy. The God who watched us in childhood, and led us through the gauntlet of infantile distresses, feeding us when we were hungry, pillowing us when we were somnolent, and sending His only Son to wash away our pollution with the tears and blood of His own eye and heart, and offering to be our everlasting rest, comfort and ecstasy. A loving God. A sympathetic God. A great-hearted God. An all-encompassing God. A God who flings Himself on this world in a very abandonment of everlasting affection. The clouds, the veil of His face. The sea, the aquarium of His palace. The stars, the dew-drops on His lawn. The God of Hannah's prayer, and Esther's consecration, and Mary's broken heart, and Ruth's loving and bereft spirit. Oh choose ye between Chemosh and Jehovah! The one service is pain and disappointment; the other service is brightness and life. I have tried both. I chose the service of God because I was ashamed to do otherwise. I felt it would be imbecile for me to choose Chemosh above Jehovah.

"O happy day that fixed my choice
On thee, my Saviour and my God!
Well may this glowing heart rejoice,
And tell its raptures all abroad.

"O happy bond that seals my vows
To Him who merits all my love!
Let cheerful anthems fill His house,
While to His sacred throne I move.

"High Heaven, that heard the solemn vow,
That vow renewed shall daily hear;
Till in life's latest hour I bow,
And bless in death a bond so dear."

II. Again, if we want to be Christians, like Ruth in the text we must take

THE CHRISTIAN'S PATH:

"Where thou goest, I will go," cried out the beautiful Moabitess to Naomi, the mother-in-law. Dangerous promise that. There were deserts to be crossed. There were jackals that came down through the wilderness. There were bandits. There was the Dead Sea. Naomi says: "Ruth, you must go back. You are too delicate to take this journey. You will give out in the first five miles. You cannot go. You have not the physical stamina or the moral courage to go with me." Ruth responds: "Mother, I am going anyhow. If I stay in this land I will be overborne of the idolaters; if I go along with you I shall serve God. Give me that bundle. Let me carry it. I am going with you, mother, anyhow."

And if we want to serve God we must do as Ruth did, crying out: "Where thou goest, I will go." Never mind the Dead Sea. Afoot or horseback. If there be rivers to ford, we must ford them. If there be mountains to scale, we must scale them. If there be enemies to fight, we must fight them. It to get from Moab to Judah. Oh, how many Christians there are who can be diverted from the path by a quiver of the lip, indicative of scorn! They do not surrender to temptation, but they bend to it. And if in a company there be those who tell unclean stories they will go so far as to tell something on the margin between the pure and the impure. And if there be those who swear in the room, and use the rough word "damn," they will go so far as the word "darn," and look over the fence wishing they could go farther; but as to any determination like Ruth's to go the whole road of all that is right, they have not the grace to do it. They have not in all their body as much courage as Ruth had in her little finger. Oh, my friends, for heaven and go clear through! In the river that runs by the gate of the city we shall wash off all our bruises. When Dr. Chalmers printed his astronomical discourses, they were read in the haylofts, in the fields, in the garrets, and in the palaces, because they advocated the idea that the stars were inhabited. Oh, hearer, does not your soul thrill with the thought that there is another world beautifully inhabited? nay, more, that you by the grace of God may become one of its glorious citizens?

LET US START

III. Again I remark, if we want to become Christians, like Ruth in the text, we must choose

THE CHRISTIAN'S HABITATION.

"Where thou lodgest, I will lodge," cried Ruth to Naomi. She knew that wherever Naomi stopped, whether it were hovel or mansion, there would be a Christian home, and she wanted to be in it. What do I mean by a Christian home? I mean a home in which the Bible is the chief book; a home in which the family kneel in prayers; a home in which father and mother are practical Christians; a home in which on Sabbath, from sunrise to sunset, there is profitable converse, and cheerful song, and suggestions of a better world. Whether the wall be frescoed or not, or only a ceiling of unplanned rafters; whether marble lions are couchant at the front entrance, or a plain latch is lifted by a tow-string, that home is

THE ANTECHAMBER OF HEAVEN.

A man never gets over having lived in such an early home. It holds you in an eternal grip. Though your parents may have been gone forty years, the tears of penitence and gladness that were wept at the family altar still glitter in your memory. Nay, do you not now feel warm and moist on your hands the tears which that mother shed thirty years ago, when, one cold winter night, she came and wrapped you up in the bed and prayed for your welfare here and for your everlasting welfare before the throne?

Oh ye who are to set up your own home, see that it be a Christian home! Let Jesus make the wine at that wedding. A home without God is an awful place, there are so many perils to threaten it, and God Himself is so bitterly against it; but "the Lord encampeth around about the habitation of the just." What a grand thing it is to have God stand guard at that door, and the Lord Jesus the family physician; and the wings of angels the canopy over the pillow; and the Lord of glory

A PERPETUAL GUEST.

You say it is important that the wife and the mother be a Christian. I say to you it is just as important that the husband and father be a Christian. Yet how many clever men there are who say: "My wife does all the religion of my house. - I am a worldly man; but I have confidence in her, and I think she will bring the whole family up all right." It will not do, my brother. The fact that you are not a Christian has more influence on your family than the fact that your wife is a Christian. Your children will say: "Father's a very good man; he is not a Christian, and if he can risk the future, I can risk the future."

Oh, father and husband! join your wife on the road to heaven, and at night gather

YOUR FAMILY AT THE ALTAR.

Do you say: "I can't pray. I am a man of few words and I don't think I could put half a dozen sentences together in such a prayer." You can pray; you can. If your child were down with scarlet fever, and the next hour were to decide its recovery or its death, you would pray in sobs, and groans, and paroxysms of earnestness. Yes, you can pray. When the eternal life of your household may depend upon your supplication, let your knees limber and go down; but if you still insist that you cannot compose a prayer, then buy or borrow a Prayer-book of the Episcopal Church, and gather your family, and put your Prayer-book on a chair, and kneel down before it, and in the solemn and hushed presence of God, gather up all your sorrows, and temptations, and sins, and cry out: "Good Lord, deliver us."

IV. Again I remark, if we want to become Christians, like Ruth in the text we must choose

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

"Thy people shall be my people," cried out Ruth to Naomi. "The folks you associate with, I want to associate with. They will come and see me, and I will go and see them. I want to move in the highest of all circles, the circle of God's elect; and therefore, mother, I am going back with you to the land of Judah."

Do you who are seeking after God—and I suppose there are many such in this presence—do you who are seeking after God prefer Christian society to worldly society? "No," you say; "I prefer the world's mirth, and the world's laughter, and the world's innuendo, and the world's paraphernalia." Well, this is a free country, and you shall have the right of choice; but let me tell you that the purest mirth, and the most untrammelled glee, and the greatest resilience of soul are inside Christian companionship, and not outside of it. I have tried both styles of companionship—the companionship of the world and the companionship of Christ; and I know by experience. I have been now so long in the

and experience of Christian people, that when I am compelled to go for a little while amid intense worldly society I feel depressed. It is like going out of a June garden into an ice-house.

Men never know fully how to laugh until they become Christians. The world's laughter has a jerk of dissatisfaction at the end; but when a man is consecrated to God, and he is all right for the world to come, then when he laughs, body, mind and soul crackle. Let a group of ministers of the Gospel, gathered from all denominations of Christians, be together in a dining-hall, or in a social circle, and you know they are proverbially jocund.

Oh ye unconverted people! I know not how you can stand it down in that moping, bilious, saturnine, worldly association. Come up into the sunlight of Christian society—those people for whom all things are working right now, and will work right forever. I tell you that the sweetest japonicas grow in the Lord's garden; that the largest grapes are from the vineyards of Canaan; that the most sparkling floods break forth from the Rock of Ages. Do not too much pity this Ruth of my text; for she is going to become joint owner of the great harvest-fields of Boaz.

V. Once more: If we want to become Christians, we must like Ruth in the text, choose and burial. She exclaimed: "Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried." I think we all, when leaving this world, would like to be surrounded by Christian influences. You would not like to have your dying pillow surrounded by caricaturists, and punsters, and wine-bibbers. How would you like to have John Leech come with his London pictorials, and Christopher North with his loose fun, and Tom Hood with his rhyming jokes, when you are dying? No! No! No! Let me have a Christian nurse in my last sickness. Let me have a Christian physician to administer the medicines. Let it be a Christian wife, or parent, or child, that watches the going out of the tides of my mortal existence. Let Christian men come in the room and read of the illuminated valley, and the extinguishment of grief, and drown the hoarse blasts of death with the strains of "Mount Pisgah" and "Saint Martin."

In our last moment we will all be children. Said Dr. Guthrie, the famous Scotch clergyman, when dying: "Sing me a bairn's hymn." Yes, we will all be children then. In that hour the world will stand confounded around us. Our friends may cry over us; tears will not help us. They may look sad, thinking it will help them to die.

WHAT WE WANT

is radiation in the last moment. In our last moment we want that bread which came down from heaven. Who will give it to us? Oh, we want Christian people in the room, so that if our hope begins to struggle they may say: "Courage, brother! all is well! Courage!" In that expiring moment I want to hear the old songs that we used to sing in church and prayer-meeting. In that last moment I want to hear the voice of some Christian friend pleading that the sins and shortcomings of my life may be forgiven, and the doors of heaven may be opened before my entranced spirit.

"Come sing to me of heaven,
When I'm about to die;
Sing songs of holy ecstasy,
To waft my soul on high."

Yes; Christian people on either side the bed, and Christian people at the foot of the bed, and Christian people to close my eyes, and Christian people to carry me out, and Christian people to look after those whom I leave behind, and Christian people to remember me a little while after I am gone. "Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried."

Sometimes an epitaph covers up more than it expresses. Walking through Greenwood Cemetery I have sometimes seen an inscription which impressed me how hard the sculptor and friends were trying to make out

A GOOD STORY IN STONE.

I saw from the inscription that the man or woman buried there had died without hope. The inscription told me the man was a member of Congress, or a bank president, or some prominent citizen, but said nothing about his soul's destiny. The body is nothing. The soul! The soul! And here by this inscription I see that this man was born in 1800 and died in 1875. Seventy-five years on earth, and no Christian hope! Oh, if in all the cemeteries of your city the graves of those who have gone out of this world unprepared should sigh on the wind, who would have the nerve to drive through such a place? If all those who have gone out of this world unprepared could come back to day and float through this air, telling the story of their discomfiture, this audience would fall flat on its face, asking to be rescued from the avalanche of horror.

My hearers, do you wonder that this Ruth of my text made the Christian's choice and closed it with the ancient form of imprecation upon her own soul, if she ever forsook Naomi: "The Lord do so to me and more also, if I aught but death part thee and me." They were

TO LIVE TOGETHER.

Come the jackals, come the bandits, roll on Dead Sea! My hearers, would you not like to be with your Christian friends forever? Have there not gone out persons from your household whom you would like to spend eternity with? They were mild and loving and gentle and beautiful, while here. You have no idea that the joys of heaven have made them worse. Choose their Christ, and you may have their heaven. They went in washed through the blood of the Lamb, and you must have the same glorious ablation. With holy violence I put my hands on you to-day, to push you on toward the immediate choice of this only Saviour. Have Him you must, or perish world without end. Elect this moment as the one of contrition and transport. Oh, give one intense, earnest, believing, loving gaze into the wounds opened for your eternal salvation!

Some of you I confront for the first and the last time until the judgment, and then we shall meet. Will you be ready?

BETWEEN FIRE AND EARTHQUAKE.

THE reports of the appalling volcanic eruption in New Zealand, contained in the local newspapers, are full of pathetic incidents. One of them is the following:

Mr. Edwin Bainbridge landed in New Zealand two weeks before the eruption. He was on a tour around the world. When he reached Auckland he attended some Gospel meetings at the Sailors' Rest, where he met the Hon. Mr. Waldegrave, through whom he had received blessing about four years before at Cambridge.

The eruption commenced suddenly about midnight on June 9th, and overwhelmed the village of Wairoa, ten miles distant from the volcano, with showers of mud and dust, which crushed the houses. A gentleman who was staying at the temperance boarding-house at Wairoa says he was awakened by a violent roaring, which continued for some time with a lull every four or five minutes. He listened for a little while, and then with two others went to see what he then knew was a volcanic eruption. They were soon forced to return, as the black cloud which covered the top of Tarawera was extending in their direction. Scoria and burning materials were falling from it, and lightning was flashing in every direction. Outside the house they met the other boarders, and they at once re-entered for shelter. The wind was shaking the house, and it began, as they thought, to rain, but they soon found that it was a rain of ashes and stones. About two tons of sand came through the roof, and clearing all before it lodged on a staircase within a yard of where they were gathered. Looking out, they saw a fire on the other side of the road, and a larger one at a house to their right. They could not render assistance, but stood between earthquake and fire, expecting death.

Mr. Bainbridge asked if any present would like to pray, and all consented. He then read the account of the salvation of the thief on the cross, and offered prayer. He spoke for a few minutes afterward, and said this might be the last hour of their lives, and they might at once be ushered into God's presence; but He was able to save and deliver them in that extremity. If any of them were delivered, he hoped it would be a turning-point in their lives. Immediately afterward, as the party were trying to get out of the house to reach a safer place, the veranda fell on him, and he died instantaneously. His last words had been words of testimony for Christ.

CURING A CHINESE ARISTOCRAT.

MRS. PIGGOTT, of the China Inland Mission, thus describes an interesting case of opium cure: "The servant of a Mandarin, at Shansi, was cured of opium-smoking recently, and she was so delighted that she went home to the Yamen and told them how very well she had been cured, and how little she had suffered, and what a good thing it was to be cured of opium-smoking. Through her influence one of the elder sons of the house came and was cured, and so also was a daughter-in-law. The daughter-in-law thought that the best thing she could do was to come to me, because they like to do things there indirectly; so she did not go straight to the Opium Refuge, but came, and, as an intermediary, asked me to accompany her and to intercede for her that she should have very good medicine. She came first of all to pay a visit of ceremony, and I tried to encourage her; she was rather nervous, fearing that she would have to be shut in and not allowed to go out, however ill she felt. I called to see her, and told her a little more about it. At last she called on me again, and said that her brother-in-law had told her that we should prick her with a needle as big as a knitting-needle, and she was afraid. I said that this was quite a mistake, and that she would not be pricked at all. She came and was cured, and just the day before I left she came to express her gratitude, and brought us two little presents, which she said were her own work—a fan-case for my husband, and a little scent-bag for me. She wished us to come and have dinner with her. This was very kindly meant on her part. She put up a tablet in the Opium Refuge—a large board with a few characters to show other people when they come that she had been cured, so that they might be encouraged to follow her example. This is only one instance, but this was the first lady of rank we had. We find that a good many after they had been cured of opium-smoking, come regularly to the service on Sunday, so that some have remarked that really it was delightful to see all the people flocking into the service; it reminded them of an English Sunday."

A PILGRIMAGE IN INDIA.

A RESIDENT of India who has recently been staying at Nasik, the Mecca of Western India, sends a description of the hardships the Hindoo pilgrims endure in the hope of saving their souls and those of their families. He says:

"Last year was one of special sanctity. Every twelfth year, when Jupiter enters the sign of Leo, the Ganges itself is supposed in some mysterious way to flow down the Godavery bed, and pilgrims come in thousands from all parts of India. Each pilgrim as he enters the town has to pay a small tax, and the receipts showed that two hundred thousand people had come and gone in the last eleven months. The stream of life was just as unceasing while I was there. At certain points near the town they are met by the Brahman priests, who make large fortunes out of their pious visitors. There are about five hundred special Brahmans, called Upadhyas, who keep large lodging and boarding-houses, and claim to be the family priests of all pilgrim families.

"The victim is marched off to the Brahman's house, where he will find at least a hundred and fifty others. His bag of laboriously gathered rupees, hoarded for this supreme occasion, comes out, and a system of fees begins, which goes on until the pilgrim leaves or the bag is empty. After the first fee is paid the various functions of the pilgrimage begin. He has first to fast for twenty-four hours, after which he goes to one of the many temples on the river bank with offerings of rice and flowers and clarified butter. Then, tired and exhausted with toil and travel and want of food, he is led into the river, and the fees begin again. Masonry pools have been erected in the bed of the stream for the bathers when the river runs dry; one pool is more sacred than another, and each fresh bathing-place requires a special fee. He wishes not only to purge himself from sin, but also to free the souls of his ancestors. This again requires a special fee. The certainty of salvation, whether for himself or his fathers, entirely depends on the amount of his gifts. At last he is led out of the water, after hours of exposure, and he walks to the house in his wet clothes, poorer in worldly wealth.

"Our friend is next off to Trimbuk, the sacred source of the sacred river. He is jolted there is a bullock cart, or has to walk, according to the state of his rupee bag. At Trimbuk he bathes again, but this time not in the stream itself, but in a tank through which the river is supposed to flow. Here he must not only bathe but drink the water, almost, if not quite, stagnant water, where literally thousands have washed. The Collector of Nasik once took a bottle full of this water and showed it to some of the leading Brahmans of the town. It was full of organisms. They needed no microscope, they were plainly visible to the naked eye. His pious friends only shrugged their shoulders, and said that Paradise was worth gaining even at that price. There is not a pilgrim who comes but he honestly believes himself to be purified from sin by this bathing and drinking. There is an air of weary content on all their faces when the pilgrimage is over, and they squat on the station platform patiently waiting for the train that will take them home again. Yet they have all left the earnings of years behind them, and have nothing to show for it save the little hermetically sealed brass cup of the holy water which each carries back to his friends. There is something else, unfortunately, they too often carry away with them. These pilgrim years at the various river sources and other holy places of India are not only the signal of cholera at the place itself, as was the case at Nasik last year, they are also the means of distributing the disease all over India."

BACK ON THE OLD ROCK.

IN one of Mr. Spurgeon's talks with his students, he said: "A popular and successful young minister in America became entangled in the meshes of infidelity, left the pulpit, joined an infidel club, and derided the name he had preached to others as the Saviour of the world. But he sickened, and came to his death-bed. His friends gathered round him, and tried to comfort him with their cold and icy theories, but in vain. The old thought came back to him—the old experience came before him. He said, 'Wife, bring me my Greek Testament.' Upon his bed he turned to the fifteenth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. When he had finished the chapter great tears of joy rolled down his cheeks. He closed the book, and said: 'Wife, back again at last upon the old rock to die.'"

A FRIEND AT COURT.

MR. G. F. EASTON, writing from Han-Chung Fu, says: "This station was opened in 1880, by Mr. George King. At that time I was in Kan-suh trying to rent a house for Mr. King, while he had gone to be married. He started from Han-kow not knowing where he was going to live, but trusting that the Lord would provide him a home. When he reached Han-chung on his way to Kan-suh, the news was very soon sent to the magistrate that a foreigner had arrived. His card being sent, the magistrate saw that it was a Mr. King, and immediately said: 'I wonder whether it is my old friend Mr. King, whom I knew at Si-ngan some years ago.' Upon inquiry he found that it was the same Mr. King. He said, 'I should like to see him, and I should like to know what he is going to do.' Having found that Mr. King would like to remain there for a short time, the magistrate said: 'Will you just go round the city and see which house you would like, and let me know, and you shall have it.' We have never had among the officials such a friend as that before or since. It was a most unprecedented case. Mr. King took him at his word, and went, and found what he thought would be the most suitable house. The magistrate was true to his word, and saw that it was secured without any difficulty. He would not allow any pressure to be put on by the landlord or middle man. Our brother settled there, and from that time a very good work has been going on. He immediately commenced daily preaching. The rooms were very suitable, and the people came in great numbers to see the foreigners. There were about two hundred in front of the house from morning till night. Mr. King preached morning, noon, and night."

THE DAYS OF THE SON OF MAN.

By Rev. W. Haslam, M.A.

Meaning of the Phrase—The Time—Their Character—Days of Violence—A Common Mistake—Three Questions—Differences in the Evangelists—Two Temples and Two Cities—Interval between them—The Questions Answered—The Alleviation.

THE "days of the Son of Man" are the closing days of this dispensation. They begin at the time of the rapture of the saints of God to the heavenlies, and will continue until the Lord Jesus comes from the heavenlies to the earth with His saints in manifested glory. He will come then "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Thess. 1:8).

The character of the days of the Son of Man will not correspond with the fond dream of those persons in our dispensation who expect that the world is to be converted and become better by the preaching of the Gospel. It is well to understand that the Gospel of Grace which is preached now, is not for the conversion of the world, but for the gathering out of it a people for the Lord's name. (See Acts 15:14.)

The days which are coming are to be like those which preceded the judgment of the flood. We have this fact on the testimony of the Lord Himself (Luke 17:26). The Lord will then take to Himself the governmental power which hitherto has been delegated to men. In spite of their wilfulness and rebellion, He will bring them into subjection.

It is quite in accordance with the sanguine character of human nature and expectation to overlook suffering in anticipation of the glory which is to follow it. Looking for the morning, men too willingly overlook the night which is to precede it. The Lord's disciples fell into this mistake. According to the traditions in which they had been educated, they were "waiting," even then, for "the Kingdom"—"waiting for the consolation of Israel" (Luke 2:25), before their troubles had begun! When they saw the Lord entering Jerusalem in triumph, they doubtless thought they could understand that, for it was quite in agreement with their views. They probably went on to think that the Lord was "come to His temple" (Mal. 3:1), and "that the kingdom of God should immediately appear" (Luke 19:11). But day by day their disappointment increased, as they saw that the rulers of the Jews would not receive their King.

Their amazement became very great when the Lord departed from the temple for the last time, and this with manifest sorrow. We read that "His disciples came to Him to show Him the buildings of the temple" (Matt. 24:1). These had recently been restored and beautified at great cost by Herod. The disciples had doubtless thought among themselves that these preparations had been made, not for Herod, but for the rightful King. How great was their astonishment therefore when the Lord said, "See ye not all these things? Verily, I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down" (Matt. 24:2).

HOW COULD THIS BE?

From hence they followed their Master in perplexity and silence, until they came to the Mount of Olives. There the weary Lord sat down in full view of the glittering towers and pinnacles of the devoted city and temple. We read that "as He sat upon the Mount of Olives the disciples came unto Him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of Thy Coming, and of the end of the world?" (Matt. 24 : 3). These were especially Jewish. It will be observed that they all concern the temple at Jerusalem, and the Coming of the Lord to reign upon the earth, and there establish, not the Church, but the kingdom of Israel. St. Luke's Gospel, which is written for us Gentiles, tells of the destruction of that very city upon which they were then looking. It was to be besieged by the Roman armies and captured; the temple destroyed; and the Jews carried away captive to all nations. Jerusalem was to be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled. (See Luke 21 : 24.)

St. Matthew's Gospel, which was written for the Jews, also gives the Lord's answer to the three questions stated above. But it should be noted that these answers refer to another temple than that one standing before them. It is one in which the image of Antichrist, the desolator, is to be set up. There is an interval of two thousand years between this temple and the one to which St. Luke refers. The one city was to be captured; and the other city, when it is on the eve of being captured, is delivered by the Lord's manifest Coming in the heavens. In the one case the Jews are dispersed to all nations; in the other they are reconciled with the Lord. These two cities and temples must not be confused, if we would understand the words of the Lord's prophecy.

In reply to the first of these three questions, When shall these things be?

THE LORD ANSWERED,

"Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven; but my Father only" (Matt. 24 : 36).

In answer to the second question, What shall be the sign of Thy Coming? by which the disciples evidently meant the Lord's manifest Coming to take the kingdom, He gave them

THREE SIGNS :

First, He said, "Take heed that no man deceive you : for many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many" (Matt. 24 : 4, 5). This period corresponds with the opening of the first seal. (See Rev. 6 : 1, 2.) Second, After this follows another sign, "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places" (Matt. 24 : 7). These events agree with the opening of the second, third, and fourth seals. (See Rev. 6 : 3-8.) "These," we are told, "are the beginning of sorrows. Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you; and ye shall be hated of all nations for My name's sake" (Matt. 24 : 8-13). All these terrible events, and others mentioned up to the twenty-eighth verse, are prefigured to take place under the opening of the fifth seal.

The third sign is given in these words : "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken" (Matt. 24 : 29). These physical signs, the shaking of the earth and the heaven, take place under the opening of the sixth and seventh seals.

Then as to the third question, What shall be of the age or dispensation? here again the Lord gives us three signs : (1) The restoration of the Jews to their land, under the figure of the fig-tree (Matt. 24 : 32, 33). (2) The Christian Church, under the figure of the ten virgins (Matt. 25 : 1-13). (3) The days of the Son of Man, under the figure of the man who went out travelling into a far country, and after a long time returned to reckon with his servants (Matt. 25 : 14-30).

The Lord, as if to alleviate the perplexity of His disciples, tells them that though all these unexpected events must needs transpire, the covenant with Abraham is not forgotten. The Jews, as God's people, are still to be reinstated, and to have their place and nation. When the fig-tree springs up again—that is, when the people are in the land, and their daily sacrifice is resumed—then the Lord will come to His people and restore their kingdom. "This generation," or race of Abraham, "shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. 24 : 34, 35). The branch of the Jewish olive-tree which was broken off is to be grafted in again. (See Rom. 11 : 23, 24.)

CHRISTIAN FRATERNITY.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

Three Great Facts—A Southern Prisoner's Dread—Insignificant Workers—Where Heaven is—Sectarianism.

"I know thy works, and thy labor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil. . . . Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love."—REV. 2 : 2, 4.

"WHEN I read this text I realize that it is the great I Am, the great God over all, my Maker, who shall finally be my judge. The mere reading of this ought to bring us all to our feet and then to our knees in earnest prayer. I know thy works; God knows us all. I believe I would be considered orthodox enough if I were to assert that God made you and me and everybody, and surely if He made us, He knows us through and through. He knows me. He knows who my mother was, for He heard her earnest prayer for me. He knows who my father was. He knows who my wife is and who my children are, and He watches over them by day and by night. The that confront us, are : God made me; God knows me, and God loves me, and with these three facts in mind, we ought to be all God expects us to be. It should be written over every pulpit in the land, in every household, in every office, store, and in every street, 'Thou, God, seest me.'

A Southern prisoner in the war said that the most intolerable thing about his imprisonment was, not that he was deprived of his liberty, not that he was kept away from his family, home and friends, but that in every conscious moment, wherever he went, whatever he did, the two burning eyes of the sentinel were upon him. As one sentinel went off duty and another came on, the latter's eyes were fixed on him before the former's were taken off. He was forever the object at which two eyes were looking. It was intolerable—awful. Brethren, if the eyes of those sentinels grew intolerable to that man, if your life is not right, how awful must be God's eyes to you. Everything you do He sees and analyzes, and the most precious fact in this world is that He does see and understand everything we do.

I am so glad that he is to be my judge and yours. We frequently misunderstand each other, and misconstrue motives. None of us are perfect at our best, and we only see each other's faults and mistakes; but He sees all, and knows when we are trying to do right and obey Him. To a good man the sweetest fact in the world is that the God who made him and knows him through and through will be his final judge. It must be sweet to know that God knows him, and will expose the hypocrisy and shams of an unfruitful life. Nothing is hid before the eyes of Him. Some men are doing a great work and some a small work, but I want to say that there is nothing, however small, in the way of good conduct, too little for him to see. I have thought many a time that while the great Shepherd went into God's harvest-fields like a mighty machine, and gathered thousands of sheaves, that even we who gather only a single head, still are working for heaven, and will get our reward. A few days ago, as I walked around a locomotive engine and admired its wonderful structure, I saw the engineer get down and oil all the parts, great and small, from the same can, and that all the parts were essential to the perfect whole, and I said to myself : "Glory to God that I, whether great or small, can get some grace from Thy great storehouse, and it is, indeed, a blessed privilege."

There are preachers about whom a great deal is said and written in public and in the newspapers. I don't know whether that is fortunate or unfortunate, but I do know that there are a great many people about whom nothing is said in the papers or in public, who, in the final judgment of God, will be given a very high place. There is many a poor pastor, earnestly striving to serve God and save souls, who, in the great hereafter, shall reap his reward. Then, again, you may find a woman who goes about doing good, caring for the sick, helping the distressed, going along in an earnest, humble way. Sister, man's eye may not see you, but God's does.

Look at these ministers here to-day—the chaplains of prisons. They have cut loose from all the freedom of the world to labor among the lost and fallen in prisons. There is no more Christly work than this—giving up your life's work to save those whom society has cast out. The happiest life a man ever lived in this world is one of self-sacrifice. Happiness consists in making others happy. Once there was a preacher who preached on heaven, and after the service, an old, rich Methodist, a backslider, came to him and asked him and he said : "Up there on the hill is a poor widow, down sick with the fever, and with her child sick, too, and they haven't anything to eat in the house, and nobody to help them. Now, you go and get a wagon load of provisions and take it up there, and hire a cook and a nurse for her, and then read the twenty-third Psalm and pray with her, and you will find heaven easy enough." Well, he did it, and he came back the next day, and said to the preacher : "I saw it, after I had done all you told me; God and the angels seemed to come down in that house and I was in heaven for more than fifteen minutes." Brethren, heaven is all around you and about you.

I tell you the time has come when we ought to lay aside our little differences and go to work for Christ. When I wrote to Brother McConnell about coming here, I said to him : "Get all the pastors in the city to help us save souls." Christian fraternity—that's what we want. I am glad we have all classes of Christians, so that no sinner in perdition in hunting for a chance to join couldn't find one to suit him. Some want a church in which they can dance, play cards and drink whiskey. Well, I can find it for 'em, but be careful, brother, when you get on that train that you don't go to hell. I want to get on God's to glory and keep my seat 'till I get there; no little branch lines for me.

If there is a drop of sectarian blood in my veins, I want a lancet popped in and the muddy stuff let out. I like church pride well enough. I wish Methodists had more of it. If we had it like the Presbyterians, we would pay our preachers better, and if like the Baptists, we would stick together better. Take those three churches and you can make a mighty good one out of them. Take Presbyterian respectability and generosity; Methodist git-up-and-git-ativeness, and Baptist fidelity, and we would make things hum. Methodist fire, Baptist water, and Presbyterian hold-on-to-what-you've-got is what we want. There is a big work for the Church of God in this country, and it is time for us to roll up our sleeves and go to doing it.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Release of Editor Cutting and the Remission of his six hundred-dollar fine is expected to take place this week. A dispatch from El Paso states that the Supreme Tribunal of Mexico has decided that the two months' imprisonment already suffered by Cutting shall be considered a complete purgation of his offence. If this news is confirmed it will not settle the difficulty between the two countries, though it may allay the war-like excitement on both sides the border which made a settlement difficult. The Supreme Tribunal specifically reaffirms the principle that it is legitimate for a Mexican court to punish a foreign citizen for crimes committed on foreign soil if a citizen of Mexico is a sufferer by them. While this principle is maintained there will be constant danger of international difficulties, and possibly in cases which will enlist the sympathies of the American people, which Cutting's case has not done. It will be necessary, therefore, for the State Department to lose no time in arranging a treaty to preclude complications of this kind in order to avoid the danger of a war.

The Capture of Geronimo Near Arispe by the Mexican authorities is reported. It is stated in a dispatch from Nogales, Arizona, that while negotiations were pending between the Mexican authorities and Geronimo, near Arispe, the Mexicans quietly surrounded the Indians, and that they now have them where there is no possibility of escape. Geronimo has been notified that the only terms will be an unconditional surrender. Captain Lawton has been informed, and is now moving toward Arispe. Governor Zulick, of Arizona, who is now in Washington, is urging the removal of all the Chiricahua Apaches from Arizona. He asserts that since 1878 their raids have caused the death of twenty-five hundred persons in that and the adjoining territories. The other tribes at the San Carlos Reservation, numbering four thousand five hundred and thirty-nine, he says, are peaceable and almost self-supporting. He makes no suggestion of the best spot for their location.

The Irish National League Convention Assembled in Chicago on August 18th. It was the largest representative gathering of Irishmen ever held in America. The meeting was anticipated with some degree of anxiety on both sides of the Atlantic. Perhaps the consciousness of the fact and the knowledge that any display of disunion would gratify the opponents of Home Rule for Ireland led to the proceedings being more harmonious than was expected. Messrs. Davitt, Redmond, and Deasy attended as a delegation from Ireland, and were received with enthusiasm. The election of a new president of the League to succeed Patrick Egan, which was the crucial question on which a fight had been predicted, was conducted harmoniously. The rival candidates were John Fitzgerald, of Nebraska, and Hugh C. McCaffrey, of Philadelphia. Before any vote was taken McCaffrey himself proposed, in the interest of harmony, that Fitzgerald be chosen by acclamation. McCaffrey's friends, however, insisted on a vote, and Fitzgerald was elected by 703 to 244, and, on McCaffrey's motion, the election was made unanimous. Fitzgerald is a wealthy railroad contractor, about fifty years of age, and is a close friend of Egan's. The platform adopted indorses Mr. Parnell's policy, and expresses perfect confidence in the wisdom of him and his colleagues. It also extends "heartfelt thanks to Mr. Gladstone for his great effort in behalf of Irish self-government," and expresses "gratitude to the English, Scotch, and Welsh democracy for the support" given to Mr. Gladstone's policy.

The Verdict of the Jury in the Trial of the Chicago anarchists has evoked general approval throughout the country. Socialists have met in New York and other cities to condemn it, but otherwise it is approved. There is no trace of vindictiveness in this feeling. It is simply the conviction that the use of dynamite and the defiance of the law displayed by the men convicted constitute a menace to society which must be dealt with rigorously and decisively as a warning to others. The trial, which occupied forty days, has clearly proved that the right men were captured, and though they were tried on the charge of the murder of one man only, six others are dead from the same cause, and in each case they were, therefore, equally guilty. The jury found all the eight prisoners guilty of murder, but with the discretion allowed them by the law of Illinois, they excepted the prisoner Neebe from the death penalty, and fixed his punishment at imprisonment for fifteen years; the other seven were sentenced to death.

A Destructive Inundation Caused Severe Distress at Galveston, Texas, on Friday last. A violent wind storm swept over the city at the rate of forty-five miles an hour, doing much damage and causing the overflow. The whole southern and south-eastern portion of the city was inundated, and many families were driven out and compelled to seek safety and shelter at the hotels down-town. The street railway along the beach was torn up, and the waters of the Gulf broke over the lower gallery of the Beach Hotel. At Victoria, Texas, a similar disaster was experienced. Two church steeples were blown down and two churches unroofed. The High School building and the jail were considerably damaged. Altogether about seventy-five houses were completely demolished and one hundred and eighteen more or less damaged. Few buildings escaped uninjured.

The Country Received a Shock Last Week by the awful revelations of immorality at Newark, N. J. They almost equal the disclosures made in London last year. The discovery was made through the confession of two young girls who were arrested at Coney Island, and placed in a public institution for reclamation. They attributed their ruin to a real estate agent in Newark, and alleged that he had ruined a large number of other girls, some of them the children of parents occupying a good social position. They said that he paid them about fifty cents each for every child they decoyed into his den. Some of the girls made his acquaintance at a skating rink. The man is about forty-six years old, is married, and has three children, one of them grown up and in business. Two other men are also implicated, and, with the real estate agent, have been arrested. About thirty girls, whose ages vary from thirteen to eighteen, are reported among the victims, and are detained as witnesses. They have all been regular attendants at the skating rinks. It is now discovered that, owing to the laxity of New Jersey law, the punishment for crimes such as those charged against the prisoners will, even if their conviction is secured, be ridiculously inadequate. Citizens in other States will do well to inquire into the state of their law in this matter, and if it is not stringent to take measures for making it so.

The British Parliament Reassembled on Thursday, and listened to the reading of the Queen's speech. It practically suggested to the members that they should vote the necessary appropriations and adjourn. It was inexpedient, the speech said, to further postpone financial legislation, and no recommendation would be made of any other measures. This, however, did not satisfy the House, and an attempt was made to extract from the administration some statement of the policy it intended to pursue toward Ireland. Lord Randolph Churchill, who represents the Cabinet in the House of Commons, made a vague and guarded reply. He intimated that coercion would not be proposed at present; that a royal commission would be appointed to examine and report on the working of the land system in Ireland, and another commission would report on such points as the creation of a deep sea fishery on the west coast, harbors of refuge, etc., and that after Parliament had adjourned the Cabinet intended to consider a scheme for giving local government to all the three kingdoms. Mr. Gladstone took the opportunity of informing the House that the result of the election had not changed his convictions regarding the policy it was proper to pursue toward Ireland, but had rather confirmed his strong belief that he had not erred in the main principles of his scheme.

An Ominous Coldness has been Reported in the relations of Russia with England. The Afghan boundary question which, in the spring of last year, brought the two nations to the verge of war, was committed to a mixed commission of Russian and English officers in Afghanistan, who were to agree upon a frontier line. The negotiations were proceeding slowly when the Czar announced his intention to recede from the promise made to the Berlin Conference that Batoum would be maintained as a free port. The British Government made a courteous but emphatic protest against the closing of Batoum. The Russian Government sent a curt and not a respectful reply. Lord Salisbury thereupon recalled the Afghan frontier commission as if he felt it useless to negotiate with a power which did not respect its solemn engagements.

The Abdication of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria was the startling intelligence cabled here on Sunday last. The dispatch, which is dated Sofia, Bulgaria, August 21st, says: "The populace and the troops, quartered in the capital, surrounded the palace early this morning. Prince Alexander abdicated, and was escorted over the frontier. There was no disorder. The populace then assembled and adopted a resolution praying the Czar to re-extend his sympathy to the Bulgarian people. The assemblage proceeded to the palace of the Russian agent and submitted to him the resolution, all kneeling. The agent assured them of the Czar's friendship." The new "Premier Clement," says the same dispatch, "has issued a proclamation announcing the formal abdication of Prince Alexander, who renounces the throne forever, being convinced that his reign would be fatal to Bulgaria. The Premier states that the new Cabinet will serve until the meeting of the National Assembly, expresses the hope that all parties will co-operate to maintain the law, and assures the people that the Czar will not leave the country without his powerful protection." The last statement may be relied upon. It is probably the Czar's effort to "protect" Bulgaria that has brought about the revolution. Prince Alexander was unwilling to be a puppet in the hands of Russia, and his independence made the Czar his enemy. His fall is probably due to Russian intrigue rather than to the spontaneous action of his people. The event is likely to exasperate England, who will see in it, combined with the closing of Batoum, new signs of the stealthy approach of Russia toward Constantinople.

Union Evangelistic Meetings are Being held at Manchester, N. H., in the First Baptist Church, with much success. The whole city is deeply stirred, and much good is being done in the churches and among non-churchgoers. A remarkable feature of the work is the quickening of Christians who have been leading cold, formal lives. Many have given testimony of the influence they are experiencing, and have consecrated themselves afresh to God. There is a general eagerness to enter upon new spheres of activity in Christian service, and the pastors of the city are gladdened and encouraged by receiving offers of assistance from earnest men anxious to be employed in evangelistic work. The services are being conducted by Rev. E. W. Oakes, Rev. Mr. McBride, of Brooklyn; Dr. Peck, of Boston; and Rev. Mr. Kembell.

Arrangements for a Prophetic Conference to be held in Chicago in November are being made. The committee appointed at the Memorable Conference held in New York, in 1878, have frequently been urged to call a second conference by those who remember the beneficial influence of the former one. The call has now been issued, appointing the meetings for November 16th-20th in Chicago. Several bishops of the Protestant-Episcopal Church and representatives of all the evangelical denominations are on the committee of arrangements. A programme of subjects will shortly be published. All communications on the subject of the Conference may be addressed to the Secretary, Rev. George C. Needham, Manchester-by-the-Sea, Mass.

Mr. Moody Expects to Establish his Training-School for Christian Workers in Chicago, in October. Of the quarter of a million dollars for which he asked, two hundred thousand are already promised. Mr. Moody will make a large contribution to the staff of foreign missionaries shortly. At the Mt. Hermon school, where he entertained two hundred and thirty college boys for thirty days recently, about a hundred publicly pledged themselves for the work of foreign missions.

Sunday Desecration was Checked Recently in St. Paul, Minn., by the energy of a Methodist preacher. Just as the services were about to commence one Sunday morning in the First Methodist Episcopal Church of that city, a gang of laborers arrived to do a job of street-paving in front of the church. When the pastor, Dr. Smith, heard of it, he went to them and civilly requested that they suspend the work on that day. The men refused, whereupon Dr. Smith said that unless they quitted work immediately he would have every individual laborer arrested and punished. As the preacher evidently meant to execute his threat, the men gathered up their tools and left the place.

The Death of Two Men Prominent in the Religious world occurred last week. Mr. John Dougall, the editor of the Weekly Witness, died on Thursday of heart disease. He was seventy-eight years of age, but had enjoyed excellent health up to the time of his death. Mr. Dougall was the founder of the Montreal Daily Witness, and his son, James D. Dougall, is still its editor. The desire to see a Christian daily journal published in New York was long cherished by Mr. Dougall. He tried to induce the religious public of the city to establish such a journal, and, failing in the effort, he came to New York in 1871, and himself started the Daily Witness. He struggled heroically for seven years to make it a success, giving to it his time, labor, and money without stint; but, in 1878, he was convinced of the hopelessness of the attempt, and abandoned it. Since then he has concentrated his energy on the weekly edition. The death of Dr. Kennion, the well-known street preacher, occurred on August 16th. Dr. Kennion was an English surgeon, who came to this country and led a dissipated life for several years. He was converted during the Moody and Sankey services in New York twelve years ago, and since that time has led an active Christian life. He organized a mission in one of the worst slums of New York, and frequently preached in the open air. Every Thanksgiving Day he gave a free dinner to the poor who congregated around the mission. Dr. Kennion was fifty-six years of age.

A Man Ruined by Prosperity is now in a county jail in Pennsylvania. At a recent sitting of a Philadelphia court Judge Brown had before him an ex-senator of New Jersey, who was charged with habitual drunkenness and neglect of his family. The judge sentenced him to six months' imprisonment. It is not many years since the ex-senator was a respectable, industrious blacksmith. He was much respected in the town where he lived, and when he received a legacy which, combined with his own savings, made a considerable fortune, he retired from business. Shortly afterward he was elected to the State Senate. About a year ago he drifted to Philadelphia and sought employment at the anvil. All his money was gone, he was heavily in debt, and his character was lost. He had taken to drinking and gambling when he became prosperous, and was utterly ruined. In these days the popular idea is that poverty is the worst of calamities; but, as this incident shows, prosperity is in some cases more to be dreaded (Prov. 30 : 8).

A Widow Saved the Lives of her Two Children on Thursday last by her courage and presence of mind. She was on her way from Indian Territory to her Ohio home. It is some years since she married and went West. In Indian Territory two little girls were born to her. Recently her husband died and the widow loaded her goods on a wagon and started on her long journey to Ohio. In passing the woods near Tolono, Ill., on Thursday she halted the wagon and proceeded to get dinner. The children wandered off to look around during the preparations. When the meal was ready they were out of sight. The mother's calls produced no response. She grew alarmed, and taking her rifle from the wagon went in search of them. As she entered the woods a moving branch attracted her attention. Looking up she saw a large dun-colored panther preparing to spring. Her rifle was brought quickly to her shoulder, and she fired, killing the panther. Her promptitude saved the lives of her children, who were fast asleep at the foot of the tree, all unconscious of their deadly enemy overhead. It was well for them that they had so courageous and watchful a mother. As they grow up they will be in danger from other unseen enemies, more to be dreaded than the panther, that will lie in wait for their souls. Their mother may not then be near to protect them, but they will be delivered if they seek the protection offered to all who apply for it in faith (Ps. 121 : 5-8).

The Marriage of a Couple with a Romantic history was solemnized by the Mayor of Brooklyn, N. Y., recently. Their names were Herman Krause and Anna Eeschenbach, both natives of Friederichsaw, on the Rhine. They were engaged to each other before the Franco-German war of 1870. Herman went with his regiment, and Anna accompanied his corps as a nurse in one of the Red Cross hospital wagons. Early in the campaign Herman, with a score of his comrades, were mown down by a French shell, and being supposed to be dead, he was thrown with others in a trench. Anna heard of it and, longing for one more sight of her lover, went during the night to the trench and uncovered his body. To her surprise he showed signs of life. He was sent to the hospital and he recovered. Anna's grief, however, was intense when she was informed that an injury to his skull was of such a nature that he could never recover his reason. He was sent to the asylum, and after the war was over Anna accompanied her family to America. Last fall a German physician succeeded in performing an operation on Krause's skull, which brought it back to its normal condition, and this restored her reason. He then thought of the girl who had followed him to the war and saved his life, and he never rested until he found her in this country. The marriage of the other day was the result. It was perfectly natural that the man should be eager for union with the devoted girl to whom he owed his life. It is unnatural that the same eagerness for union with Christ is not manifested by the thousands of men in Christian lands who know that He won for them eternal life (John 3 : 16).

A Disappointed Office-Seeker had a Final interview with the President at the last White House reception. When the senators and members had bidden the President good-by only a few callers presented themselves. Among them was a timid-looking young man wearing eyeglasses. As he approached the President seemed to recognize him. "I am here again," he said, as the President shook his hand. "I have been waiting for a couple of weeks for a place, and am still waiting." The President said: "You ought not to wait. I have a small opinion of a man who will wait around here for three or four weeks with nothing to do but ask for a place." The youth looked sad. "Men like you, who wait month after month, doing nothing, don't deserve a place," continued the President. "If I were you, I would take the next train for home." "I will," was all the youth could say. "Good-by," said the President, as he shook the young man's hand. The earnestness and persistency with which men seek an office which may be taken from them in four years or less is remarkable when we consider the apathy displayed in respect to the glorious privileges Christ offers to all who seek them with all their heart (Rev. 21 : 7).

A Feast to the Dead was Offered in a Brooklyn cemetery last week. It was with Chinamen the annual celebration of "Sho Yee." It is not definitely known what "Sho Yee" exactly means, but in "Sho Yeeing" the devout Chinaman is, according to a popular belief among them, sending provisions and various kinds of presents to his dead friends. Chinamen from all parts of New York drove out to Evergreens Cemetery. Before each small mound where a Chinaman was buried they placed on the ground a red wooden tray piled high with well roasted, perfumed meats. The ceremonies were performed by the devotees in absolute silence, and ended in a blaze of fire from hundreds of Chinese firecrackers, on which an urnful of rice wine was poured and blazed up beautifully. Angel messengers were expected to take the presents up to heaven, and the rice wine was a farewell drink in which they were supposed to indulge. They have yet to learn that the dead have no use for food or drink or any earthly things. We may hope that the knowledge will be imparted by the efforts being made to evangelize them. They are little likely to learn it from the lives of some Christians who toil and hoard as if they expected to take their wealth with them beyond the grave (1 Tim. 6 : 7-9).

A Perilous Ride of Three Hundred Miles was taken by a bootblack a few days ago. He was working at Kansas City, Mo., but decided to go to Louisville, Ky., where he was told he would make more money. He was unable to raise money for his fare, but climbed on the trucks of a passenger coach southward bound. When the train started he clung to the iron rods over the trucks, with his feet but a few inches above the rails. At Springfield, Ill., when the train stopped, he fell exhausted from his perilous seat. He was pulled out by the trainmen, who gave him something to eat. He again got on the truck and rode to Indianapolis. Then he went to Louisville in a similar manner. The speed of the trains was never less than thirty-five miles an hour, and it taxed his utmost strength to maintain his position. The sand and gravel whistled about his face and ears, and when he arrived at Louisville he was covered with dirt from head to foot. For the whole distance he was on the trucks, and his escape from death is almost miraculous. It is astonishing that men will incur almost any risk to improve their financial condition; yet when eternal riches are offered them they neglect the offer (Matt. 6 : 19, 20).

THE HOLY ROAD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein."—ISAIAH 35: 8.

The Predicted Return of Israel to Palestine—The Spiritual Fulfilment of the Prophecy—I. The Way to Zion—Only One—A Representative Comparison of Students—Through the Wilderness—Still in Good Condition—Its Name—A Select Way—A Plain Way—A King, a Farmer, and an Archbishop—A Safe Way—II. Our Duty—To Discriminate—To Keep to the Way—To Tell Others of it.

TWICE has Israel come back from captivity; once when the tribes came out of Egypt, and the Lord led them through the wilderness; and again when they returned from banishment in Babylon, and the Lord restored them to their land. A third return some of us believe still awaits the chosen people. In the day when the grace of God shall change the heart of Israel, the seed of Abraham shall again return into the land which God gave to their fathers by a covenant of salt. I think our text looks forward to a future age when the reproach shall be rolled away from Palestine, and her deserts shall be made to blossom as the rose. Of these future glories we say but little, for little is known by the most of us. The prophecy is, however, sufficiently clear to make us expect that the Lord will make a way for the RETURN OF HIS ANCIENT PEOPLE, and will restore unto them the joy of His salvation. I forbear all theories of prophecy just now; for I feel it more than ever necessary in this evil time to keep close to the simplicities of the Gospel, following for the present distress the beaten road of the first principles of the faith. I shall not use the telescope to look into the starry future, but rather the chart and compass, wherewith to direct our present way. I shall regard the text as having received one fulfilment in the way of salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ. If this be not the literal fulfilment of the prophecy, yet certainly it is its spiritual fulfilment, and for the moment this is the most vital matter to us. As the Saviour spake at Nazareth, so say I now: "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." Hear it, and discern its divine teaching.

I. First, then,

to the heavenly Zion, to the dwelling-place of God. Zion of old was the place of the one altar of sacrifice and the one mercy-seat where the Lord in manifest glory communed with His covenant people. Thither the tribes went up to offer their national prayer and praise to Jehovah, the God of Israel. Pilgrimage to the holy place was an important part of Israel's religious life. We, my brethren, speak of another Jerusalem which is above, and of the throne of God the Most High, to which we are wending our way. Our desire is for the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Who will bring us thither? Who will point out the road?

It is with great joy that we learn from Holy Scripture the great truth set forth in the text: that there is a way to God and heaven. "And an highway shall be there, and a way." This way from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City is still open, and still traversed by companies of pilgrims. It is noteworthy that this road is one, a highway and a way—not two highways, nor two ways. Many roads lead to ruin, but only one to salvation. Years ago,

AT THE UNIVERSITY of Utrecht, several Christian students met together from various nations, and on one occasion it was agreed that four persons, representing Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, should describe the work of grace upon their hearts. The earnest brother from New England, and the friend from the Cape of Good Hope, and the missionary student from India, all found that their stories agreed with that of a young nobleman of Holland. Scenes and circumstances widely differed, but the joys and sorrows, the struggles and the victories of each, were the same, and one hope filled every heart. It was a delightful occasion, and left upon the minds of those present a very vivid impression of the unity of the divine way, truth, and life, as these are seen in believers. We differ in the pace with which we traverse the way, but the way itself is one.

What that "way" is we learn from John 14, which we have just now read in your hearing; Jesus saith, "I am the way. No man cometh unto the Father but by Me." Believing in Jesus, we enter upon the way; receiving His Spirit into our hearts we stand in the way; following our Redeemer's footsteps we walk in the way; and holding fast to His leadership we reach the end of the way. This way, you will note, is made

THROUGH THE WILDERNESS;

"an highway shall be there"—through the deserts, where the sand is always shifting, where if the traveller once loses his bearings he is doomed to certain death, with the vulture's maw as his only sepulchre. Brethren, a way is made for us through the deserts of sin, and the wildernesses of sorrow, over hills of doubt and mountains of fear. That way runs close at thy feet, poor wanderer! though thou art now lost amid the habitation of the dragons of despair. The King's highway is made through the wilderness; every valley is exalted, and every mountain and hill is laid low.

This road has lasted now these thousands of years; it is nor will it ever be closed till all the chosen wayfarers shall have reached the many mansions of the Father's house. Conspicuous to all beholders the everlasting causeway remains unbroken and unaltered, and fresh caravans of pilgrims continually traverse it. This highway has conducted many already to God. It is said to be "a highway and a way;" it is not only a highway by appointment, but it is a way by use and traffic. It is trodden hard by ten thousand times ten thousand feet, which have joyfully and safely traversed it from end to end. Thousands of us are still on the road, and we can speak well of it; we can sing in the ways of the Lord. This, then, is the sum of what I have spoken; there is a way to God, and to heaven. Even for you who as yet have not trodden the path of peace, the way yet lies open. Will you not enter upon it at once?

But now, secondly, our text also tells us

THE NAME OF THIS WAY:

"It shall be called the way of holiness." The way to God by Jesus Christ is the Via Sacra, the Holy Road. The way of faith is not contrary to holiness, but it is the way of holiness. There is no way to heaven but by holiness. We have need to insist much upon this in these days; for together with laxity of thought and dubiousness of doctrinal teaching, there has come into vogue great looseness of morals. I say nothing as to the outside world; but I dread this declension in the Church. Professing Christians are becoming less and less strict as to their amusements. We hear of Christian ministers doing that which those who formerly occupied their pulpits never dreamed of doing themselves, nor countenancing in others. Is there to be an open door from the pulpit to the theatre? Are men to go from exercising the sacred ministry to the playhouse? Time was when this would have seemed utterly incredible. God help His Church when the leaders of religion come to this!

The way to heaven, if it be anything, is a way of holiness; and if the way we follow be not a holy way and a separated way, it is not God's way. If we follow not the way of distinction from the world, we are not following Christ. Do not mistake me, I wish to be understood even if I am charged with censoriousness and bigotry. We need to pull up every now and then, and say to ourselves, "Which out of these two courses is the right?" for in these times exceedingly clever men are crying up new roads and extolling them after some such fashion as this: "Here you have a road worthy of the period. None of your narrow ways. Be liberal, be broad; this is the road for the cultured and advanced." Your Saviour lifts His warning hand as He cries, "Broad is the way which leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat."

Thirdly, passing on, and further dwelling on our text, this way is

A SELECT WAY.

It is written, "The unclean shall not pass over it, but it shall be for those." The unclean are excluded. "Alas!" saith one, "I am unclean, and therefore the text shuts me out of the way of holiness." This is true, but it does not therefore exclude you from the possibility of salvation; for there are ways by which the unclean can be made pure. You cannot enter on this way of life except by being cleansed by the atonement, and then renewed by the Holy Spirit. By the way of atonement you can pass into this way; for the Lord waiteth to be gracious to you, and to wash you clean.

Especially at the end of our text we read that this way is for the ransomed; "the redeemed of the Lord shall walk there." If thou believest in the Lord Jesus Christ thou hast been redeemed with His precious blood, and the way of grace is thine. Is the blood-mark on thee? Dost thou look alone to Him who poured out His soul unto death on thy behalf? If so, beloved, thou art in the way, and thou mayest walk there without any fear of ever being driven out of it.

Another fact makes it very select. You that can look in the margin of your Revised Old Testaments, or indeed in the margins of the old Bibles, will find that this clause may be read thus: "He shall be with them;" that is, God shall be with them. This way of holiness is a way in which God walks with His people, revealing Himself to them, drawing them nearer and nearer to Himself, and keeping them in happy union with Himself. It is a blessed thing to think of heaven at the end; but it is an almost equally blessed thing to think of God with us on the way.

I must pass on, for time flies so swiftly, to notice one more matter about this way, and that is, that the way which God has appointed is

A PLAIN WAY.

We are bound to be thankful for a way which is suitable for common and unlearned people. You would think from some people's talk, that religion is a very difficult thing, only to be understood by the cultured few. You must be a learned scientist, or a scholarly critic, before you can understand the modern Gospel. It is not so with the Gospel of Jesus. Oftentimes learned men miss this way altogether, while simple people perceive it and walk in it. I remember the story of

in years gone by who, when he was ill, was greatly concerned about his eternal state. There chanced to come to the palace an old farmer, known to his majesty for his piety; the king called him to his bedside, and said, "Tell me, what is the faith that saves the soul?" The peasant explained it out of his heart in plain language, much to the king's comfort. The king remained ill for months, and again fell into doubt and fear. Those about him urged him to send for the Archbishop of Upsala, as a learned prelate who could allay his fears. The bishop came to the royal couch, and gave his majesty a logical and theological definition of faith in most proper terms. When he was gone the king said, "It was very learned, no doubt, and very ingenious; but there was no comfort in it for me; the peasant's faith is the faith that can save my soul." It is so. Simple truth is needful for dying men and women. I do not wonder that Dr. Guthrie, when he was nearing death, asked to have "a bairn's hymn" sung to him. The Gospel which suits little children is that which saves souls; the Gospel of the common people is the only Gospel.

The Gospel of God needs no wisdom of words to commend it; and therefore our apostle saith, "We use great plainness of speech." The true Gospel is as plain as a pike-staff. What saith the text? "Wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." Nobody will err about the way to God if he really resolves to follow that way. The Spirit of God will guide those whose hearts are set upon coming to God. It is the wayfaring man who does not err; your critic will be sure to err, your trifler cannot help erring; but the true pilgrim, the wayfaring man who is actually travelling, he shall not err. If you want to go to heaven, the way is laid down in the Scriptures, so that little children may find it; but if you only want to talk about the road, and about the stumbles of travellers in it, why then the way is difficult indeed.

A COACHMAN'S BUSINESS.

That wayfaring man may be a great fool in other matters, but he shall be no fool upon this matter. God will instruct him in vital points. The main thing is to know the most necessary truth and practice it. Our Lord said, "One thing is needful." A gentleman riding on the box-seat of a coach that was going to Bath in the old times, asked the driver, "Who lived at yonder mansion?" The answer was short, if not sweet. "I don't know, sir." The gentleman travelled on a little further, and then inquired, "Where does that canal run to?" "Don't know, sir." Again the passenger sought information, and asked, "Where does Squire So-and-so live?" "I don't know, sir." "Why, good man," said the gentleman, "what do you know?" The reply was final—"I know how to drive you to Bath, sir." Surely, that was the principal business of a coachman. Even thus with regard to spiritual things, the chief thing is to know how sin is pardoned, how a sinner is justified and sanctified. There are a thousand things which a man may not know, and he may not be much the worse for not knowing them; but not to know the Lord Jesus is to be ignorant of the path of life.

The last word of our text teaches us that it is

A SAFE WAY.

Of this I will speak more fully another time. "No lion shall be there." Plenty of lions prowl up and down the side of the road; but they cannot "go up thereon." He who keeps the crown of the causeway, though he may hear the lion roar, shall not meet it in the way. No ravenous beasts shall be found there; for the way is not to their mind. There is one lion which those who make Jesus their way need never be afraid of; that is the lion of unpardoned sin. If you are believing in Jesus Christ, your iniquities are forgiven you for His name's sake. Another lion also roars upon us, but cannot devour us, namely, temptation; you shall not be tempted above what you are able to bear. Go you onward without fearing any evil, for the Lord is with you; His rod and His staff are your comfort. No ravenous beast can harm you; for it is written, "There shall no evil befall thee."

II. Only two or three minutes remain, in which I will speak of in connection with this way of holiness. If there be such a road, let us not neglect it, lest we perish from the way when the king's wrath is kindled but a little. The first thing is carefully to discriminate in these days between road and road. Beware of false prophets. "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God." Oh my dear hearers, believe the truth, and follow the truth. Do not believe that sincerity is enough; you need truth as well. "If we are sincere in our religion," says one, "it will be all right with us, whatever that religion may be." Nonsense. You know better. If you sincerely mistake the road and go northward, you will not get to Brighton. If you sincerely drink poison, it will kill you; if you sincerely cut your throat, you will die. If you sincerely believe a lie, you will suffer the consequences. You must not only be sincere, but you must be right. Therefore, submit your judgment to the Word of the Lord.

The next thing is, that when you know the road, you should scrupulously keep in it, for many ways branch from it. Let no man draw you aside from it.

IT IS ONE STRAIGHT LINE.

Keep to it, even as the stars keep in their courses. Gird up the loins of your mind; be sober and hope to the end. May the Holy Ghost so rest upon you that you may have no wish to leave the strait and narrow way; no desire to start aside from it, even for a moment. He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.

Once more: are we in the way? Then let us be very earnest in telling other people of it. Travelling the other day by a country road the traveller wished to know the way to a certain spot. He inquired of one who sat by the roadside, but all the answer he got from him was a vacant stare, and a shake of the head. A little time after he found that the poor man was deaf and dumb. I am afraid there are many such Christians nowadays; they are spiritually deaf to the woes of others, and dumb as to giving them either instruction or encouragement. All they seem to do is to shake their wise heads, as if they knew a great deal more than they meant to tell.

"Oh," say you, "we are not deaf and dumb." Then why do you not talk of Jesus, the way? Why do you not tell others the way to heaven? Why do you not hear the cry that is going up to God everywhere for spiritual instruction? How is it that so many Christians are content to occupy their pews, but never go forth to declare what they have found in Jesus? I'll tell you why; I fear that some professors cannot tell the way because they do not know it. I asked a person, the other day, the road to a certain place, and in the politest possible manner he answered, "I beg your pardon, but I am quite

A STRANGER IN THESE PARTS."

That was a very sufficient reason for not directing me. He could not tell what he did not know. If any of you do not know the way, and are strangers in these parts, do not tell anybody; but let this mournful reflection go home to your consciences: "I cannot tell another the way to heaven because I am a stranger in these parts." God grant that we may never stretch the arm of our testimony beyond the sleeve of our experience! It shall be well for any minister if it may be written upon his tombstone, "He never preached what he did not practise."

Finally, what ought we to do in connection with this way? I would say, beloved friend, if you are not in the road, may the Lord help you to get into it this morning. "What is to be done to reach the heavenly city?" saith one. A notable divine once gave this direction: "The way to heaven is, turn to the right, and keep straight on." I would add, turn when you come to the cross; only one turn is needed, but that must be a thorough turn, and one in which you persevere. Keep straight on till you come to glory. Trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you have eternal life.

"But," saith one, "I have begun to trust Christ, but I am always afraid of myself, lest I should go back after all." This is by no means an unhealthy fear when you consider the matter in reference to your own strength; but there is another light in which to regard it. Trust in the Lord for final perseverance, and He will give it you. One thing I would earnestly recommend to you who are

and apostasy: say to yourself, "Whether or no, whether I get to Canaan or not, I will never go back to Egypt. I will die with my face toward God and holiness." The soul that can keep this solemn resolve never to return to the country whence he came out will surely reach the promised rest. No soul can perish whose eyes look toward the five wounds of Jesus crucified. He is the way, the living way, the only way, the sure way; follow Him. Oh, poor sinner! do as the blind man did who followed Jesus in the way; rise this morning, for he calleth thee. Before you leave your pew, look to Jesus! Flee along this road of refuge, this way of grace. May God the Holy Spirit help you to take to the way at once, without delay! Unto you shall be salvation, and unto the Lord of the way shall be glory forever and ever. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE Apache is the perfect, the ideal scout of the whole world. They moved with no semblance of regularity; individual fancy alone governed. Here was a clump of three; not far off two more, and scattered in every point of the compass, singly or in clusters, were these indefatigable scouts, with vision as keen as a hawk's, tread as untiring and as stealthy as the panther's, and ears so sensitive that nothing escapes them. Their chests were broad, deep, and full; shoulders perfectly straight; limbs well-proportioned, strong and muscular, without a suggestion of undue heaviness; hands and feet small and taper but wiry; heads well-shaped, and countenances often lit up with a pleasant, good-natured expression, which would be more constant, perhaps, were it not for the savage, untamed cast imparted by the loose, dishevelled, gypsy locks of raven black, held away from the face by a broad, flat band of scarlet cloth. Their eyes were bright, clear, and bold, frequently expressive of the greatest good-humor and satisfaction. Uniforms had been issued, but were donned upon ceremonial occasions only. On the present march each wore a loosely-fitting shirt of red, white, or gray stuff, generally of calico, in some gaudy figure, but not infrequently the sombre article of woollen raiment issued to white soldiers. This came down outside a pair of loose cotton drawers reaching to the moccasins. The moccasins are the most important articles of Apache apparel. In a fight or on a long march they will discard all else, but under any and every circumstance will retain the moccasins.

The other trappings of these savage auxiliaries are a Springfield breech-loading rifle, army pattern, a canteen full of water, a butcher knife, an awl in leather case, a pair of tweezers, and a tag. The awl is used for sewing moccasins or work of that kind. With the tweezers the Apache young man carefully picks out each and every hair appearing upon his face. The tag marks his place in the tribe, and is in reality nothing more or less than a revival of a plan adopted during the war of the Rebellion for the identification of soldiers belonging to the different corps and divisions. Each male Indian, at the San Carlos, is tagged and numbered, and a descriptive list, corresponding to the tag kept, with a full recital of all his physical peculiarities.

This is the equipment of each and every scout; but there are many, especially the more pious and influential, who carry besides, strapped at the waist, little buckskin bags of hoddentin or sacred meal, with which to offer morning and evening sacrifice to the sun or other deity. Others, again, are provided with aulets of lightning-riven twigs, pieces of quartz crystal, petrified wood, concretionary sandstone, galena, or chalchihuitls, or fetiches representing some of their countless planetary gods or kan, which are regarded as the "dead medicine" for frustrating the designs of the enemy or warding off arrows and bullets in the heat of action, and a few are happy in the possession of priceless sashes and shirts of buckskin upon which are emblazoned the signs of the sun, moon, lightning, rainbow, hail, fire, the water-beetle, butterfly, snake, centipede, and other powers to which they may appeal for aid in the hour of distress.

The rate of speed attained by the Apaches in marching is about an even four miles on foot, or not quite fast enough to make a horse trot. They keep this up for about fifteen miles, at the end of which distance, if water be encountered and no enemy be sighted, they congregate in bands of from ten to fifteen each, hide in some convenient ravine, sit down, smoke cigarettes, chat and joke, and stretch out in the sunlight.

A MANY-SIDED MAN.

AN "inside view" of a missionary's life is given in a letter published in the Foreign Missionary from Siam, where Mr. Dunlap is now laboring. The writer thus describes that missionary's self-imposed, multifarious duties:

His house is beset with a daily swarm of visitors. Some are in trouble and come to him for help. Some are inquirers coming to learn more about the Christian religion. Some have got into quarrels and come to him to settle them. He must have a wonderful hold on these people, for, though of course he has no power whatever to enforce his decisions, both parties are generally ready to abide by them. He is thus often the means of preventing a lawsuit or a divorce. He also has charge of the finances of the station. He superintends the native assistants in the hospital, and not infrequently is called to visit patients several miles away. Then he must make long itinerating tours. As often as may be, he must visit all the churches at the out-stations. When not away he preaches here twice each Sabbath and conducts services during the week. And, in addition to all these, he gives some time each day to teaching a number of young Siamese, whom he is educating for the ministry. A man who combines in his single person the duties of a banker, a judge, a doctor, a pastor, a travelling evangelist and a whole theological faculty, is not likely to have much idle time.

THE ORANGE RIOTS IN BELFAST.

(See Illustration.)

ALL who have read the cable reports of the scenes of riot and bloodshed which have been witnessed during the past month in Belfast must have become aware that Ireland is a country difficult to govern. Many persons have inferred from Mr. Spurgeon's observation that "it would not be right to desert the loyal people of Ulster," and from the speeches of Tory and Whig orators that the loyalists of Ireland were peaceable, inoffensive, law-abiding people, who were in danger of being massacred by their Roman Catholic neighbors. Yet before the echoes of those speeches have died away comes the report that the loyalists themselves are rioting and trying to kill, not only their Roman Catholic neighbors, but the police and soldiers who represent the Government to which they are so enthusiastically loyal.

The people of America have been surprised by the reports. We were prepared to hear that the Nationalists, maddened by disappointment at the defeat of the Home Rule bill, had committed stupid crimes in their anger, but it is amazing that the victors in the electoral struggle should be making disturbances. It seemed that, having secured the perpetuation of English rule, we might expect from them peace and contentment, with, perhaps, a little magnanimity; but they have fought with a ferocity which could not have been greater had they been smarting from defeat at the polls. After this it will only excite ridicule when Lord Randolph Churchill and the Liberal traitors represent them as lambs in the midst of wolves.

Rioting commenced on July 13th, and for about two weeks the police vainly strove to quell the disturbance. Their plan was to keep the Protestants and Catholics apart. They reside chiefly in different quarters of the city, and the police, by occupying the open spaces between those quarters, hoped to prevent bloodshed. They were, however, assailed by the Protestants with stones and bullets, and were obliged to retreat. When they evacuated the open spaces there was a collision between the Catholics and Protestants, who fought with equal ferocity. The Catholics were overpowered, and the Protestants sacked their houses, paying special attention to the rum shops, the contents of which inspired them to further acts of lawlessness. It finally became necessary to send for soldiers. Their arrival overawed both parties for a time, but the riot soon recommenced. The officers were fired at from the houses, and wherever they made a stand they were attacked. The open space known as "the brick-fields" was the scene of the most severe struggle. Head Constable Gardiner was shot in the neck and killed. A soldier named Hughes, seeing a youth with a smoking revolver in his hand in the direction from which had come the shot that killed Gardiner, attempted to arrest him. The lad's father shot the soldier through the heart.

How many persons have been killed in the riots it is impossible to estimate. Each party has secretly buried its own dead, and has preferred to have the wounded cared for by private surgeons rather than to send them to the hospitals, where they might be arrested and tried. The town is still held by the military, and no one is sanguine enough to hope that the disturbances are at an end.

The responsibility for the outbreak cannot be fixed with confidence. The reports that have been cabled over contradict each other. Party feeling runs very strongly even among the judges and officials. It is certain, however, that the houses sacked belonged in nearly every case to Roman Catholics; but whether the Protestants were the aggressors or avengers is a question difficult to determine. Indirectly, the Protestants have helped the cause they have at heart, though at the expense of their moral character. The riot will lead many persons to believe that it would be dangerous to entrust the Irish with self-government. Both sides in this unhappy conflict have displayed a contempt for the law and its representatives which augurs badly for the peace and prosperity of the country under Home Rule.

THE PARIS CHIP-SELLER.

A CHRISTIAN worker who was a student in Paris in his young days relates an incident full of pathetic interest. He says: There used to come about the college a short, thick-set, uncouth fellow of prodigious strength, who was called by the students "Big Maffin." Some said he was half-witted, and made fun of him. It might be true, for he had the sullen, scared look that is often noticed on the faces of partially demented persons. I felt a great deal of pity for the young man, and once or twice was successful in rescuing him from the crowd of jeering lads who persecuted him.

One night I succeeded in having him into my room and getting him to give me some account of himself. I learned that his father had been dead four years, that his mother was bed-ridden, and that he was her sole support. I found that his life was one of great suffering, and that his rough exterior concealed a truly noble soul. He was shy and uncommunicative, but the look of deep feeling which came into his face when he spoke of his mother led me to believe that both mother and son were warmly attached to each other.

Maffin rose from his chair when he heard the clock strike nine. "I must go!" he said, moving toward the door. But just as he was crossing the threshold he stopped abruptly, and turning toward me, jolted out the words, "You are good! There!" Then, as if he had insulted me and was anxious to escape, he rushed down the stairs as rapidly as he could go, and the noise of his wooden shoes was like an avalanche going through the house.

I resolved to know more about the strange pair, and accordingly the next day I set out to visit the quarter in which Maffin told me that he and his mother lived. I found the house with some difficulty, and made my way to a little low garret, perched on the top of three storeys. A woman's voice said, "Come in!" and there, lying on a poor pallet on the floor, covered with a thin coverlet, was Maffin's aged mother. I was speechless at the spectacle of such evidence of unsuspected misery.

"What do you want, my good gentleman?" she said. "You are very much afflicted, Madame Maffin," I answered, coming nearer to her. "You know me, then," she said, "since you call me by my name?" "I know your son," I replied; and proceeded to tell her how much interested I had become in Maffin, and that, hearing he had a sick mother, I had wished to see her and to bring her some help; adding a few cordial words about her son's goodness, patience, and industry. "Ah," she said, with emotion, "there are not many like my son! They say he is ugly, and has no brains; but we love each other so much, John and I. When he comes home after his long journeys and hard work, he is so glad to be with me again. He nurses me with such care that my heart is filled with joy, and I say, 'Thank God for my good son!'"

I placed a little gift in the poor woman's hand, spoke to her about the love of Jesus, and of the heaven He has gone to prepare for those who love Him. The effect was electrical. The old woman's face lighted up; a smile spread over her features, and her dark eyes glowed with brilliancy. Raising herself on her elbow, and pointing upward, she said, "I shall soon be there. The good Jesus is saving a place for me. I know I am going, and I am glad. I shall not be hungry or cold any more. He was one of us poor people when He was here, and He knows how it is with us." In a voice wonderfully clear and musical in so old a woman, she sang, "Just as I am, without one plea," and her soul seemed to rise with the words.

I lost sight of the cheerless room in the glory reflected in the face of the aged sufferer to whom Christ seemed so near. I read a chapter to her, and offered a short prayer. As I bade her good-by she held my hand tightly in hers, and said: "Thank you for coming. It is good to see any one who loves the Lord Jesus."

A few days afterward I called again, but the attic was empty. A lodger who lived on the same floor told me that the pious Lucie was dead, and had been buried that morning. I went to the cemetery where they had buried her, only a few blocks away, and there, at the newly filled grave, was her son John quietly weeping. He looked up as I laid my hand gently on his shoulder. I said, "She is not here, my poor fellow; she is in heaven, quite happy now."

"Yes, sir," he said, "I know. She was very good. The good God has taken her. It is well, but it is sad for me. Oh, sir, I want my mother!"

"You will go to her, will you not?" I asked him. "You know the way?"

"She told me to love the Lord Jesus and to pray to God to lead me. I shall do that."

"Here is a little Testament," I said, giving him mine. "Read it, it will tell you the way."

"I will, sir; I learned to read before we became so poor. See, I can read it easily," and he turned to the 14th chapter of John, and read his mother's favorite passage.

Before I left Paris I saw John again. Some kind friends had bought him a donkey and cart, and he seemed to be prospering. He said again how he wanted his mother, but I found that he was looking forward with confidence to joining her in the better land, and was comforted.

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

Vigorous Combat.

THE young people entered Miss West's parlor, and as if in truce to the serious discussion which had occupied them by the way, the young lady chatted lightly as she threw off her wraps.

"Have you ever been to the I—State University?" she asked, as she took a seat.

"I never have," he answered.

"Well, I made a trip there a year or so ago. They have a lively institution—splendid literary advantages. Their museum is excellent. By the way, among other things, they have the cast of an immense mastodon, about twice as long as this parlor—yes, more. It was a wonderful creature. Scarcely any one who had not seen it would credit that such animals ever lived on the earth. But," looking up with a bright, winsome glance, "I suppose you would believe it. That is, if you believe my assertion that I saw it."

He looked up surprised, and said, "Why, Miss West, of course I believe it."

She bent forward, and her brilliant eyes beamed upon him earnestly as she said, "Mr. Ransom, I'm just as certain of my religious experience as I am that I saw that cast."

"You certainly are the queen of strategists," he said. "I must confess that that was shrewdly done. But the difference is, the fact of the cast's existence can be easily tested. It is something we can apprehend very plainly with the senses; whereas the other matter is all mystical and maybe imaginary."

"And have we a consciousness only of sensuous things? Are we not conscious of pure mental and spiritual facts as well? Do you not know that you think?"

Driven to this point, he might have gone to the very climax, or, rather, the lowest depth of scepticism; but with that girl before him, a real, lovable fact, he could not descend to the sensational philosophy and its logical outcome, universal doubt. It is a good thing, when we are tempted to theorize away every vestige of truth, to have a real fact before us. So this girl-fact, with her soul beaming in her face, saved our young sceptic from that descent that night. So he turned the current of the conversation a little.

"Let me tell you how this experience comes," he said. "People have their feelings aroused by sensational, at least emotional preaching, their fears are excited, they are 'under conviction,' as they say, they 'struggle' awhile, but cannot get peace until, worn out bodily and mentally, reaction takes place, they give up the struggle, and then they say they have found peace, and being familiar with the testimony of others, and so knowing what they are expected to say, they use the stock phrases which to my ears savor of cant. A man can find rest in almost anything if he simply resigns himself. 'Only believe,' they say, and when a simple-minded person just gives up all reasoning on the subject, and just says, 'Oh, well, I won't think,' he gets a kind of contentment for a while. It's a natural process; there is no special revelation or divine illumination in it."

She hesitated a moment before she answered this thrust, and he almost thought he had carried off the palm; but she rallied, and said:

"You overlook something there. Why does this preaching produce such an effect? Why does this Gospel fit the human conscience so well and arouse it so often? Why is it that the human heart is so constituted that when its fears and its desires for forgiveness are aroused, and it goes to Christ and 'gives up,' as you say, it finds rest? Have you ever known any one to find a feeling of absolute certainty and sudden joy in going to the great philosophers? Are they not always in uncertainty in spite of their acutest speculations? But there are thousands—millions—who declare they have found certainty in the crucified One. Why this peculiar constitution of the human mind and this strange adaptation of the Gospel to it?"

"Indeed, that's a hard question to answer," he admitted, candidly. She continued:

"Perhaps I cannot answer it satisfactorily for you, but I think I can go further than you have gone, and give an explanation which is, perhaps, satisfactory even to the reason. We are the creatures of God, the Gospel is His truth, and He has so constituted us that we have a peculiar predisposition for His truth."

"I cannot grant the premises; for the Mohammedan seems to have a peculiar bent toward his tenets, the Buddhist toward the teachings of Gautama, the Hindoo toward Brahminism, and as for myself, I don't seem to have a peculiar bent toward any."

"Again I differ with you," she argued; "for I do not know that Christians are ever converted to Mohammedanism, except by force, or to the other religions you mention; but at the present day there are many Mohammedans and pagans who are converted to Christianity by the simple power of instruction and preaching. This shows where the bent lies. But we have left our point. You say that this experience is simply the result of action and reaction. Then, when reaction takes place, it would tend to produce nothing but lethargy, or only a state of calmness; but the result is very different. Sometimes, after the most intense agony and restlessness for days, when the change takes place, there is the most supreme rejoicing, and no evidence of weariness. According to your reaction theory such persons would be likely to go to sleep, if that isn't ridiculing. Besides, this experience is not merely indifferent resignation, but an actual, joyful trust in the Lord, and generally is followed by intense activity. However, I cannot explain this satisfactorily to one who has never felt the power of the converting Spirit."

"Why is it, then," he asked, "that these eminent men, who have investigated so much, do not find this experience? One would think they would ferret out the truth if it is to be had."

"I have my own answer to that question. I have two eminent scientists in mind, whom you admire, for I heard you speak in glowing terms of them the other evening in public. One, as you know, is an infidel, the other a Christian scientist. We will assume that they have investigated in the realms of science and mind to an equal extent. At least, you will not say the Christian scientist is behind the infidel in research. For argument's sake, we will admit that they have delved equally deep into the mysteries of matter and mind, into geology, astronomy, physics, natural history and mental science. But the Christian has been on his knees, has asked God for truth, and has discovered what is to be known there, while the infidel scientist has carefully refrained from investigating in that direction. Now, tell me which of these men has pushed his researches the further?"

Leroy was silenced, if not convinced. He burst into laughter to hide his confusion. It was certainly a new light which had never dawned upon him before. For the moment he must admit defeat. When he had opportunity to think over it quietly he believed he should see the fallacy in the argument; but there and then he had no defence to the pointed shaft.

"Miss West," he said, "you are the most original genius I ever saw. You have come down on me like an avalanche several times this evening. Say, why don't those miserable preachers present such arguments? They don't argue from bottom principles, but take all the premises for granted, and that spoils everything. How often I have gone to church saying, 'Perhaps I shall hear something that will lead me to the light to-day.' But it was always the same old story without logic, just as if there was no doubt of their theology, if they have any; and I have gone away disgusted thinking these preachers certainly have a sterile field to work upon. They had better talk about the great discoveries of science, and give the people real information. Thus they would lift men to a higher state of culture, which would be much better than continually stirring up their emotions."

"And you think that would be better for their hearers and the world at large? I should not welcome the change. I do not think the effects would be so beneficial. No amount of scientific knowledge will change the life. You may take a drunkard or a vicious man and teach him science and spend years in educating him, and there might and probably would be no reformation of his character. Go to a runaway son, who has abandoned his home and broken his father's heart, or to the daughter whose shame is bringing her mother's gray hairs in sorrow to the grave and talk of science and mental culture, and you will do no good. You know you will not. You are powerless. But let one of these poor preachers you despise go and pray, and talk of the love of Christ for the lost, and there is hope. I do not believe there lives on this earth to-day an erring man or woman whom science or culture has restored. One sermon, appealing as you say to the emotions, spoken by some poor illiterate preacher who murders grammar and knows nothing of rhetoric will do more good with God's blessing in the way of rescue and reformation of life than all the philosophical lectures ever delivered. Look to the facts. The Gospel is doing what the world wants done; it is making men better, changing the spirit and the life. They are better for it, their families are happier, and the world is purer."

"Is that so Miss West? I think the facts do not warrant the assertion. The influence of these sermons you speak of is very transient. Go into any town during a revival and you find the saloons deserted, the church and the prayer-meeting crowded, and every one in excitement about his soul, some in terror and distress, and some jubilant over assurance of salvation. Go again in six months or a year and you will find that the town has resumed its usual way of life. The saloon and the theatre are thriving again, and the church is half empty, and the prayer-meeting is languishing as before. The wave has passed, and the pendulum has swung back. These waves do not last, and when they are gone no effects remain. I do not think any man is better for passing through this experience. In fact he is often worse."

"There is too much truth in what you say," Miss West admitted. "The fault is in human nature, not in the Gospel. The Saviour warned us that we should meet with this experience in His parable of the sower. The man went scattering good seed, but only a small part was productive. Some of it, you may remember, fell on rocky ground, and that showed more rapid growth than any. It sprang up quickly, but there was no depth of soil, and it withered as quickly as it grew. So, in every revival, and in the ordinary services, there are instances of rapid development and rapid decline. The same people are impulsive in other things as in religion, and as fickle. There is no stay in them. They are more eager than any in politics or in financial pursuits, but they are the first to tire, and they leave the work to be carried on by the slow and steady workers. Of course they fall in with the religious current when it strikes them, and they drop out again as in other matters. The fault is with them, not with Christianity, which is uniformly beneficent in its operations and influence."

"We have drifted from our main point," Miss West, said Ransom; "however, I will follow the drift, because we may have other opportunities of returning to it. Taking up your new thought I demur to that too. If you examine the history of Christianity you will find that its influence has not been so uniformly beneficent as you claim. Its career has been marked by persecution, hatred, cruelty, and intolerance. It is a bad picture! The religionists all along believed in the Bible, and yet into what miserable errors they fell, and how they opposed all scientific progress. Moreover, look at some of the best men among them. There was Origen; he believed the Bible, and yet how wildly he ran into error with his allegorical interpretations; and his doctrines were the cause of a great many quarrels and schisms in the Church. Tertullian believed the Bible, and how rank the weeds of error grew in his mind. He even seems to glory in the eternal damnation of his opponents. And there was Augustine—lauded Augustine. He believed the old Book, of course, yet he held the miserable doctrine of unconditional election, besides other tenets that are perfectly untenable. Luther, the great reviver of the doctrine of justification by faith, believed the Bible, and withal he was superstitious, and believing the devil was around him all the time, he flung his ink-bottle at him, doing no further damage, however, than to make an ugly blotch on the wall. Christian as he professed to be, child of God as he called himself, his Father didn't help him to control his temper. He had to be kept away from some of the public discussions by his friends on account of his violence. Calvin believed the Bible, and thought God directed him, and yet he believed in predestination to damnation, and he had Servetus put to death, and so on."

"Yes," said Miss West; "it would not be difficult to extend the list. In all ages Christian men have been fallible and sinful. We admit it and deplore it. The Bible itself does not hide the fact. Some of its grandest characters are marred by imperfection. Moses, renowned for his meekness, fell into passion; David's sins were so horrible that we shudder at their foulness; Peter fell under the very temptation we should have thought the least likely to overcome so bold and daring a man. I grant you all that, men are imperfect; contradictory still, even after conversion. But what then? You have the material; you know what it is that you have to deal with, and you try your remedies. This remedy is by far superior to education and culture. It succeeds where they fail. It does not always succeed, but its proportion of failures is small compared with that of any other. And, besides, and this is the most weighty argument, the men who go back will tell you that it is their own fault, their own weakness that is to blame, not the religion they have given up. The men you have mentioned had to contend in addition to their natural defects, with defects of education and read into their theology the errors they had been taught. Christianity to-day is more enlightened than it was in their time, and men have a clearer view of the real meaning of the Bible than the earlier Christians had."

"I do not know about that, Miss West. I doubt whether any of them really know what the Bible does mean. Set a Roman Catholic and a Protestant, an Arminian and a Calvinist; an Episcopalian and a Congregationalist together and they will dispute with each other about its meaning. Each will contend that the Bible supports his view, and not the view of his antagonist, and will adduce passages to prove it, too. I grant you that Christianity is more enlightened than it was some centuries ago, but that is because there is more enlightened education, and Christians have shared in its benefits. Here is the great startling fact—you produce a Book which you say comes from God, and a host of men believe you. One man who has given his life to its study says it teaches one thing, another man equally erudite, equally sincere says it teaches just the opposite, and a third says they are both wrong, and the Bible does not teach what either of them claim, but something entirely different. Now, you bring me this Book about the meaning of which men differ, and taking me metaphorically by the throat, you say: 'Believe this or be—or be eternally miserable.' I say please be kind enough to settle among yourselves what the Book teaches, and then if my reason approves I will believe without any threats. If my reason does not approve how can I believe? Threats may force me to profess to believe, if my fortitude fails, but threats never produce belief."

He spoke vehemently, and with passionate earnestness, and his interlocutor looked upon him with intense pity. She had never been brought in contact with unbelief in this rank form before, and it appalled her. The earlier victories of the evening had been hers, and she was flushed with the hope that she should win this gifted but erring soul for her Master. Now this fierce, proud retort withered all her hope, and she could argue no more. Yet she yearned over the misguided man who wielded such weapons, and trusted to his own feeble intellect to decide whether the Word of the Almighty was true or false. His impiety seemed in his excitement to be passing into blasphemy, into a God-defying mood which horrified her. It was better she was sure that the interview should end then, and she rose. Looking Ransom in the face with unspeakable compassion beaming in her face, her eyes full of tears, she said:

"Mr. Ransom I utter no threats. God forbid that I or any other Christian should threaten you. I see you standing on the edge of a precipice, I see that the ground below where you stand is caving in, and that unless you escape you must be dashed in pieces. I hurry to you, not to threaten, but to tell you of your danger, and to beg of you for your own sake to fly. I point you to a path I have myself trodden; I know it is safe, and I entreat you with full confidence born of experience to make use of it. God help me, I can do no more. I will pray for you. Good-night."

JESUS THE TRUE VINE.

By Mrs M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 5, John 15 : 1-16. Golden Text, ver. 5.

The Ineffable Name—Claimed by Jesus—The Vine Brought out of Egypt—The Husbandman Caring for the Vine—Self-Care Useless and Dishonoring—Fruit-Bearing its Sole Use—The Purging of the Branches—The Foliage of Gifts and Graces—Cleanliness Essential—How the Branches are Constituted—A Defaulting Debtor—Friendship and Communion.

"I AM the true Vine." I AM was the great name by which God revealed Himself to Moses in the desert, when He said, "I AM THAT I AM" (Ex. 3 : 14). And it was the name claimed by Jesus (John 8 : 24, 58; 13 : 19). To this, His rightful name, He added names which indicated some of His offices. He said, "I AM the Bread of life," "I AM the Light of the world," "I AM the good Shepherd," just as, in the old Testament, God had said, "I AM the Almighty God," "I AM the Lord that healeth thee," "I AM the Lord which sanctifieth you."

"I am the true Vine." God had "brought a vine out of Egypt." David sings thus about it, "Thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land" (Ps. 80 : 8, 9); and Isaiah sings thus of God's care of His vine and His vineyard, "My well beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill; and He fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a winepress therein, and He looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes" (Isa. 5 : 1, 2). No amount of care or cultivation could make it other than it was; it was a type of poor human nature and could only bring forth "fruit after his kind" (Gen. 1 : 11).

THERE IS BUT ONE TRUE VINE.

Jesus Himself; and only it in us can bring forth divine fruit.

"My Father is the Husbandman;" He has the care of the vineyard and gives His place to no other. Oh that God's children would learn this! There are so many who undertake the cultivation of their own spiritual life, who make endless and severe demands upon themselves. This is equally dishonoring to God and depressing to themselves. The care of our spiritual life belongs to God. "Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature" (Matt. 6 : 27)? We cannot, by any amount of anxiety, add anything to our bodily stature, neither can we to the growth of our souls. The Husbandman, our Creator, is He "which holdeth our soul in life" (Ps. 66 : 9) and cares for and nurtures all the life which He has created. If life flags, go to the Author of life that He may renew it, for He alone can do so.

"Every branch in Me that beareth not fruit He taketh away." The experience of every Christian bears out this statement of our Lord. If we are not bearing fruit, the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5 : 22), our connection with Jesus loosens, and we are found living our own life instead of His, drawing upon ourselves, not upon Him. What will be the end of this, if it continues, He shows us later on. "Every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." The only object of the vine's existence is that it may bring forth fruit; it has no other use. "Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon" (Ezek. 15 : 3)? Just so undependable, just so useless, is poor human nature; yet God has chosen poor impotent man to

"BRING FORTH FRUIT UNTO GOD"

(Rom. 7 : 4). Yes, the very object for which He has chosen us is "that (we) should go and bring forth fruit, and that (our) fruit should remain!" Thus our fruit-bearing unto God is of primary importance in His eyes, and He will make our work for Him subservient to it. When an earnest, successful worker is doing more to evangelize others than to manifest Christ in his own life, God will find some means (sickness or circumstances) to stop him, that he may be cultivated by Him, emptied of himself, thwarted in all which would tend to exalt himself, and brought into oneness with the mind of God. If he recognizes the hand of God, he comes again to abide in it, and so again to bring forth fruit to His glory.

But there are none so tried as those who bear fruit; they are "purged;" the beautiful foliage which charms the eye, all that we naturally pride ourselves upon, is mercilessly (mercifully?) cut away, because it would otherwise absorb the moisture which must go to produce fruit. We cannot always see why God permits those gifts and graces of which we have been conscious, and which others have admired in us, utterly to break down. This is the secret, God is purging us, humbling, emptying us to make more room for Himself. Jesus says, "Herein is My Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be My disciples." We cannot be representatives of Jesus, living witnesses of Himself, His thoughts, His words, His teaching, unless we bring forth fruit. And yet how foolish would it be in a branch to try to bring forth fruit of itself! It can do nothing but receive and give. And just so is it with us.

In order to fruit-bearing we must be clean. While any sin has power over us, we are unclean. Jesus said of His disciples, "Ye are clean, but not all for He knew who should betray Him" (John 13 : 10). And yet among that company was Peter, who, the same night, denied Him with oaths and curses! Who would say that Peter was clean while that sin was upon him? Yet Jesus, at the Last Supper, called him "clean." "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." While self leaves any door open, the temptation from without can meet with the lust within, and "when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin" (James 1 : 15). Jesus said, "Already ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you." (R. V.) Who but Jesus has authority to pronounce us clean? If it were left to our own consciousness or our own conscience, those with little conscience would be boasting of their cleanness, while those with tender conscience would never be satisfied. Jesus, our great High Priest, speaks with the same authority, only greater, than did the high priest of old to the leper when he pronounced him "clean" (Lev. 14 : 7).

"NOW YE ARE CLEAN"

through the word which I have spoken unto you." We can but receive by faith, and praise God that He counts us clean.

But we are not to stop there. The cleansing of a vessel is but preparatory; it is cleansed in order that it may be used. The cleansing of a tree is in order that it may bring forth fruit. "Abide in Me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in Me." The branch is, in itself, a nothing, its very life, as well as its fruit, depends upon its connection with the vine. And just as surely are we unable to do anything really spiritual, really divine, except as we, moment by moment, abide in and depend on Jesus. How impossible it is for man, the creature, to do anything creative, yet how we may have blamed ourselves and worried ourselves because we have not found it in our hearts to love our enemies, to rejoice in things which have naturally vexed and tried us. But this fruit grows only on the true Vine, and it is not from self-expectation, but through trusting Jesus to work it in us that it is brought forth. Oh, it is so easy to ask and receive of Jesus, that He in us will love the one who has wronged us, and make us see the blessedness of His will in things which are naturally painful.

"I am the Vine, ye are the branches." We do not make ourselves branches, His Word constitutes us so; and He makes us as necessary to Him as He is to us. "He that abideth in Me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without Me ye can do nothing." Oh how blessed this is! Jesus expects nothing from us in ourselves, but everything only through our connection with Him, and so we need not expect anything from ourselves, but all from Him. Yet the privilege and responsibility of abiding in Him is ours, and terribly solemn are His words concerning those who do not abide in Him, "If a man abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered, and they gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." (R. V.) The test of real spiritual life is what it produces. A man who was very earnest in Gospel meetings, and prayed and spoke very fluently, persuaded a Christian man to advance him a considerable sum of money. He was to pay a high interest, which was all to be given to the mission work in which both were interested. Months went by, but no single payment was made, and, at last, the debtor decamped with some of the money. This man may have had some dealings with God, but no true union with Christ could have produced such fruit as this; it was no fruit of the true Vine!

"If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Jesus longs to teach us how to pray as He prayed when He said, "I know that Thou hearest Me always" (John 11 : 42), for He makes even fruit-bearing a step to answered prayer. "Ye did not choose Me, but I chose you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in My Name, He may give it you." (R. V.) He would have us take His very own place with the Father, as being members of His body, part and parcel of Himself. "Even as the Father hath loved Me, so I also have loved you, abide ye in My love. If ye keep My commandments, ye shall abide in My love, even as I have kept My Father's commandments, and abide in His love." (R. V.) "This is His commandment, that we should believe on the name of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another as He gave us commandment" (1 John 3 : 23).

Oh how wonderful is His provision for His own! He has not only given His life for us, not only purchased us pardon, liberty, healing, but also fruitfulness, power in prayer, the Father's love, and even partakership with His joy! "These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." Many Christians there are who pursue joy, as though it were the end to be gained. But joy is not Jesus. It is just the other way round—

JESUS IS JOY.

No sooner do we cease to seek joy for our own sakes, and let God speak to us about His joy in saving, delivering, restoring and watching over His children, than "the joy of the Lord" possesses us, and our joy is full. Misery, need, sin are only opportunities for God to do what He rejoices to do in saving His redeemed ones.

And now Jesus puts us at ease with Him in the most tender and delicate way, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are My friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth, but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of My Father, I have made known unto you." Thank God, it is our hourly privilege to live in the most intimate friendship and communion with Jesus, that there should be between Him and us an uninterrupted mutual understanding, and oneness of heart and spirit. Glory be to God.

AT LAST.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from ununsunned spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love divine, O Helper ever present,
Be Thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting, Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,

And kindly faces to my own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, O Father! Let Thy spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm, I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place:

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,

And flows forever through heaven's green expansions,
The river of Thy peace.

There, from the music round about me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find, at last, beneath Thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

Emerson and Prescott

The greedy grasp of monopoly is broken. The short-sighted policy of seeking $1.00 profit from each of 1,000 readers gives place to the more liberal plan of asking a few cents profit from each of a million readers, ($1.00 multiplied by 1,000 equals $1,000, but 2 cents multiplied by 1,000,000 equals $20,000). Surely the most brilliant products of American literary genius are wanted by the millions. The expiration of copyright enables me now to publish beautiful editions of some of the most famous writings of EMERSON, IRVING, PRESCOTT, and HAWTHORNE. I here describe two volumes which I offer as representative of their authors, and as specimens of new styles in book-making recently introduced by me.

In the highest civilization the book is still the highest delight. He who has once known its satisfactions is provided with a resource against calamity. Angels they are to us of entertainment, sympathy, and provocation, whose embalmed life is the highest feat of art.—EMERSON.

Life being very short and the quiet hours of it few, we ought to waste none of them in reading valueless books; and valuable books should, in a civilized country, be within the reach of everyone, printed in excellent form, for a just price.—JOHN RUSKIN.

Ideal EDITION is the name I have adopted for the new form and style in which I issue these and many other celebrated works. It is almost universally pronounced unique and beautiful, as neat and graceful as it is convenient, easy for the eye, perfect in form for hand-holding and equally well adapted for the library shelf. Description is inadequate. To be seen is to be appreciated.

If a book is worth reading, it is worth buying. No book is worth anything which is not worth much. We call ourselves a rich nation; and we are filthy and foolish enough to thumb each other's books out of circulating libraries! —JOHN RUSKIN.

Books that can be held in the hand and carried to the fireside, are the best, after all.—SAMUEL JOHNSON.

"Knowing that I loved my books, he furnished me,
From my own library, with volumes that I prize above my dukedom."—SHAKESPEARE.

Nature and OTHER ADDRESSES is the volume I have chosen to represent Emerson. It is the work which most greatly contributed to his fame. It treats of: 1, NATURE; 2, COMMODITY; 3, BEAUTY; 4, LANGUAGE; 5, DISCIPLINE; 6, IDEALISM; 7, SPIRIT; 8, PROSPECTS; 9, THE METHOD OF NATURE; 10, LITERARY ETHICS. It is printed from Long Primer type, on fine heavy paper, and bound in fine cloth, beveled boards, gilt top, for the price of 40 cents; or, in half Morocco, marbled edges, 65 cents.

Prescott's MISCELLANIES best represent this author, in the estimation of many readers, and I therefore offer, in one volume, his biographical and critical essays on: 1, CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN; 2, CERVANTES; 3, SIR WALTER SCOTT; 4, MOLIÈRE; 5, ITALIAN NARRATIVE POETRY. In typography and binding this volume is uniform with the "Nature, Etc.," of Emerson. Fine cloth, beveled boards, gilt top, price 40 cents; half Morocco, marbled edges, 65 cents.

Great OFFER. As the most effective means of advertising these and numerous other standard and popular works which I publish, I offer, for a short time only, sample volumes of the two books described, as follows: For 25 Cents a copy of EMERSON'S "Nature, Etc.," in cloth, as described, will be sent post-paid. For 40 Cents a copy of PRESCOTT'S "Miscellanies," in half Morocco binding, as described, will be sent post-paid. This gives you the opportunity of securing a specimen of each author, and each style of binding, at only nominal cost, and they will be sent as specified, only, at the reduced price—if wanted otherwise, full price will be charged.

THE death of the distinguished naval veteran whose portrait appears on the preceding page is reported by English journals just received. His long career is worthy of notice by reason not only of his eminent services to his country, but of the kind and intelligent interest he manifested in the welfare of the men under his command. It too often happens that officers of high rank, both naval and military, regard their men as machines, which can be easily replaced when they cease to be useful, and forget that they are men with souls of inestimable value, whose eternal destiny may be affected for good or ill by the influence of the officers above them in rank. That influence is a talent God has placed in the hands of every man whose official rank or commercial position gives him authority over others, and in the day of final accounting strict inquiry will be made as to how it has been employed. Admiral King-Hall realized this fact, and endeavored by speech and conduct to use it for good. Many incidents are recalled, now that he is dead, showing that he understood his responsibility, and used the influence his position gave him for the moral elevation of his men. It is evident from the success which attended his efforts that sailors and soldiers would be better men if they were always commanded by such officers as Admiral Sir William King-Hall.

HIS RECORD.

He was born in 1816, so that at the time of his death, on July 29th, he was seventy years old. His predilection for a seafaring life was manifested in his boyhood, and at the age of thirteen he entered the royal navy of Great Britain. The order of promotion in the service is slow, but after nineteen years he reached the rank of commander. That was in the year 1848, and he was then thirty-two years of age. Five years later he became captain, and in 1869 was made a rear-admiral. The next step—that of vice-admiral—was attained in 1875, and admiral in 1879.

Sir William King-Hall was not a carpet-knight. The record of his services shows that he took his share in the duties and dangers of his profession. He served in the Burman and Carlist wars, in the Syrian expedition of 1840-41, and took part in the capture of St. Jean d'Acre. He commanded the Styx in the Kaffir war and the Bulldog in the Russian war in 1853, carried Sir C. Napier's flag at the capture of Bomarsund, 1854, and in 1855 commanded the Exmouth as flag-captain to Sir Michael Seymour, being present at the bombardment of Sweaborg. During the operations in China he commanded the Calcutta, and was present at the capture of Canton and the Taku Forts, 1856-59. He was also flag-captain to Admiral Stewart on the North American Station, became Superintendent of Sheerness Dockyard in 1865 and of Devonport in 1871, and was Commander-in-Chief at the Nore 1877-79.

It is the general testimony that whatever ship this officer commanded he won the respect and devotion of every man on board. Officers and men alike united in their admiration of the courteous and gallant gentleman whose kindness and urbanity were on a par with his courage. Outside his profession he was best known as thoroughly in earnest, and a determined foe in principle and practice to the liquor traffic. Total abstaining sailors were not often met with in those days, and there was some curiosity felt by the public as to the causes which had led to the gallant officer running up the temperance flag. It was learned that it was the outcome of his regard for the men under his command. His temperance career began in

A SELF-DENYING BARGAIN.

He thus related the incident at a temperance meeting in London some years ago: "When I was in command of Her Majesty's ship Russell at Falmouth, there was a great deal of drunkenness in the ship, and in consequence much crime and punishment. This arose from the numerous temptations which abound in that port, Falmouth being a port of call, where ships touch for orders; and on one occasion I counted as many as four hundred sail at anchor at one time. The place abounded in drinking places of all grades, and the inducements to get intoxicated caused much leave-breaking. At the commencement of my second year in command—the day after New Year's Day—I turned the hands up, and with the defaulters' book in my hand read the punishments of the past year, including many committals to Bodmin Gaol, cells, etc., etc. More than two thirds arose from drink. This surprised the men very much. I then said: 'I know nothing about temperance, but you see all this disgrace and punishment and misery to some of your families is due to drink. If we give up the drink this cannot happen. If you will consent to give up your allowance of grog, and avoid all public-houses and beer-shops, and drink nothing but water for the next three months, and sign your names and bring the list up to me,

I WILL AGREE TO GIVE UP MY WINE, and sign the list with you. Take forty-eight hours to consider it, but when you've made up your minds, stick to it.' In a few hours forty-six of those men who had been most often under punishment signed the list, and we started our teetotal party. The liquor-sellers were surprised when the men landed to see some of their best customers pass by their doors, and much to my delight I was a witness of it.

"At the end of three months I again turned the hands up on the quarter-deck, and said, 'I have kept my pledge; now, how many of you have kept yours? You all know each other well, so there can be no deception about it.' To my great satisfaction they said one and all that none had broken it, and thirty more men came across, saying, 'I'll join your party, too.' I may also state that to my certain knowledge some have kept it up to this day, though it is now about twelve or thirteen years ago. I heard from one some years ago, while a severe epidemic of yellow fever was raging in Jamaica, stating he was firm in his principles of total abstinence, and had been the means of making many others join."

There is a simple grandeur about the incident so quietly told that commands our admiration. That an officer should be so much concerned about the happiness of his men and their families as to address them at all in the way of warning was something unusual; but that he should voluntarily deny himself that he might set them a good example shows that he possessed true greatness. It is not unlikely that the captain needed more moral courage to carry out his part of the bargain in the society in which he moved than he did to fight any of the naval battles in which he took part.

GRATEFUL DOCKYARD MEN.

After that time King-Hall was a firm temperance man, and wherever he was placed lost no opportunity of advocating total abstinence. "I was placed in charge," he said, in the course of the same speech, "of Sheerness Dockyard as superintendent, and there, as is frequently the case, many of the best workmen were inclined to drink. On my leaving, great was my gratification to hear, according to their statement, as contained in an address, accompanied by a present of a copy of 'Kitto's Bible,' that my influence and example had been the means, by God's blessing, of assisting many to give up drink, to the greater happiness of their families. Soon after I became Admiral Superintendent at Devonport Dockyard, assisting by example and precept many who required help to break their drinking habits; and as every one exercises an influence either for good or evil, I feel it a great privilege to have been directed to take up this cause for the benefit of many poor fellows whose greatest enemy is drink. If only the poor drunkards took the pledge they would become marked men; but by those who can withstand temptation with them, confidence and support are given them. I enter into no arguments about the miracle our Saviour performed at Cana of Galilee, or Paul's advice to Timothy, or any of the hackneyed doctrines about the use and abuse of the 'good things of God.' I see and feel that there is a vast amount of crime, ruin, and punishment, misery in families, wife-beating, and desertion of children arising from drink, and on the other hand a great amount of happiness, health, and contentment for those who abstain; and if I in my humble endeavors can assist in reducing the former and adding to the latter, I feel it to be a privilege, an honor, and a duty to do it. Before leaving Devonport we established a Band of Hope among the sons of the artificers of the establishment, which numbers now over three hundred."

STANDING IN THE SAME RANKS

Another cardinal principle with the good admiral was the duty of Sabbath observance. Whether in command of a ship on a voyage or superintending a dockyard ashore, his orders were that no work should be done on the Lord's day that was not absolutely necessary and could not be postponed.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE,

he contended, was the cornerstone of a nation's prosperity. Speaking on one occasion to a large assembly of workingmen, he said: "I am firmly convinced, after more than fifty years' service in the Queen's navy, and having during that time had opportunities of observation in many foreign lands—and I say it solemnly as I stand here in God's sight, that I verily believe that the greatness, the liberty, and the happiness of this country is granted to us because the Sabbath days are hallowed and our Bible is free and open to all. The Lord's day is a day of rest; and I adjure you, my friends—you workingmen especially—to set your faces like a flint against any attempt to deprive you of its rest and sacredness."

"I will tell you a little story which made a lasting impression on my mind, showing the blessing which we enjoy in that rest. It was brought to my notice most vividly by a most intellectual man—when, twenty-two years ago, I commanded the Calcutta at Hong Kong. The usual divine service had been performed one Sabbath day, and the crew, several hundreds in number, were undisturbed on that blessed weekly rest-day. On shore, close to us, houses were being built—sawyers, and masons, and others in quarries were hard at work—when the Chinaman, touching me, said very seriously, 'Your Joss is better and kinder than our Joss, for He gives you a holiday and rest one day in seven, and we've no rest-day in all the year, except New Year's Day.' It was something to impress on the Chinese mind by practical observation that the God of the English was better and kinder than the Joss of the Chinese. And this is the case all throughout China. Just realize, my dear fellows, what it must be to work hard from morning till night for three hundred and sixty-four days, and only one day of rest, and then you will prize the Sabbath. And now let me remind you of the fact, which is forgotten by some who are ready to rest on the Sabbath, that God's command is as clear that you should work six days in the week as that you should rest on the seventh. 'Six days shalt thou labor,' and you break that commandment when you neglect to do so."

The late admiral took a prominent part in the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance and similar institutions. He made no secret of his religious principles. In the navy and in social circles there could be no mistake about his attitude. He was ready to work, to speak, or to contribute whenever religion or philanthropy needed support, and his influence was always exerted on the right side. His death is deeply mourned by a large circle of friends. At his funeral, on August 2d, his body was borne to the tomb by the members of the Naval Temperance Society, which he had founded.

THE NAVAL DEMONSTRATION.

AN imposing naval demonstration was gotten up at Portsmouth on July 23d for the entertainment of the distinguished persons who have gone to England from Canada, Australia, India, and other outlying portions of the British Empire to join in the celebrations connected with the Indian and Colonial Exhibition, a description of which appeared in this journal on May 20th.

Portsmouth is probably the most extensive naval station in the world. Its docks date back to 1540, when they covered eight acres. At various times since then additions had to be made as the vessels of the navy increased in size, until now they cover two hundred and ninety-five acres. The "fitting basin" was the first scene inspected by the visitors. It was crowded with battle ships of various types, all in a more or less imperfect state of completion, but all of modern design. There they examined the complicated machinery constructed for rotating the turrets and moving the enormous guns which modern war ships carry.

An inspection of the Victory afforded pleasure to visitors fond of historical associations. It is the vessel on which Nelson was at the battle of Trafalgar. They were shown the spot on which the naval hero stood when the fatal shot struck him, and the cockpit to which he was carried and in which he died. One of the sails that the Victory carried on that momentous day is also preserved, and the famous signal blazoned in front of the poop. One of the old guns used on the Victory was also shown.

Torpedo practice occupied the remainder of the time at the disposal of the visitors. They were taken out to sea on board the magnificent troop ship Orontes, a vessel three hundred and fifty feet long and requiring no less than forty-eight engines to work her complicated gear (seen on the right of the lower panel of the first page illustration). From a capacious platform on her deck they witnessed the operation technically known as circuit closing, which explodes a ground mine under an enemy's ship. Two steam pinnaces, one of which was supposed to belong to an enemy, were used for the purpose. As the two came in contact (as seen in upper part of the illustration), the electric circuit was completed, there was a terrific explosion, two immense spouts of water, and the two vessels sank.

The second feature of the exhibition was of the method to be employed when it was desired to enter a harbor in which torpedoes were placed. It consisted in dropping counter-mines among the submarine mines and simultaneously exploding them. To illustrate this, the Bloodhound and the Vesuvius, towing barges carrying the counter-mining apparatus, steamed along a given track spaced one hundred yards apart, and sunk the strings of the mines. These mines, which were supposed to have a radial effect of one hundred yards, were then exploded. (See illustration on lower right of portrait.) A sham torpedo attack on the turret ship Colossus completed the day's exhibition.

It was evident from this demonstration that England has made prodigious efforts and spent enormous sums of money to maintain her maritime supremacy. Whatever the world may think of the future, the British Government evidently believes that it is prudent to prepare for war, and its preparations, so far as the fleet is concerned, are made on a gigantic scale. Nevertheless we have the assurance, on divine authority, that the time is now not far distant when all these engines of destruction will become useless. When the millennial day dawns upon the earth men will "beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:4).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Running Away from Sin.—The Rev. Mr. McPherson said at a recent meeting: "I knew of a little girl who had a strong desire to join the church. She went to the minister, and applied for membership, when he asked her if she had undergone a change of heart. She said that she had, and the minister again asked, 'Were you a sinner before that?' She said, 'Yes.' 'And are you a sinner now?' asked the minister. She again replied that she was. 'And what is the difference between your previous state and your present state?' The girl thought for a moment, and then replied, 'Before I was converted to Christ, I was a sinner running after sin, and now I am a sinner running from sin.'"

Too Late for a Remedy.—Mr. Sanderson Related: "As I was sitting in my home one night, I was hastily summoned to the death-bed of a woman whom I had often visited. In a short time I was by her side, but only to see her lifeless remains, for her spirit had gone to meet its God. As I looked down at the cold white face, I recalled to my mind how often I had urged that woman to receive Christ, and at such times her answer invariably was, 'I cannot; for I feel that it is too late.' I was told that before she died she sat up in bed, and with all the strength she could command, she shrieked, 'I am lost! I am lost! I am lost!' That, like so many other lost souls, was her expiring cry. She fell back on her pillow, and never again regained consciousness."

Saved at Seventy.—Mr. J. G. Forbes Said: "A few years ago I spoke to a man seventy years old about his soul. Although he had reached that age he had never troubled himself concerning a life beyond the grave. I earnestly pointed him to 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.' The Holy Spirit sealed home the truth, and he at once received the message of salvation, and entered into peace through child-like faith in a crucified Redeemer. A little while afterward, he said in a trembling voice: 'Oh, sir, I have had a very large family, and not one of them has ever seen me bow the knee to God, and my wife and all my family are at rest in their graves, except two girls!' 'Oh, it made my heart sore to hear that aged man make such a confession!' His lost opportunities for usefulness were gone forever."

"Pity 'Tis, 'Tis True!"—Mr. Quarrier, Promoter of the Orphan Homes, Glasgow, remarked: "The other day I had a visit from a gentleman who came to inquire if I could take in a family of eight children, whose father had committed suicide, and whose mother had gone away and left them. Another very piteous case was that of a little girl who came to me and said, 'Please, sir, I want to get into the Home; my mother is dead, and my father is in prison, and my brother is in Canada.' It was a strange coincidence, for, when we looked for his name on the list, we found that we had a letter a few days before from him pleading with us to send out his sister. There is not a day passes but such cases as these come under my notice. Christian friends, if we would trust more, we would be led to give with a more liberal hand for the help of the forlorn and destitute, and we should always find it to be true that 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.'"

How the Good is Passed On.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "A man returning home from an evangelistic service one night previously, said to his wife, 'It has been a grand day.' 'In what way?' she asked. 'There is glorious work being done for eternity in that meeting. To-night several were led to give themselves to Christ, a father returning thanks for his own conversion, friends praying for their unsaved ones, a husband praying for his unconverted wife.' 'Well, I am sure that might have been me,' she remarked; 'I wish I were a Christian.' On the following night, she attended the meeting, and asked to see me. She told me for what purpose she had come, that her husband, who was not a decided Christian, had returned from the meeting on the previous night, and told her of many who were seeking to flee from the wrath to come, which had made her anxious about her own soul. I directed her to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. She accepted Christ that very night, and asked me if I would come and speak in like manner to her husband. 'No,' I said. 'Go home and tell your husband what the Lord has done for you, and carry the message of salvation to him yourself.' She went home and did as I advised her, and the result was that through his wife's means he, too, was led to a saving knowledge of the truth."

What a Woman Said to a Jar.—Mr. Walker said: "An old woman who kept a shebeen was severely punished several times by the authorities of the town, but nothing would make her desist from this unlawful traffic. By some means she was led into a Gospel meeting, and when there she heard something that concerned her eternal interest. She got a different view of her life, fully realizing for the first time that Christ died in her room and stead. She went home full of this newly-found joy, and, addressing herself to a large jar, which stood on a shelf full of intoxicating liquor, she said, 'Now, jar, you and I have lived long together, but Christ has come and taken up His abode with me, and now you and I must part company.' With these words she lifted the offending jar, and dashed it on the ground, breaking it into fragments. Hers was a true conversion, because she was moved to action, willingly parting with what seemed a great deal to her, and nothing else would have made her part with it but the love of Christ which constrained her."

Attracted by the Singing.—M. Sallien of Mr. M'All's Paris Mission observed: "A Roman Catholic gentleman was passing one of our mission halls in Paris, when the singing from within attracted him, and he entered and took, for the first time, a Bible in his hand. He became interested, and the following night he came again, when he was more interested than ever. As this hall was a considerable distance from his home, he inquired if we had one in the part of the town where he was living. We directed him to one which he afterward attended regularly. At length, by the grace of God he renounced his old belief, for he was led to see that our way was right, and surrendered himself to the Lord. After this occurrence, he invited one of Mr. M'All's helpers to spend a few days at his country residence. He called a meeting together, which he conducted himself, and his friend addressed it, and there for the first time since the Reformation a Protestant sermon was delivered in that part. Such incidents as this might give a slight idea of the great power for good the M'All Mission is in Paris."

An Inconsistent Infidel.—Mr. Williamson related: "In America, one evening, a large crowd was gathered round a young man in the open-air, who was lecturing on infidelity. He seemed to have the power of keeping the attention of his hearers, and went on to denounce religion, and even deny the existence of a Supreme Being. When he had finished he seated himself with apparently great satisfaction, as loud applause came from the audience. Just at that moment an old gray-haired gentleman stepped on to the platform, and began: 'I suppose none of you know this man whom you have just applauded, because you thought he was saying what he firmly believed to be true?' 'No,' was the response, 'he is a perfect stranger to us, we have never seen him before.' 'It is only but a few days,' continued the old gentleman, 'since I rescued him from a watery grave. He fell into the water near the cataract, and was almost lost when I picked him up. When he saw that he was fairly inside the boat his first act was to throw himself on his knees in the bottom of the boat, and with clasped hands implore the forgiveness of that God whom he is now denying. And now, I leave you to judge if he is sincere in what he has just said.'"

MORAL WRECKS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway."—I COR. 9: 27.

A Common Danger of Wreck—Preachers not Exempt—What it is to be Cast Away at Sea—Many Causes of Shipwreck—I. False Beacons—A Lantern Tied to a Horse—Philosophical Lanterns—An Ingenious Device of a Copper Wolf—II. The Sudden Swoop of a Tempest—Invitations to Drink—Temptations to Fraud—III. Sheer Recklessness—Drifting without Care—Unconscious of Danger—What to Do—Lifting a Distress Signal—A Sailor Encouraged by a Star—The Perfect Lifeboat—The Wreck of the Isabella.

MINISTERS of religion may finally be lost. The apostle, in the text, indicates that possibility. Gown, and surplice, and cardinal's red hat are no security. Cardinal Wolsey, after having been petted by kings and having entertained foreign ambassadors at Hampton Court, died in darkness. One of the most eminent ministers of religion that this country has ever known plunged into sin and died, his heart—post-mortem examination found to have been—not figuratively, but literally, broken. Oh, ministers of Christ, because we have diplomas of graduation, and hands of ordination on the head, and address consecrated assemblages, that is no reason why we shall necessarily reach the realm celestial! The clergyman must go through the same gate of pardon as the layman. The preacher may get his audience into heaven, and he himself miss it. There have been where all on board escaped excepting the captain. Alas! if, having "preached to others, I myself should be a castaway." God forbid it.

I have examined some of the commentaries to see what they thought about this word "castaway," and I find that they differ in regard to the figure used, while they agree in regard to the meaning. So I shall make my own selection, and take it in a nautical and seafaring sense, and show you that men may become spiritual castaways, and how finally they drift into that calamity.

We are a seaboard town. You have all stood on the beach. Many of you have crossed the ocean. Some of you have managed vessels in great stress of weather. There is a sea-captain, and there is another, and yonder is another, and there are a goodly number of you who, though once you did not know the difference between a brig and a barque, and between a diamond knot and a sprit-sheet-sail knot, and although you could not point out the weather-cross jack brace, and though you could not man the fore clue-garnets, now you are as familiar with a ship as you are with your right hand, and if it were necessary you could take a vessel clear across to the mouth of the Mersey without the loss of a single sail. Well, there is of the sea. The vessel became unmanageable. You saw it was scudding toward the shore. You heard the cry, "Breakers ahead! Land on the lee bow!" The vessel struck the rock, and you felt the deck breaking up under your feet, and you were a castaway, as when the Hercules drove on the coast of Caffraria, as when the Portuguese brig went staving, splitting, grinding, crashing on the Goodwins. But whether you have followed the sea or not, you all understand the figure when I tell you that there are men who, by their sins and temptations, are thrown helpless! Driven before the gale! Wrecked for two worlds! Cast away, cast away!

I. By talking with some sailors, I have found out that there are three or four causes for such a calamity to a vessel. I have been told that it sometimes comes from kindling on the beach. This was often so in olden times. It is not many years ago, indeed, that vagabonds used to wander up and down the beach, getting vessels ashore in the night, throwing up false lights in their presence and deceiving them, that they might despoil and ransack them. All kinds of infernal arts were used to accomplish this. And one night, on the Cornish coast, when the sea was coming in fearfully, some villains took a lantern and tied it to a horse, and led the horse up and down the beach, the lantern swaying to the motion of the horse, and a sea-captain in the offing saw it, and made up his mind that he was not anywhere near the shore, for he said: "There's a vessel—that must be a vessel, for it has a movable light," and he had no apprehension until he heard the rocks grating on the ship's bottom, and it went to pieces, and the villains on shore gathered up the packages and treasures that were washed to the land. And I have to tell you that there are a multitude of souls ruined by false lights on the beach.

In the dark night of man's danger, Universalism goes up and down the shore, shaking its lantern, and men look off and take that flickering and expiring wick as the signal of safety, and the cry is: "Heave the main topsail to the mast! All is well!" when cometh upon them, and they shall not escape. So there are all kinds of lanterns swung on the beach—philosophical lanterns, educational lanterns, humanitarian lanterns. Men look at them, and are deceived, when there is nothing but God's eternal light-house of the Gospel that can keep them from becoming castaways.

Once, on Wolf Crag light-house, they tried to build a copper figure of a wolf with its mouth open, so that the storms beating into it, the wolf would howl forth the danger to mariners that might be coming anywhere near the coast. Of course, it was a failure. And so all new inventions for the saving of man's soul are unavailing. What the human race wants is a light bursting forth from the cross standing on the great head-lands—the light of pardon, the light of comfort, the light of heaven. You might better go to-night, and destroy all the great light-houses on the dangerous coasts—the Barneget light-house, the Fastnet Rock light-house, the Sherryvore light-house, the Longship's light-house, the Holyhead light-house—than to put out God's great ocean lamp—the Gospel. Woe to those who swing false lanterns on the beach till men crash in and perish.

II. By talking with sailors I have heard also, that sometimes ships come to this calamity by the SUDDEN SWOOP OF A TEMPEST.

For instance, a vessel is sailing along in the East Indies, and there is not a single cloud on the sky; but suddenly the breeze freshens, and there are swift feet on the ratlines, and the cry is: "'Way, haul away there!" but before they can square the booms and tarpaulin the hatchways, the vessel is groaning and creaking in the grip of a tornado, and falls over into the trough of the sea, and broadside rolls on to the beach and keels over, leaving the crew to struggle in the merciless surf. Cast away! cast away! And so I have to tell you that there are thousands of men destroyed through the sudden swoop of temptations. Some great inducement to worldliness, or to sensuality, or to high temper, or to some form of dissipation, comes upon them.

IF THEY HAD TIME to examine their Bible, if they had time to consult with their friends, if they had time to deliberate, they could stand it; but the temptation came so suddenly—a euroclydon on the Mediterranean, a whirlwind of the Carribean. One awful surge of temptation, and they perish. And so we often hear the old story: "I hadn't seen my friend in a great many years. We were very glad to meet. He said I must drink, and he took me by the arm and pressed me along, and filled the cup until the bubbles ran over the edge, and in an evil moment all my good resolutions were swept away, and to the outraging of God and my own soul, I fell."

Or the story is, "I had hard work to support my family. I knew that by one false entry, by one deception, by one embezzlement, I might spring out free from all my trouble; but the temptation came upon me so fiercely I could not think. I did wrong, and having done wrong I COULD NOT STOP."

Oh, it is the first step that costs; the second is easier; and the third; and on to the last! Once having broken loose from the anchor, it is not so easy to tie the parted strands. How often it is that men perish for the reason that the temptation comes from some unexpected quarter! As vessels lie in Margate Roads, safe from south-west winds; but the wind changing to the north-east, they are driven helpless and go down. Oh, that God would have mercy upon those upon whom there comes the sudden swoop of temptation, that they perish not, becoming, for this world and the world to come, cast away! cast away!

III. I have also heard from sailors that some vessels come to this calamity through SHEER RECKLESSNESS.

There are three million men who follow the sea for a living. It is a simple fact that the average of human life on the sea is less than twelve years. This comes from the fact that men by familiarity with danger sometimes become reckless—the captain, the helmsman, the stoker, the man on the look-out become reckless, and in nine out of ten shipwrecks it is found out that some one was awfully to blame. So I have to tell you that men lose their souls through sheer recklessness.

There are thousands of my friends in this house to-night who do not care where they are in spiritual things. They do not know whether they are sailing toward heaven or toward hell, and the sea is black with piratical hulks that would grapple them with hooks of steel, and blindfold them, and make them "walk the plank." They do not know what the next moment may bring forth. Drifting in their theology. Drifting in their habits. Drifting in regard to all the future. No God, no Christ, no settled anticipations of eternal felicity; but all the time coming nearer and nearer to

A DANGEROUS COAST.

Some of them are on fire with evil habit, and they will burn on the sea, the charred hulk tossed up on the barren beach of the lost world. Many of them with great troubles, financial troubles, domestic troubles, social troubles; but they never pray for comfort. With an aggravation of sin that stirs up the ire of God, they pray for no pardon. They do not steer for the lightship that dances in gladness at the mouth of heaven's harbor; reckless as to where they come out, drifting further from God, further from early religious influences, further from their present happiness, further from heaven.

And what is the worst thing about it is, that they are taking their families along with them, and if one perish, perhaps they will all perish, and the way one goes, the probability is they will all go. Yet no anxiety. As unconscious of danger as the passengers on board the Arctic one moment before the Vesta crashed into her. Wrapped up in the business of the store, not remembering that soon they must quit all their earthly possessions. Absorbed in their social position, not knowing that very soon they will have attended the last levée, and whirled in the last schottische. They do not deliberately choose to be ruined; neither did the French frigate Medusa aim for the Arguin Banks, but there it went to pieces.

Oh, ye reckless souls! I wish that to-night I could wake you up with some great perturbation. The perils are so augmented, are so few; you will die just as certainly as you

* Dr. Talmage did not preach last Sunday. He has sent us for publication, through some inadvertence, his sermon on Isa. 40: 22. As that sermon, under the title of the "Circle," is already familiar to our readers, having appeared not only in these columns, but in the volume of his sermons recently published by Mr. Sparks, we insert this week a sermon by him which we have never published before.

sit there, unless you bestir yourself. I fear, my brother, you are becoming a castaway. You are making no effort, you are putting forth no exertion for escape. You throw out no oar. You take no soundings. You watch no compass. You are not calculating your bearings while the wind is abaft, and yonder is a long line of foam bounding the horizon, and you will be pushed on toward it, and thousands have perished there, and you are driving in the same direction. Ready about! Down helm! Hard down; or in the next five minutes, or four minutes, or three minutes, or two minutes, or one minute you may be a castaway.

Oh, unforgiven soul, if you could see your peril before God to-night on account of your lifetime sin and transgression, there would be fifty men who would rush through this aisle crying for mercy, and there would be fifty who would rush through that aisle crying for mercy, and they would be as men are when

THEY RUSH ACROSS THE DECK of a foundering ship, and there would be thousands of arms tossed up from the galleries; and as these Christian men rose up to help them, it would be as when a vessel drives on the rocks, and on the shore the command is: "Man the life-boat! Man the life-boat! Pull, my lads, pull! A steamer with two hundred on board making the last plunge!"

Why does your cheek turn pale, and your heart pound until, listening, you hear it? It is because, my dear brother, you realize that because of your lifetime sin and rejection of God's mercy you are in peril, and I really believe there are thousands of people in this house this moment, saying within themselves: "What shall I do?" Do? Do? Why, my brother, do what any ship does when it is in trouble.

LIFT A DISTRESS SIGNAL.

There is a flash and a boom. You listen and you look. A vessel is in trouble. The distress gun is sounded, or a rocket is sent up, or a blanket is lifted, or a bundle of rags—anything to catch the eye of the passing craft. So if you want to be taken off the wreck of your sin, you must lift a distress signal. Rise. Lift your hand. Cry out for mercy. The publican lifted the distress signal when he cried: "God, be merciful to me, a sinner!" Peter lifted the distress signal when he said: "Lord, save me, I perish!" The blind man lifted the distress signal when he said: "Lord, that my eyes may be opened." The gaoler lifted the distress signal when he said: "What must I do to be saved?" And help will never come to your soul until you lift such a signal as that. You must make some demonstration, give some sign, make some heaven-piercing outcry for help, lifting the distress signal for the Church's prayer, lifting the distress signal for heaven's pardon. Pray! Pray! The voice of the Lord to-night sounds in your ears: "In Me is Thy help." Too proud to raise such a signal, too proud to be saved.

There was an old sailor thumping about in A SMALL BOAT IN A TEMPEST.

The larger vessel had gone down. He felt he must die. The surf was breaking over the boat, and he said: "I took off my life-belt that it might soon be over, and I thought somewhat indistinctly about my friends on shore, and then I bid them good-by like, and I was about sinking back and giving it up, when I saw a bright star. The clouds were breaking away, and there that blessed star shone down on me, and it seemed to take right hold of me; and somehow, I cannot tell how it was, but somehow, while I was trying to watch that star, it seemed to help me and seemed to lift me." Oh, drowning soul, see you not the glimmer between the rifts of the storm-cloud? Would to God that that light might lay hold of you to-night.

"Death struck, I ceased the tide to stem,
When suddenly a star arose.
It was the Star of Bethlehem!"

Oh, ye castaways, God is doing everything to save you! Did you ever hear of Lionel Luken?

He was the inventor of the insubmersible life-boat. All honor is due to his memory by seafaring men, as well as by landmen. How many lives he saved by his invention! In after days that invention was improved, and one day there was

A PERFECT LIFE-BOAT, the Northumberland, ready at Ramsgate. The life-boat being ready, to test it the crew came out and leaped on the gunwale on one side to see if the boat would upset; it was impossible to upset it. Then, amid the huzzas of excited thousands, that boat was launched, and it has gone and come, picking up a great many of the shipwrecked. But I have to tell you to-night of a grander launching, and from the dry-docks of heaven.

Word came up that a world was beating on the rocks. In the presence of the potentates of heaven the life-boat of the world's redemption was launched. It shoved off the golden sands amid angelic hosanna. The surges of darkness beat against its bow, but it sailed on, and it comes in sight to-night. It comes for you, it comes for me. Soul! soul! get into it. Make one leap for heaven. This is your last chance for life. Let that boat go past, and there remains nothing but fearful looking-for of judgment, and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversary.

I am expecting that there will be whole families here to-night who will get into that life-boat. In 1833 the Isabella came ashore off Hastings, England. The air was filled with sounds—the hoarse sea-trumpet, the crash of the axes, and the bellowing of the tornado.

A BOAT FROM THE SHORE

came under the stern of the disabled vessel. There were women and children on board that vessel. Some of the sailors jumped into the small boat, and said: "Now give us the children." A father who stood on deck took his first-born and threw him to the boat. The sailors caught him safely, and the next, and the next, to the last. Still the sea rocking, the storm howling. "Now," said the sailors, "now the mother;" and she leaped, and was saved. The boat went to the shore; but before it got to the shore the landmen were so impatient to help the suffering people that they waded clear down into the surf, with blankets and garments and promises of help and succor. I hope to-night that a great many of the families here are going to be saved, and saved all together. Give us that child for Christ, that other child, that other. Give us the mother, give us the father, the whole family. They must all come in.

ALL HEAVEN WADES IN

to help you. I claim this whole audience for God. I pick not out one man here nor one man there; I claim this whole audience for God. There are some of you who, thirty years ago, were consecrated to Christ by your parents in baptism. Certainly I am not stepping over the right bound when I claim you for Jesus.

Then there are many here who have been seeking God for a good while, and am I not right in claiming you for Jesus? Then there are some here who have been further away. I saw you come in to-night in clusters—two, three, and four men together—and you drink, and you swear, and you are bringing up your families without any God to take care of them when you are dead. And my brother; I claim all of you. You will have to come to-night to the throne of mercy. God's Holy Spirit is striving now with you irresistibly. Although there may be a smile on your lip, there is agitation and anxiety in your heart. You will not come at my invitation; you will come at God's command.

You will have to pray some time; why not begin now, while all the ripe and purple clusters of Divine promise bend over into your cup, rather than postpone your prayer until your chance is past, and the night drops, and the sea washes you out, and forever, and forever, and forever, you become a castaway?

AN UNEXPECTED DELIVERANCE.

MR. C. H. JUDD relates the following singular experience of his missionary work: "On one occasion I was travelling down a large river in Si-chuen province. We had been early one morning on shore to preach the Gospel. After we had left the village, a boat with six or seven armed men followed us and told us to stop. We soon saw that resistance was useless. The moment we yielded they came on board my boat, and took away our boatmen. One man sat with a drawn sword, and the others with muskets and swords across in front of me, so that I could not move one inch. For six hours we were kept in that position. I learned during that time that they were going to keep us till dark, and then take our heads off and seize what we had. I was eight hundred miles from the nearest port, and the nearest Christian friend. As soon as I learned their purpose one thought came to me: 'Soon I shall see Jesus. Oh, the precious joy of seeing Jesus!' I felt only one thing—that I should like to have bidden my wife and children good-by; but the joy and prospect of soon seeing Jesus seemed to swallow up everything. I felt for the first time in my life how happy God could make us in the prospect of death. After keeping us there for six hours in suspense, the Lord put something into the hearts of these men—what, I never know to this day; but this band of six or seven armed men all took to their heels and fled. The keeper of the village apologized, and escorted us down to the next village. The Lord in His mercy delivered us."

A NEW RELATIONSHIP.

IN the course of her annual report of the work in Ceylon, published in the Missionary Herald, Miss Mary Leitch relates the following incident connected with her visit to the island of Delft:

"There are yet no Christians on the island, except a young man, Canapady Pillay, belonging to one of the highest families. He was converted while studying under Mr. Crossette. He is now studying in our English school at Manepy, and we hope when he shall have finished his studies he will go back as a catechist to work on this island. This young man was at his home while we were on the island, and was very diligent in helping to arrange for our meetings and in calling his friends to attend them. His grandfather is the most influential man on the island, and is now engaged in building an expensive heathen temple. I passed it in company with Canapady Pillay, as we were calling people to a meeting, and as we looked at it, he brushed the tears from his eyes, and said: 'I wish my grandfather would become a Christian.' It is said that if this man should become a Christian most likely all the people of the island would follow his example.

"It has been a great joy to us to know the firmness with which this young man, Canapady Pillay, has adhered to Christianity, refusing in any way to participate in heathen rites or ceremonies. The grandfather said to me, 'Take the boy; he belongs to you; he has given up his religion.'

"The boy's mother and her four sisters, all respectable married women, and much adorned with jewelry, came to see me. They told me the boy had said I was his mother, and that I was kind to him, and so they wanted to see me. I told them that if I was the boy's mother then it must follow that they were my sisters. They seized the idea with apparent delight, and, putting their arms around me, covered my hands with kisses in the native manner—that is, smelling them as if smelling a rose or something fragrant. I told them that if they were my sisters they must become Christians. They have consented to let Canapady Pillay's sister and cousin join our boarding-school next year. His sister is a beautiful girl and has as sweet a smile as any, perhaps, I have ever seen on any face. We also took with us on our return to Jaffna a cousin of this Canapady Pillay."

THE CONFERENCE ON PROPHECY AT CHICAGO.

THE undersigned clergymen have issued the following call: Eight years have now passed away, and the brethren of the committee, appointed by the New York Conference, in 1878, have, in response to many constant and urgent appeals, decided to hold a second Bible and Prophetic Conference in the city of Chicago, November 16th to 20th, of the present year. We therefore lay it upon the hearts of all who love our Lord to give themselves much to earnest prayer, that this proposed meeting may redound to the glory of God in the further knowledge of His blessed Word, in the edification of His Church, in the salvation of precious souls, and the hastening "His appearing and kingdom." It is under a sense of no ordinary responsibility we issue this call. With sorrowing hearts we have marked the rapid march of infidelity and its attendant troops—licentiousness, anarchy, and bloodshed. But there is One who can overturn evil and establish righteousness on the earth. Let us meet in unity of heart, and beseech Him to "take unto Himself His great power and reign."

The programme of arrangements will be issued in due season. The four days of the Conference will embrace about twenty prophetic subjects, to be followed on the Lord's day by twenty sermons on the special doctrines of our evangelical faith. Prominent teachers are expected from abroad who will take part in the proceedings, while well-known ministers from the States and Canada will be among the speakers. Commending ourselves to your loving prayers that we may be guided in all things pertaining to the Conference by the Holy Spirit, we are yours in the faith and hope of the Gospel: A. J. Gordon, Maurice Baldwin, W. R. Nicholson, H. M. Parsons, W. G. Moorhead, W. W. Clarke, E. R. Craven, W. J. Erdman, J. D. Herr, J. M. Orrock, William Nast, J. F. Kendall, E. P. Goodwin, D. W. Whittle, A. J. Frost, James S. Kennedy, Nathaniel West, Charles F. Cheney, S. H. Kellogg, L. W. Munhall, Addison Blanchard, J. H. Brookes, George C. Needham, Secretary.

All communications on the subject of the proposed Conference may be sent to Rev. George C. Needham, Manchester-by-the-Sea, Mass.

MR. McALL'S WORK AMONG SOLDIERS.

THE rooms in Paris in which the meetings of the McAll Mission are held in the evenings are now thrown open during the day as free reading-rooms, and the tables are covered with religious literature. Soldiers often drop in, and opportunities occur for conversation. The wife of one of the pastors writes: "Seeing our tracts in the barracks, and perceiving the number of soldiers who frequented our Salle, colonel, majors, and captains were troubled in spirit. They summoned the sergeants and corporals, and ordered them to see that the men no longer attended the hall, which they considered a 'suspicious' place."

"A pacific major, however, wished to know what was done there before the men were interdicted the place. A soldier was called."

"What do you do in the reading hall?"

"I read, my commandant, I write, and I improve myself. I am glad to get recreation without expense."

"What is the subject of the books you read?"

"They speak of Jesus the Saviour, my commandant, and then there are other nice and instructive books."

"It is to induce you to change your religion they invite you?"

"No, my commandant; we have no sermon, and every one is free to do what he likes."

"Very well; if that is the case, you may all continue to go there, for you stand greatly in need of instruction."

A crime was committed recently in Auxerre, in which some of the soldiers were implicated. The officers immediately ordered a review of the arms of those soldiers who had been out that evening. But each time that they came to a man who had been at the reading-room that night they said, "Inutile d'examiner les armes" (no necessity of examining their arms), and spoke approvingly to the men as to their way of spending the evening.

A REMARKABLE CONVERSION IN PHILADELPHIA.

ONE evening during the services conducted last month by Rev. E. W. Oakes, in Philadelphia, a gentlemanly, intelligent young man entered the meeting. He sat and listened attentively. Near the close Mr. Oakes asked any who wished to know Jesus to rise, and the Christians there would present them to the throne of grace. This young man rose to his feet and said: "I don't believe any in your religion; I believe it to be sentiment; but still you all look so satisfied and happy, I am ready to say that if I am mistaken, and if there is anything in the Christian religion, I want it." After meeting, the friends prayed and conversed with him. They found from his conversation he had been well educated, and after a little he confessed he was the son of a praying mother, but in college life had become dissipated and sceptical, yet graduating with honors. He left the dearest of mothers and his beautiful English home and came to America to gratify his depraved nature. He sought peace with true penitence, and was pointed to Jesus, his mother's Saviour. One of the workers went to his hotel and spent hours in prayer with him, and the next evening his testimony was: "I have found reality in the Lord Jesus; He is my peace. I have written to my dear, praying mother to-day, saying: 'Mother, be of good cheer; your boy is safe in the arms of Jesus.'" He is to return to his home very soon. He was living at the time of conversion with another man's wife. He confessed his sins to the husband, and made all amends in his power for the wrong.

A CHILD'S LIFE SAVED.

OUR friend, Mr. Harry Lathrop, of Brownstown, Wis., who kindly acknowledges the help he has received from God's blessing on this journal during the past seven years, sends us the following interesting incident:

"Over two years ago my wife was healed of a lingering disease in answer to prayer, after having been treated by several of the best physicians we could procure and receiving no permanent benefit. When she gave up the use of all medicines and accepted Christ as the Saviour of her body, she was healed of the disease, and since then we have claimed the Lord as our healer and tried to live the life of faith, and until very recently have had no severe trial. On Tuesday, July 6th, our only child, a boy five years of age, was taken with vomiting early in the morning, and could not eat a thing that day. He was not very sick up to Wednesday evening, July 7th, when I went into the country to see a sick man, and did not return till Thursday morning. I then learned that my little boy had been very sick all night; he had a very high fever, and could not retain anything on his stomach; his pulse ran as high as 180, and the look of death was too plainly stamped upon his face."

"We did not send for a doctor for two reasons; we did not believe any man on earth could save him, and we had taken the Lord as our physician, and if we forsook Him we would be without hope."

"My wife was calm, and trusted that all would be well; and although I did not doubt the Lord's power, I suffered all the dread of seeing my child die, for he seemed to be sinking very rapidly; he could not shut his eyes or mouth, and tossed on his bed day and night without sleep. On Friday I telegraphed for Mrs. U. N. Slauson, of Evansville, Wis., a lady who, several years ago, was completely healed of a long sickness in answer to prayer, and who has since been much used of the Lord in the ministry of healing. She arrived here Saturday at 2.30 P.M. At eight o'clock we called in a few believing friends and prayed over the little sufferer, and Mrs. Slauson anointed him with oil in the name of the Lord, according to the command in James 5:14. We asked the Lord to rebuke the fever, and from that very hour it left him. He slept that night as peacefully as any child could, and we began to give him nourishment; the next day he slept the greater part of the time, and has continued to gain without any fever until the present time, which is the third day since he was anointed. To-day he sits up some and takes solid food. Praise the Lord!

"The neighbors who saw our little boy say they did not believe he could live; some told us he would be weakest when the fever left him; but Jesus don't leave His patients that way."

"We shall be glad to answer any questions in regard to this matter, and our neighbors will corroborate these statements."

A CATHOLIC PAPER ON PROPHECY.

THE Dublin Freeman's Journal, the principal Roman Catholic daily paper in Ireland, gave, on August 2d, the following sketch of one of the Rev. M. Baxter's recent lectures there, under the head of "Baxter on Prophecy:"

Yesterday evening the Rev. M. Baxter, London, who is well known in England as a preacher upon "coming prophetic events," delivered in Dublin his last lecture on the predictions in the Book of Revelation, and prophesied that the world in a very short time will be the scene of these awful occurrences, and of several others still more extraordinary. The lecture was delivered in the large hall of the Metropolitan Hall, Lower Abbey Street. The reverend gentleman's interpretations of the Revelation were so interesting that during the hour or so occupied in the unfolding of his strange story, the attention of the audience was not for a moment relaxed. Mr. Baxter is a clergyman of the Church of England; he is not dissatisfied with the audiences that have attended his discourses in Dublin, Belfast, and Cork. Mr. Baxter, personally, has somewhat the appearance of a prophet—or, as there is no particular class of personal appearance copyrighted or patented for prophets, it may perhaps be more correct to say that the air of the reverend gentleman is appropriately mysterious. He is a strongly built man, and as he is still far away from the time of the sere and yellow leaf he cannot say with the wizard in "Lochiel's Warning:"

"The sunset of life gives me mystical lore,

And coming events cast their shadows before."

His features are somewhat like those of the Marquis of Salisbury—heavy, and of a melancholy cast—with thick whiskers and a strong crop of hair; but the dreamy expression about the half closed eyes, and the heavy lines beneath, tell of much thinking on things having very little connection with the matter-of-fact affairs of this world. In a tone of voice not disagreeable, the lecturer told of the awful events of which the world shall in a year to come be the scene, with all the manner of a man who is eminently convinced that he is uttering what time shall prove correct.

Hanging on the walls around were several large representations in flaming colors of scenes or figures from the Revelation, with maps to illustrate the lecturer's extraordinary conclusions. The beast mentioned in the 13th chapter of Revelation, "with seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy," was shown on one picture. Between the ten horns was a little horn or protuberance, on the top of which was a human face, surmounted by the word "Napoleon." The body of the beast contained the names of the following ten countries—Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Bulgaria. The lecturer explained that Antichrist, who, according to Revelation, was to persecute Christians for three and a half years before the second coming of Christ, was were symbolical of the ten countries, and to form these ten, twenty-three of the present countries of Europe and Asia would be amalgamated, and they would ultimately give their power and strength to the beast, or Antichrist, who would hold sway over "all kindreds, tongues, and nations." How the lecturer arrived at the conclusion that Napoleon would be Antichrist was in this way. Each letter of the Greek language has a numerical value, and the sum total of the numerical value of each letter in the word "Napoleon" is six hundred and sixty-six, and this corresponds with the "six hundred three score and six," which Revelation says will be the number of the Beast.

Antichrist, or Napoleon, will, according to the Rev. M. Baxter's interpretation of the Scriptures, appear as a reigning monarch about 1890, four years hence, and from that period to 1900, the end of the present dispensation, will take place all those wonderful events mentioned in Revelation. "As," added the lecturer, "it is not likely that any new Napoleon will arise in that short time, I think that the present Prince Jerome Napoleon is the man, for he answers in every way the description given in the Scriptures. If indeed he be the man, the fact that he is now sixty-three years of age shows that all these things must probably happen before the end of the century, when he will be seventy-seven." Antichrist, or Napoleon, would rise, the lecturer believed, in Syria, and after winning the Mohammedans to his banner, would make his appearance in Europe about 1896, when he would establish the ten kingdoms and have them all under his sway. These countries are also to be OVERRIDDEN BY THE "SCARLET WOMAN" mentioned in Revelation. She would be ecclesiastical queen or religious mistress, and would amalgamate all the systems of religion into one, which would consist of the adoration of Antichrist. Statues of Antichrist would be set up in all the cities, towns and villages of ten countries mentioned. These statues would have the power of speaking, and when "the poor ignorant and priest-ridden people" heard the speech of the statues they would declare it was done by the powers of God, and, along with adoring the image, would allow themselves to be branded on the forehead and right hand with the figures "six hundred and sixty-six," the number of the Beast.

"And now," said the Rev. M. Baxter, "when that time comes, thousands of us Protestant clergymen will be put to death for refusing to allow ourselves to be branded with the number of the Beast, and no doubt a great number of Roman Catholic clergymen will be put to death too, for the more intelligent, the more godly, and the more devoted of them will remember having read of the Beast in the Bible, and their good sense will save them from the awful doom."

Then the lecturer pointed out one of his pictures, which showed that in the opinion of this "latter-day saint" the Catholic Church, combined with the Greek and Mohammedan, is to be Church of Antichrist. On the picture was represented a statue of Napoleon. Before it a crowd of people, bearing the number of the Beast on their foreheads and right hand, were prostrated in adoration; and on the outskirts of the crowd a Roman bishop, arrayed in vestments and mitre, and attended by acolytes, was engaged branding those who were yet without the number. Opposite the statue was erected a guillotine, and the heads of those who refused to receive the brand were being chopped off in large numbers. It will probably be very gratifying news to the majority of the readers of the Freeman's Journal that in the opinion of the prophet, Ireland will not be included in the ten kingdoms under the sway of Antichrist, and that is within measurable distance. "England and Scotland will form one of the ten kingdoms, but Ireland will not," said the lecturer; "so Ireland at a very near period will become legis-lately separated from Great Britain. Many people have thought it injudicious for me to make that announcement in these times, but let them remember that if it come true, that Ireland will be outside the British Empire, it will be a sign that Christ's second coming is at hand, and consequently, while you may have sorrow on the one hand, you will have joy on the other." These events will be preceded by great wars; so Mr. Baxter concludes that the present condition of Europe will not last more than another year, and then there will be a fearful conflict between France and Prussia, with Russia fighting on the side of France.

"The present state of things can scarcely," said the prophet, "last longer than a year, and the spread of Liberal and Radical ideas, and of Communism and Republicanism, is bringing us nearer and nearer the awful time." "Antichrist must," said he, just as emphatically, "appear about 1890." And the reverend gentleman warned everybody against the folly of thinking that the return of a Conservative Government to power could keep things quiet and render all his awful prognostications false. "Things will turn out very different," said Mr. Baxter. "If there is peace now, somehow or other there will be terrible wars and revolutions in Europe within two years." "It can scarcely be that Europe will remain tranquil for another year," exclaimed the Rev. Mr. Baxter further on, and he concluded with a prayer that God might give them all strength to endure the trials and tribulations which were before them in the near future.

THE WORK OF THE CHURCH.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

The Church Imperfect—Its Incessant Prayers—A Test of Sympathy—Like Crutches—Uncle Ben Joining the Church.

THE Church of God has never been what it ought to be. I am sorry we have unfaithful men and women in the Church. I am sorry there is an unfaithful brother upon the face of the earth. But hear me, my brother, hear me. You may say what you please about us, but, thank God, the Church of Christ has never spent a day without praying for God to save poor lost sinners. We have been earnest about that. I am sorry on your account that I have not lived better. I have no doubt every man of us will say that, on your account, we are sorry our lives have not been more consecrated. But hear me, my brother; however many mistakes I have made, however many sins I have committed, for thirteen years every day I have been on my knees praying God to save every lost man as He has saved me. God bless every poor, lost sinner, as Thou didst pull me to Thy great, loving heart and bless me, and I don't believe there is a man in this universe that ever tasted the pardoning love of God and then forgot to pray for poor sinners who are lost and ruined. Brothers, we are

IN SYMPATHY WITH YOU.

We are. You may take that old man out there; he has cursed the Church, and abused the Church, and said a hundred hard things about the Church; but listen to me, brother: if you want to know whether this Church loves you or not, you walk right up here to-night before this multitude, and say: "Pray for me," and there will be tears drop from a thousand eyes in five minutes' time. We love you. We are in sympathy with you, and we will do you all the good we can. I say to you, brother, the Church is in sympathy with sinners. Thank God for what the Church has been for me. The Church of God has been all the world to me. I hear of some men saying, "I think a man can be a good man out of the Church." Brother, I am AFRAID TO RISK IT.

I am afraid to risk it, as God is my judge. I have had too hard a time being what I ought to be, and I will say to you this: You take away the support and blessing that the Church of God has been to me, and I never could have been religious at all. They have been like a crutch under each arm to me, to hobble along with in the way of life. Thank God for the Church. Thank God for the Church.

When I look out on the Church I feel in deep sympathy with an old colored man down South, who, when the preacher came around on his appointment and opened the doors of his church, though he had been a faithful old Christian man in the Church for forty years, walked up and joined the Church. The next time the preacher came and opened the door again, old Uncle Ben walked right up and joined the Church again. The next round the preacher opened the doors again, and

UNCLE BEN JOINED AGAIN.

Then the preacher said, "Uncle Ben, tell me why it is you join the Church every time the door is opened?" "Why," he says, "boss, it done this poor old nigger so much good the first time he joined that he has never lost a chance since. He has joined every time he had a chance." And I feel that way in my heart. Other men may live out of the Church, other men may die out of the Church, but if they were to turn me out to-morrow I would join the first chance I got; and if they got to where they would not open the doors where I was, I would slip in and hear every prayer that was offered and hear every sermon that was preached. Brother, God being my helper. I am going to take every chance for the good world. I intend that whatever will help a man shall be what I want as my portion forever.

Brother, listen: the Church is a blessing to thousands—

A BLESSING TO THOUSANDS.

I have heard the vaporings of infidels and read their literature when I ought not to have read it. A man never gets over having read a bad piece of literature. Mark the expression. In one lecture of Mr. Ingersoll you will have poison injected into your veins that you will regret the balance of your life—the balance of your life. Suppose we had an infidel city; that it was founded, and incorporated, and houses built, and men invited to go to it. Here are improvements for everybody that will come, but having it in the constitution and by-laws of that city that no preacher shall ever open his mouth in this city. No Bible shall ever come within the circle of this city's incorporation, and no church shall ever be built and no prayers ever offered here. You may build a city as magnificent as Chicago, and say: "Let every man that will take the oath, and say that I will swear to prosecute those who violate the constitution and the by-laws of this city," I will venture to say that not only no Christians would go to that city, but there is not an infidel in America that would make that city his home. Not one single one.

I have noticed this much—that infidels love to live under the shadow of churches. I have found that out. I have found out that infidel men like good Christian women to raise their children for them. I have found out that infidels will not go off in communities and stay together. I have found out that infidels love to live in a land of Bibles, preachers, prayers, and sacrifices. I have found that out. And I will tell you all to-day, my brother, the Church is a blessing to the world, and if every preacher and church was driven out and demolished in this city to-morrow and all the Bibles burned up, if you wanted to demolish this city, you need to just bring that state of things about.

Thank God for the Church. And I want to see every man and woman come into the Church, and I want to live to see the day when every man in the world belongs to the Church, and that I am the meanest man in the Church, and I want to be just as good as God can help me to be. That is just the way I feel about it. The Church calls you, brother, with all her voice, and the language of the Church is: "Come thou and go with us and we will do thee good." That is what the Lord told us to say to you.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Express money-orders whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

NOTICE.

THE publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be obliged to subscribers if they would make their cheques and Post-Office orders payable simply to "The Manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD." Some of them have of late been making them payable to Mr. Jewett, which causes confusion, as he has charge of the advertising department only. Others make them payable to Mr. Walton, which causes delay, as his connection with the paper has terminated. Subscribers are also again reminded that it is unsafe to send currency in unregistered letters. The only safe way to remit is by cheque or Post-Office Order, which can be duplicated without loss if they are lost. This is important, as several letters containing money sent to this office and other offices in this neighborhood lately have not been received.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Minneapolis Industrial Exposition was formally opened amid much enthusiasm on August 23d. Nearly ten thousand persons were crowded into the Exposition building to witness the ceremonies. It is a magnificent edifice, covering seven acres, and having a tower two hundred and sixty feet high. The grounds extend in terraces down to the Mississippi bank. Trains run right up to the building. One of the most interesting features of the opening was the part taken by Mrs. Cleveland, who, though fifteen hundred miles away, by touching an electric button in the little town in the heart of the mountains set in motion all the gigantic machinery of the Exposition. The circuit was open the whole distance, and within two minutes after Mrs. Cleveland had pressed the button the reply came from Minneapolis that the machinery was working beautifully.

The Fishery Dispute with Canada continues fruitful in irritations. Seizures of American vessels are numerous, and the Canadian customs regulations are being rigidly enforced. An important interview with the captain of the Terror, which is the cruiser that has been most active in hostility to the American fishermen, was published in the New York Herald last Friday. From that it appears that the captain is very positive in his assertion that he has acted strictly within the law as laid down by the treaty of 1818. It appears from the reports on both sides that the trouble has arisen out of the abrogation by the United States of the subsequent treaty. The fishermen were not interfered with while the treaty lasted. They used Nova Scotian ports as though they were American. It is easy to see that to be suddenly compelled to "report" when they slip into a harbor; to be prohibited from landing; to be warned to depart within twenty-four hours; to be asked their business and forbidden to make purchases ashore—all this seems to them an intolerable annoyance. But they cannot blame the Government, as it was at their request that the treaty was cancelled. It is unfortunate that the diplomatic negotiations are so slow. Much delay is caused by the proposals Minister Phelps makes in London having to be submitted to the Canadian Government.

Editor Cutting was Released from his Mexican prison on August 23d, and immediately left for El Paso. Mr. Sedgwick's inquiries into his case will, however, be continued, with the object of procuring such information respecting Mexican law as to render it possible to arrange an amendment of the treaty between the two countries as will preclude the recurrence of a similar case. It appears that under the existing extradition treaty Mexico cannot secure the extradition of an American citizen who has been guilty of crime in Mexico. One clause of the treaty provides that neither Government shall be bound to surrender its own citizens, and our State Department has always taken advantage of that clause and declined to surrender our criminals. That fact probably weighed with the Mexican authorities in dealing summarily with Cutting. Mr. Cutting expects to be compensated for his imprisonment, but it is understood that if the offence for which the Mexicans imprisoned him was circulating the libel, and not for writing it, the State Department will not support his claim.

A Series of Speeches by Mr. Blaine in Maine last week attracted general attention. They displayed the power and dexterity for which the orator has long been noted. His main effort was directed against the Prohibition movement, which in Maine, as elsewhere, injures the Republican more than the Democratic prospects. Mr. Blaine contended that, as the Republican Party had responded to the demands of the Prohibitionists by passing thirty different prohibitory measures, and finally by a prohibitory amendment to the constitution, it was inconsistent, if not ungrateful, on the part of Prohibitionists, to run a separate ticket which could not succeed, but might put the Democrats in power. The other questions with which he dealt were the tariff and the Canadian fisheries.

An Enthusiastic Prohibition Convention was held at Harrisburg, Pa., last week. Since last year the increase in numbers and energy is very marked. Money was freely pledged for the campaign, and arrangements made for perfecting the organization. The nomination for Governor was made by acclamation, there evidently being an irresistible demand that Charles S. Wolfe should be the candidate of the party. His rival, A. A. Barker, was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor. While Prohibition has the prominent place in the platform, the delegates have made it clear that they hold decided views on other subjects which both Republicans and Democrats have somewhat ignored in practice, if not in doctrine. The platform declares the Christian Sabbath to be an indispensable safeguard of our cherished institutions, and demands the strict observance of all laws against its violation. The laws regulating marriage and divorce are declared a shame, and a demand is made for a national law, uniform for all States. Arbitration in labor disputes is advocated, and a change demanded in our immigration laws, with the object of excluding the criminal, idler, and vagrant class of all nations.

A Counter Revolution in Bulgaria engrossed public attention in Europe last week. The people of Bulgaria appear to have been paralyzed with astonishment when Prince Alexander's abdication was announced. In less than twenty-four hours they discovered that the regiment which had entered his palace in the night and demanded his abdication was chiefly composed of Russians, and that the people who knelt before the Russian embassy and besought the Czar's protection were paid by Russia to thus betray their country. Immediately a popular cry was raised for the return of Prince Alexander, which became more imperative when it was known that he had not abdicated, but that, when surrounded with traitorous soldiers, he had cast the act of abdication from him at the risk of his life, and resolutely refused to sign it. For several days the prince could not be found. He had been forced on board a yacht by the Russian soldiers, and carried no one knew where. It was discovered that he had been carried to Reni, whence, being liberated, he had gone on to Darmstadt. The Government which had assumed office was overthrown, and a government loyal to the prince re-established. The garrisons of soldiers scattered through Bulgaria declared for Prince Alexander. Invitations were sent to him to return to his capital, and he was assured of the loyalty of the people. On receiving them he at once set out for Sofia. Europe now is curious to learn what Russia will do.

An Earthquake has Caused an Appalling Loss of life in Greece. A cable despatch on Saturday last from Athens states that the peninsula of Morea has been almost devastated by an earthquake which was felt also with less severity throughout Greece, parts of Italy, and in Egypt. In the Morea the loss of life, according to the best information, reaches the enormous figure of three hundred. The village of Pyrgo and the town of Philiatra were the chief sufferers, and these furnish, it is believed, all that have perished. In Pyrgo not a house is left standing, while Philiatra is almost swept from the face of the globe, swallowed up in the convulsions of the earth. In the town of Zante every house was damaged, and the inhabitants fled in terror to the open country. It is remarkable that on the same day earthquake shocks were felt at Charleston, S. C., and Augusta, Ga.

A Typical Eviction Case in Ireland was reported last week. About twenty tenants of the Marquis of Clanricarde, who have reclaimed land which increases the value of the marquis' estate, are in arrears with their rent to the amount of $2500. Among them one Saunderson, who owes $300 for rent and $150 for the expense of evicting him, barricaded his house against the bailiffs. They were unable to gain admission, and the sympathy felt in the locality for Saunderson and the other tenants threatened with eviction rendered the duty of the bailiffs a perilous one. Soldiers and police in large numbers were sent for, and under their protection the bailiffs succeeded in turning the twenty families out of the houses. Conroy, one of the tenants, was a bedridden man of eighty. He was carried out in a sheet, in spite of the entreaties of his aged wife and the parish priest. Another of the tenants, a widow, had, with the help of her son, actually built the house from which they were evicted. It was built of stones toilsomely grubbed out of the land which they reclaimed. The marquis who did this cruel business owns 54,582 acres in Ireland.

The First Important Division in the New House of Commons took place on Saturday last. It was on a proposal by Mr. Parnell to add a paragraph to the address which the House makes to the Queen in reply to her speech. Its purport was that the distress in Ireland would render difficult the payment of high rents during the winter. The proposal to add the paragraph caused a debate which continued from day to day, from Tuesday till Friday midnight, when a division was taken in which the proposal was lost by a vote of 304 to 181. The Parnellites were somewhat discouraged by the large majority against them, but they knew that it was not a fair test of their strength. The Liberal deserters voted with the Tories, as was expected, and many of the Gladstonians were absent from the division. Mr. Gladstone himself was away, and he expressly stated in the speech that he made on Mr. Parnell's proposal that he did not approve of its being made at that time, and should therefore abstain from voting. Mr. Chamberlain received a severe castigation during the debate from several members, who commented in plain terms on the malignity and effrontery of the man.

Bishop William Taylor is Carrying his Principle of self-support into Africa. He writes that at Mamba, on the west coast of Africa, they have planted between thirty and forty square rods of staple products, including three thousand Liberia coffee seed. It takes five years for a coffee-tree to come to full bearing, but then it will produce a yearly crop for sixty years.

A Characteristic Letter from Mr. D. L. Moody is published in Mr. Revell's Record of Christian Work in reply to inquiries about the new school established by Mr. Moody at Mt. Hermon. He says: "Mt. Hermon is a school for young men of sound bodies, good minds, and high aims—not for the physically or morally weak. It undertakes to furnish, for earnest, Christian young men, who desire to serve the Master, opportunities to secure a better preparation than otherwise would be within their reach. It also provides a place where young men whose early education has been neglected can be instructed according to their individual needs. In the admission of candidates reference is had to character and ability, rather than to scholarship. Then, it aims to care for the physical welfare of its pupils, to train them to industrious habits, and to give them some practical knowledge of work, by requiring of each one a certain amount of manual labor daily. It costs $100 per year for board and tuition." An effort is being made to form a library, and fourteen hundred volumes have already been received. More will be welcome.

A Good Bargain was Broken on Principle by a temperance merchant in Akron, O., recently. The mills of Mr. Schumacher in that city were burned down, and the loss to the proprietor was a serious one. The Chicago Herald says that a few days after the fire, two men from Cincinnati called on Schumacher. They said they had heard that in the cellars of the mills was a vast quantity of grain damaged by smoke and water, and they had come with the intention of buying it. The matter was talked over, and a bargain finally struck. The men drew their cheque for the purchase price, a sum running into the thousands, and were just about to hand it to Schumacher when one of them happened to remark that they would be able to make a good deal of whiskey out of that grain. "Do you want this grain to make whiskey of?" inquired Schumacher, stepping back a few feet. "Yes; we are distillers in Cincinnati." "Then, gentlemen, you cannot buy any grain of me. I have no grain to sell to be made into whiskey. Good-day, sirs." And Schumacher gave every bushel of it to teamsters, expressmen, draymen, and poor families keeping cows, to feed to their stock, on condition that they would haul it away.

The Death of Prof. Calvin E. Stowe. Husband of Harriet Beecher Stowe, took place at Hartford, Conn., on August 22d. He was eighty-four years of age, and had been ill for many months. Professor Stowe was a native of Natick, Mass. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1824 and at Andover Theological Seminary four years later. He became Assistant Professor of Sacred Literature at Andover. In 1830 he became Professor of Languages in Dartmouth College. Three years later he removed to Ohio and became Professor of Languages and Biblical Literature at Lane Theological Seminary. In the first year of his residence there he married Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, then twenty-one years of age. In 1836 Professor Stowe was sent by the State of Ohio to examine the public school system of Germany. Upon his return he published a report, which was distributed at the public expense to every school district in Ohio. He left Ohio in 1850 to become Professor of Revealed and Natural Religion in Bowdoin College. Two years afterward he resigned to take the chair of Sacred Literature in Andover Seminary. He continued in Andover until 1864, when he resigned. Professor Stowe was a voluminous writer upon theological subjects. Among his best-known works was a translation of John's "History of the Hebrew Commonwealth," "Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews," "Introduction to the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible," and "Origin and History of the Books of the Bible."

A Clergyman Mistaken for a Bear had a Narrow escape of death on Saranac Lake last week. He had undertaken to hold a service near the spot where the President is spending his vacation, and Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland were expected to be among the congregation. The clergyman, accompanied by a boy, started down the Saranac River to keep his appointment; but the boat was capsized in the rapids, and the two took refuge on a rock to wait until they were rescued by some passing vessel. They waited so long that they grew tired, and, curling themselves up on the rock, went to sleep. Soon afterward a guide with a boatload of luggage passed the rock and saw something dark upon it, but in the dim light could not make out what it was. He shouted, but there was no response; and, concluding that it was a bear, he raised his rifle to bring it down. Happily the clergyman awoke and called out in time, or he would probably have been shot. His providential escape caused a sensation in the neighborhood. The good clergyman will probably be often reminded by humorous brethren that he was once mistaken for a bear, but it may be hoped that in his ministerial labors he will always heed the apostolic injunction, and so the comparison may never be appropriate (11 Tim. 2 : 24).

A Marriage in Two States was Solemnized on August 24th. Some eight hundred excursionists travelling by a train on the Lake Erie and Western Railroad alighted when the train came to a stop near the line which divides Ohio from Indiana. They witnessed there rather a remarkable wedding ceremony. The bridegroom took his stand in Indiana and the bride in Ohio, while the officiating clergyman, with one foot on each side the line, pronounced the words which made them husband and wife. After the ceremony all went aboard the train again, and the journey was resumed. The reporter who telegraphed the incident was not able to learn why that curious place was chosen for the wedding, but it was probably due to a compromise on the desires of the bride and bridegroom that the wedding should take place in their respective States. It may be hoped that in their future life they will always be able to find some basis for compromise when there is a conflict of will, if they are unable to attain to that higher ideal of union in which each takes pleasure in surrendering to the other. In the union between Christ and His people, of which marriage is a type, the will of the Heavenly Bridegroom must be supreme. Not until we have made a complete surrender of our will do we enjoy the perfect peace and rest that the union is capable of affording (Col. 1 : 18).

A Formidable Naval Destroyer was Exhibited in New York Harbor last week. It is a boat which can be sunk and raised at pleasure, and can travel some distance under water. It is built of iron, and looks like one boat laid upside down on another. There is no fire or smoke on board, as the inventor has, by an ingenious device, obtained sufficient heat for the engine boilers by slaking caustic soda. The vessel is raised or lowered when stationary by taking the water or pumping it out. Compressed air is stowed aboard in iron pipes to supply the men's lungs, as the air becomes foul in case it may be necessary to remain several hours under water, and stored electricity lights the boat. The destroying power of the boat consists of two dynamite torpedoes, one at each end on the deck. The inventor thus explained the mission of his boat: "You drive your boat under the iron-clad, and detach the cork-ballasted torpedoes, so that they rise and lie against the enemy's hull, one on each side of the keel. Electric wires still connect the torpedoes with the boat. The hidden boat runs away to a safe distance, and then fires the torpedoes, and then rises to the surface." At the experiment last week the boat was at the bottom, forty feet below the surface, for half an hour, and the men on board said that they suffered no inconvenience. The inventor has named this terrible engine of warfare "the Peacemaker." If it should ever be employed in naval warfare, the enemy it attacks will be little likely to say, "Blessed are the peacemakers." A city lying exposed to the bombardment of a hostile fleet would, however, consider the boat not inaptly named. There are cases in which peace can only come through battle and death. In his spiritual experience the Christian never realizes what peace really is until he sees that it was won by Christ's death and is appropriated by his own death in Him (Eph. 2 : 13-16).

A New Kind of Fire Escape was Tested recently in New York. A wealthy jeweller, who has a haunting dread of being burned to death, was much pleased some time ago when he came across a cheap and apparently trustworthy fire escape. It was an exceedingly simple idea, consisting of nothing but a piece of wood about eight inches long with a tortuous hole through it, and a rope through the tortuous hole. He was told that he would only have to tie one end of the rope to a bed-post, throw the other end out of the window, clasp the piece of wood with one hand, and then set sail. The friction on the rope as it passed through the twists in the block was warranted to let a six-hundred-pound man down gently. He purchased it at once and prudently decided not to wait for a fire before testing it. According to the directions, he tied one end of his rope to the bed-post, and then sat on the sill of his window firmly clasping the slip of wood on the rope. It slipped down gently as the inventor had assured him it would, until the jeweller's feet were about seven feet from the ground. There something checked the descent. He raised himself a little and brought his weight on the wood with a jerk. There was a sharp crack and he lay on the pavement stunned, but not seriously hurt. The rope had broken. The jeweller's neighbors made merry over his accident, but it would be well if his disposition was more common. As a general rule an emergency in temporal affairs finds people unprepared for it, and in the all-important matters of the soul the neglect is still more common. Comparatively few are able to meet death with the calm confidence of the Christian (Ps. 37 : 37, 38).

A Pyramidal Mausoleum is Designed for Chicago. On August 26th an architect submitted his plans for a new burial place to the Commissioner of Health for Chicago. The architect proposes to erect a monster edifice, which might be carried to any height desirable—from twenty-five to fifty stories high. The structure as designed is architecturally beautiful and classic in style and built of solid masonry. Thousands of vaults could be arranged in the building for single interments or for the accommodation of families. The walls of each department would be of stone, with ornamental entrances, and the entire building hollow to the sky. At all times a huge fire would be kept in the basement of the central court, which would effectually destroy all the poisonous vapors and gases which might arise from the process of human decomposition. The building would cost about half a million dollars, and Chicago could then vie with Egypt in the magnificence and colossal character of its necropolis. This scheme would have the approval, it is believed, of persons who are opposed alike to earth-burial and cremation. In the discussion that has arisen about the best mode of disposing of the dead every one has recognized that sanitary considerations alone are involved. No one imagines that the happiness or misery of the dead themselves is affected by the mode adopted. If it was discovered that a certain disposition of the remains of a departed friend would insure his felicity, that plan would be universally adopted regardless of trouble or expense. Yet this concern does not produce its logical result of impelling the living, who know that they too must die, to accept the offer of eternal happiness which God has made to all (Isa. 38 : 18, 19).

CONFIDENCE AND CONCERN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the which cause I also suffer these things: nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day. Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us."—2 TIMOTHY I: 12-14.

OUR apostle was in prison. If he was confined in the Mamertine, those of us who have shivered in that dark underground dungeon may well pity him; and if he was confined in the prison of the Prætorian Guards, he fared no better, for the near company of such rough and cruel soldiers would involve much suffering. The apostle was not only by his right hand to a soldier day and night, but he was, to his intense sorrow, forsaken by his friends. The encouragements of Christian communion are exceedingly great, and the loss of them is very bitter. Those who ought to have gloried in the apostle for his fervor, his self-sacrifice, his courage, and his zeal, had turned against him; he writes to Timothy, "This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes." It would seem that these two notable persons were ashamed of Paul's chain, and to their endless disgrace turned against him.

Deserted in his utmost need, deprived of his liberty, and treated as a breaker of the laws, we could not have marvelled if the apostle had been somewhat dispirited. Active spirits are apt to fret in confinement, and tender hearts bleed under desertion. Beside that, the man of God was in daily danger of execution by the tyrant's sword. He was not likely to be spared by the monster who occupied the Roman throne, and already he had the sentence of death in himself. Any morning he might be awakened by a rough summons to come forth and die. See him then—such a one as Paul the aged! Wearing his chain, he sits in his cell, expecting soon to die a cruel death; but instead of being personally discouraged, he has for others. He is thinking of young Timothy, and not of himself. As for himself, he says, "Nevertheless, I am not ashamed;" and then he charges his young brother not to be disheartened nor shaken in faith, but bravely to carry on the great work committed to his charge. It is grand to see how calmly this man bore himself! In his case it was indeed true that "stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage." Paul ranged the world with his free missionary spirit, and he reigned more royally in his prison than Cæsar in his palace. No one envies Nero, but many have felt that Paul's sufferings might readily be embraced for the sake of his exalted life.

What was the cause of the cool courage of the apostle? On what foundation was his peace builded? How was his confidence sustained? He tells us in our text how his fears were removed; and he also informs us as to a matter which pressed upon his mind. The honored apostle had committed all his own matters into the hand of God, and so was at perfect peace about them; but he experienced deep anxiety for another treasure, which was committed to himself, which he handed over to Timothy with an earnest entreaty that he would guard it by the Holy Ghost. The blending of deep peace and holy zeal will give us a condition of heart of a most desirable kind.

I. First, observe carefully

WHAT PAUL HAD DONE.

He had trusted a person—"I know whom I have believed." He had trusted that person with full, clear knowledge of Him; so trusted that he did not alter his trust as years rolled by, but as he grew in the knowledge of that person he was also confirmed in his confidence in Him. He says expressly, "I know whom I have believed;" as much as to say, "I know the person into whose hand I have committed my present condition, and my eternal destiny. I know who He is, and I therefore, without any hesitation, leave myself in His hands." Paul had not ventured upon a fancy, but he had trusted in a well-known Friend. He had not done this in ignorance, nor in fanaticism, nor in desperation; but with cool, clear, deliberate judgment, knowing whom he had trusted. Ignorance is a wretched foundation, but sure knowledge is like a rock.

Paul had gone further, and had practically carried out his confidence, for he had with this Person. He had unreservedly committed his body, soul, spirit, character, life, and immortality to the guardian care of that Person whom he knew and loved so well. I may believe in a person, and yet I may never have committed anything to his charge; he might not wish that I should do so, nor be willing to accept any trust at my hands; but we must go that length with the Lord Jesus. He must be to us the Banker who has the custody of all our valuables, and bonds, and title-deeds; yea we must leave with Him ourselves also. All that we are, all that we have, all that we expect to have, we must confide with Jesus. A poor idiot, who had been instructed by an earnest Christian man, somewhat alarmed him by a strange remark, for he feared that all his teaching had been in vain. He said to this poor creature, "You know that you have a soul, John?" "No," said he, "I have no soul." "No soul!" thought the teacher; "this is dreadful ignorance." All his fears were rolled away when his half-witted pupil added, "I had a soul once, and I lost it, and Jesus found it; and so I have let Him keep it." How could he better have expressed his faith? Is not that exactly what the apostle meant; he passed his soul out of his own keeping into the care of Jesus, his Lord?

I pause here to ask whether we have all done the like. This is a vital question. If you, my friend, are keeping your own soul, you have a poor keeper. You will lose your soul as surely as you attempt to be your own saviour. In the keeping of Jesus nothing shall hurt you either night or day. In Him you dwell in a fortress and high tower, and no enemy shall molest you. Through time and eternity you are secure. Death shall leave you sleeping on His bosom; resurrection shall awaken you in His likeness, and endless ages shall display your security in Him forever and ever. What Paul did is summed up in these words, "I know whom I have believed," "I have committed everything to Him."

II. The next thing is,

WHAT DID PAUL KNOW?

He tells us plainly, "I know whom I have believed." We are to understand by this that Paul looked steadily at the object of his confidence, and knew that he relied upon God in Christ Jesus. He did not rest in a vague hope that he would be saved; nor in an indefinite reliance upon the Christian religion; nor in a sanguine expectation that all things would, somehow, turn out right at the end. He did not hold the theory of our modern divines, that our Lord Jesus Christ did something or other, which, in one way or another, is more or less remotely connected with the forgiveness of sin; but he knew the Lord Jesus Christ as a Person, and he deliberately placed himself in His keeping, knowing Him to be the Saviour. Paul knew no company of saints and virgins, nor even a church to which he trusted his soul; but he says, "I know whom I have believed." On what better ground could he have gone? What could be more reasonable than that he should entrust his all with One so fitted to preserve him till the day of His appearing? Dear friends, do you really know Christ Jesus

AS A REAL PERSON?

Do you trust in Him as now living? I beseech you do not trust the weight of your salvation upon a doctrine. A statement, an abstraction cannot save you; you need the active interference of a person.

Paul also knew the character of Jesus whom he trusted. His perfect character abundantly justified the apostle's implicit trust. How could he do otherwise than trust in one of whom he knew such wonderful things? But how did Paul come to know Christ? I suppose he knew Him in great part by the Word of God. Every page of Scripture, as the apostle perused it, revealed Jesus to him. Paul also knew Jesus in another way than this. He had personal acquaintance with Him; he knew Him as "the Lord Jesus, who appeared unto him in the way." When he was going to Damascus to persecute the saints of God, this same Jesus spoke out of the excellent glory, and said to him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" Brethren, have we any personal acquaintance with Christ? If not, our witness will not run parallel with Paul's utterance in our text, "I know whom I have believed." Cannot you join with our poet, and softly sing—

"Yea, though I have not seen, and still Must rest in faith alone,
I love thee, dearest Lord, and will,
Unseen, but not unknown."

There are other gates of the soul beside eyes and ears, other touches than those of the hand, and other feelings than those of the flesh. Our inner spirit when it would commune with the spiritual world disdains to use the gross and inefficient instruments of this poor body; she cannot with these have fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. More than the senses could convey to the soul she perceives without them. This is a divine and blessed knowledge, and the apostle could, with all his heart, declare that it was his own. He knew the Lord also and trial of Him. Paul had tested Jesus amid furious mobs, when stones fell about him, and in prison, when the death-damp chilled him to the bone. He had known Christ far out at sea, when Euroclydon drove him up and down in the Adriatic; and he had known Christ when the rough blasts of unbrotherly suspicion had beaten upon him on the land. All that he knew increased his confidence. "I know," said he; he was past the age of speculation and theory. Look at his hoary locks and his scarred face; he is no fair-weather sailor; he has sailed with his Lord upon the great deeps, and has suffered many things for His sake; and now after all his experience he does not say that he hopes, supposes, or thinks, but he writes, "I know." Glorious dogmatist, we are not ashamed to follow in thy track!

BY PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE

III. Thirdly, let us inquire—

WHAT HE WAS PERSUADED OF.

Implicitly Paul declares his faith in our Lord's willingness and faithfulness. He does not mention these in words, but sometimes there is great instruction in omissions; things not said may perhaps be more conspicuous by their absence than things which are spoken. Silence is often more emphatic than speech. Paul does not raise the question whether the Saviour was willing or faithful to keep what he had committed to Him—he takes that for granted. He will not even assert his knowledge of the truth and grace of his Redeemer; he leaves these among the things which could not be questioned for a moment. Dear heart, if thou hast given thyself to Christ, Christ has given Himself to thee; do not doubt His readiness to receive thee!

But the point which the apostle expressly mentions is the power of Christ—"I am persuaded that He is able." He had a solemn conviction of the ability of the Lord Jesus, who is able to save unto the uttermost. Let us hope that no believer here has any doubt about the power of Christ; if he has, the doubt is most absurd. "Oh," says one, "I do not doubt the ability of Christ to save me?" May I ask you, then, what you do doubt? "Oh, I doubt my own merit, my own ability, and so forth." What have any of these things to do with the matter in hand, which is the power of Jesus? These things are out of the circle altogether. All the salvation of a man dependeth upon the Lord Jesus Christ; and if He be you, why are you full of fears? If you have committed your money to the banker, and you say, "I am afraid it is not safe," the only justifiable reason for such suspicion must be because the bank is not solvent. Would you say, "I doubt about my money, because I have a headache?" Would that be rational? Would you say, "I am afraid my money is unsafe because my eyesight is failing me"? Does that influence the safety of your deposit at the bank? Nothing can affect that matter but want of stability in the bank itself. If you have committed yourself to the care of the Lord Jesus Christ, I cannot listen to those miserable "ifs" and "buts;" they are unreasonable and irrelevant. I blow them away as so much chaff. If Jesus is able to save, and you are trusting Him, there is no room for distrust. Well may you say, "I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him."

What was this which Paul had committed to Christ? He committed to Him everything that he had for time and for eternity; his body, his soul, his spirit; all fears, cares, dangers, sins, doubts, hopes, joys; he just made a clean removal of his all from himself to his Lord. "I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him." See how the eye of the apostle lights up as he tells his amanuensis to write down, "He is able to keep my deposit against that day."

Those of you who are acquainted with the original will follow me while I forge a link between my third division and my fourth. If I were to read the text thus it would be quite correct—"I am persuaded that He is able to against that day." Here we have a glimpse of a second meaning. If you have the Revised Version, you will find in the margin "that which He has committed to me;" and the original allows us to read the verse whichever way we choose—"He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him"—or "that which He has committed unto me." This last expression, though I could not endorse it as giving the full sense of the text, does seem to me to be a part of its meaning. He seemed to say, "I have preached the Gospel which was committed to my trust; and now, for having preached it, I am put in prison, and am likely to die; but the Gospel is safe in better hands than mine."

I cannot tell you what heart-cheer it often brings to my soul, in these evil days, to join in the confidence of this text. At the present moment, it seems as if parts of the Church had almost forgotten the Gospel of the grace of God. We hear on all hands "another Gospel, which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ." Worldliness is growing over the Church, she is mossed with it. The visible Church is honeycombed through and through with a baptized infidelity. Unholy living is following upon unbelieving thinking. They boast that they have nearly extirpated Puritanism; some of us are described as the last of the race. Have they quenched our coal? Far from it. The light of the doctrines of grace shall yet again shine forth as the sun. "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep my deposit against that day."

IV. This leads me on to this fourth point—
WHAT HE WAS CONCERNED ABOUT.

The matter about which he was concerned was this deposit of his—this everlasting Gospel of the blessed God. He expresses his concern in the following words: "Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us."

First, he is concerned for the steadfastness of Timothy, and as I think for that of all young Christians, and especially of all young preachers. What does he say? "Hold fast the form of sound words." I hear an objector murmur, "There is not much in words, surely." Sometimes there is very much in words. Vital truth may hinge upon one word. "Surely we may change our terms." I have no objection if I know that your intentions are honest. "Surely we may change the form of a creed, however sound it may be." Do so if you like. I will not contend for words to no profit. But as for some of you who ask for these changes, I shrewdly suspect that you would get rid of a phrase that you might be rid of that which the phrase means. You gentlemen who say, "Surely you will not stick out for a word," are, after all, neither so innocent nor so liberal as you appear to be.

Brethren, it is not a word they would amend, but a truth they would efface. I intend calling a rose a rose, even though I admit that by another name it might smell as sweet, for I perceive that there is an intent to inflict upon me a rank smelling weed which is no rose at all. When people rail at creeds as having no vitality, I suppose that I hear one say that there is no life in egg-shells. Just so; there is they are just so much lime, void of sensation. "Pray, my dear sir, do not put yourself out to defend a mere shell." Truly, good friend, I am no trifler, nor so litigious as to fight for a mere shell. But hearken! I have discovered that when you break egg-shells you spoil eggs; and I have learned that eggs do not hatch and produce life when shells are cracked. I have come to be rather tender about shells now that I find that certain rogues are depriving me of chickens by cracking my egg-shells. Brethren, do not change your posture nor shift your position. Stand fast on immutable truth, trusting and loving your Lord. Hold the old faith, and hold it in the old fashion too.

The apostle was anxious, not only that the men should stand, but that the everlasting Gospel itself should be guarded. "That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us." O friends, it were better for us that the sun were quenched than that the Gospel were gone! I believe that the moralities, the liberties, and peradventure the very existence of a nation depend upon the proclamation of the Gospel in its midst. Have you not noticed that where the Gospel has been given up, and various forms of infidelity have ruled, foul pollution has also boiled up from below! The very idea of morality seems to have departed from some men by whom belief in God has been rejected. The Lord save us from the general spread of this mischief! God grant that future ages may not have to curse us for having been undecided or cowardly in

THE HOUR OF CONFLICT!

How are we to keep the faith? There is only one way. It is of little use trying to guard the Gospel by writing it down in a trust-deed; it is of small service to ask men to subscribe to a creed; we must go to work in a more effectual way. How is the Gospel to be guarded? "By the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us." If, my dear brothers and sisters, the Holy Spirit dwells in you, and you obey His monitions, and are moulded by His influences, and exhibit the result of His work in the holiness of your lives, then the faith will be kept. A holy people are the true body-guard of the Gospel. God send us, more and more, the Holy Ghost! May He be in us as rivers of living water! Oh, for His heavenly presence in this day of blasphemy and rebuke! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A PRE-MOSAIC STATUE.*

At the last Universal Exhibition the most indifferent visitors, ignorant alike of archæology and art, were struck dumb with admiration before a wooden statue which has come down to us from these most remote ages. "A miracle alike of preservation and art," says M. F. Lenormant, "this statue, as a study of nature, as a striking and life-like portrait, is unsurpassed by any Grecian work. . . . From the inscriptions on the tomb in which it was discovered, we know that it represents a certain Ra-em-Ké, a man of some importance during several reigns of the fifth dynasty. . . . The sculptor has represented him on foot, calmly walking in some town under his government. . . . Parts of this figure have been much injured; . . . it has lost the thin coating of colored stucco which originally covered it, and on which the sculptor probably added his finishing touches. What must it not have been when intact and free from the ravages of time? Everything is faithfully copied from living nature; . . . it is evidently a true portrait. . . . The modelling of the body is marvellous. . . . but it is the head which most challenges admiration; it is a prodigy of life. . . . The mouth, parted by a slight smile, seems about to speak. The expression of the eyes is almost distressing. The eyeballs are shaded by lids of bronze, and are formed of pieces of opaque white quartz, . . . in the centre of which are inserted rounded bits of rock crystal to represent the pupils. Under each crystal is fixed a shining nail, which indicates the visual point, and produces the astonishing and life-like expression."

As this Ra-em-Ké lived under the fifth dynasty, his iconic statue must have been executed about the year 4000 B.C. More than fifty-eight hundred years have therefore passed over these fragile pieces of cedar and mimosa wood without effacing the marks of the artist's chisel.

THE ROSETTA STONE.

The stelæ, or tablets with historical and funeral inscriptions, have become the true annals of Egypt. The stelæ consist of a mixture of figures and symbols, some merely written, and some engraved in relief, hollowed out, or produced by a combination of the two processes. The historical tablets, like the Roman Capitoline tables, were destined to preserve the memory of great public events. Although the epitaphs were only written in memory of the dead, they form a collection of useful documents relating to religious, domestic, and even national history.

What we have said of the stelæ applies equally to the sarcophagi, a name which has been given without due consideration to boxes or tubs of granite, basalt, or calcareous stone, intended to contain mummies. Champollion himself brought home the chief of the sarcophagi of the Louvre, the one which contains the body of a basilico-grammate called Taho, priest of Imhotep (the Egyptian Æsculapius), under the twenty-sixth dynasty. Every part of it, inside and out, is covered with inscriptions, written in groups in the retrograde system. It is considered the masterpiece of engraved sculpture of the Saite epoch—indeed, artists are never weary of admiring these thousands of figures, all of which are cut with as much precision and good taste as if they were on precious stones.

Among this collection are to be found numerous relics of the religious, civil, and domestic life of ancient Egypt, which cannot fail to interest those who care to recall the life of an extinct people, and, as the geologist builds up the antediluvian world with fossils, to reconstruct a by-gone civilization from the ruins it has left.

The Rosetta stone was found during the French occupation of 1799, near the town from which it takes its name (the ancient Bolbitimim, called Rachid by the Arabs), in the ruins of a temple dedicated to the god Atum-Nefer, by the Pharaoh Nechao. The inscriptions on this stone, written by order of the high priests, assembled at Memphis to invest Ptolemy I. (Ptolemy Epiphanes) with royal prerogatives in 193 B.C., commemorate the services rendered to the country by this prince. But it is not this which makes the Rosetta stone so valuable and famous. By a fortunate coincidence these inscriptions are engraved in three languages and three characters: 1, Hieroglyphics, or hieratic writing; 2, Demotic or enchorial writing; 3, Greek writing. The last was easily read and interpreted, and a comparison instituted between it and the hitherto unknown hieroglyphics which repeated the same thing, so that the Rosetta stone became the first key to hieroglyphic writing.

DISCOVERY OF THE BODIES OF THE PHARAOHS.

(See Illustrations.)

A DISCOVERY of extraordinary interest to Bible readers was made in June last in the Museum at Boulak, near Cairo, in Egypt. The particulars are just now received from the professor and the distinguished persons who witnessed the discovery. On June 1st Professor Maspero proceeded to open the glass cases containing the embalmed bodies which were found five years ago at the bottom of a subterranean sepulchre in the western plain of Thebes. It was known by the inscriptions on the caskets that the bodies were those of royal persons, and it was with intense interest that the examination was awaited, as the inscriptions on the bandages in which the bodies were swathed would show who the bodies actually were. The Khedive of Egypt came in state with his chief officers to see the bandages unwrapped. The representative of the Queen of England was also there. There were thirty mummies, and it was found that among them were two of the three Pharaohs mentioned in the book of Exodus—Seti I. and Rameses II. When the bodies were stripped of the bandages in which the embalmers wrapped them three thousand years ago, the features were disclosed of the men who figured so prominently in the Bible narrative. Photographs were taken of them, and from these photographs our illustrations on this page have been prepared.

Seti I., whose features as they now appear are depicted in the illustration on the right, was "the new king who knew not Joseph" (Ex. 1: 8). What is known of him from secular records corroborates the Bible record. He belonged to a new dynasty, wholly unconnected with that under which Joseph had attained to high office. It was he who built, to protect his frontier, the great wall and huge arsenals called in Exodus "treasure or store cities" (Ex. 1: 11). As he grew older, he associated with himself on the throne his son, Rameses, then a boy of twelve years of age, who reigned jointly with him for about twenty years. When Seti died Rameses reigned alone for forty-seven years, so that in all his reign covered a period of sixty-seven years. His title was Rameses II., or, as the Greeks called him, "Sesostris." He was the Pharaoh whose daughter adopted Moses. Thus he was the Pharaoh who ordered the murder of the children, and the Pharaoh from whose face Moses fled (Ex. 2: 15). His embalmed body is also among the mummies, and a picture, taken from the photograph of it, is on the left of the illustration.

The bodies were identified by the inscriptions of the embalmers to the accuracy of which apparently the high priest of that day certified. The body of Rameses was covered from head to foot in a garment of white linen, and over that was layer upon layer of bandage covered with the bituminous substance used by the embalmers. When these coverings were taken off the spectators gazed on the features of Rameses the Great." Maspero says: The head is long and small in proportion to the body. The top of the skull is quite bare. On the temples there are a few sparse hairs, but at the poll the hair is quite thick, forming smooth, straight locks about two inches in length. White at the time of death, they have been dyed a light yellow by the spices used in embalment. The forehead is low and narrow; the brow-ridge prominent;

the eyebrows are thick and white; the eyes are small and close together; the nose is long, thin, hooked like the noses of the Bourbons. The temples are sunken; the cheekbones very prominent; the ears round, standing far out from the head, and pierced, like those of a woman, for the wearing of earrings. The jawbone is massive and strong; the chin very prominent; the mouth small but thick lipped. The teeth worn and very brittle, but white and well preserved. The mustache and beard are thin. They seem to have been kept shaven during life, but were probably allowed to grow during the king's last illness; or they may have grown after death. The hairs are white, like those of the head and eyebrows, but are harsh and bristly, and a tenth of an inch in length. The skin is of earthy brown spotted with black.

Finally, it may be said the face of the mummy gives a fair idea of the face of the living king. The expression is unintellectual, perhaps slightly animal; but, even under mummification, there is plainly to be seen an air of sovereign majesty, of resolve, and of pride. The rest of the body is as well preserved as the head; but, in consequence of the reduction of the tissues, its external aspect is less life-like. He was over six feet in height. The chest is broad; the shoulders are square; the arms are crossed upon the breast; the hands are small and dyed with henna. The legs and thighs are fleshless; the feet are long, slender, somewhat flat-soled, and dyed, like the hands, with henna. The corpse is that of an old man, but of a vigorous and robust old man.

The body of the third Pharaoh mentioned in the Exodus is not announced as being among the mummies. It may, however, yet be found, as it is improbable that he was drowned with his army in the Red Sea. Neither Moses nor Miriam mentions him as being among the bodies cast up on the shore, as they probably would have done had they seen him. A later poet speaks of him as having been overthrown with them (Ps. 136: 15), but not specifically of his death. He was a man of little courage. In his war with the Libyans, on one occasion, when there was danger, he left his place at the head of the army to one of his generals, having, he said, had a vision in which his god ordered him not to proceed in person. Probably a convenient vision of similar purport saved him from drowning in the Red Sea. The records of his reign do not mention the plagues nor the disaster of the Red Sea, as the court chronicles were expected to record only triumphs and successes. It appears, however, from their narratives, recently deciphered, that this king, whom they call Menephtah, lost his eldest son by an untimely death, which they fail to describe. Moses supplies the missing link in their narrative (Ex. 12 : 29).

NELLIE MORTIMER'S CROSS.

(See Illustration.)

IN a sequestered nook of the vicarage garden sat a young lady of some eighteen years of age. She had only lately graduated, and had returned to the old vicarage with rather vague ideas of the future. Nellie Mortimer did not mean that her life should be wasted in frivolity or spent in any useless way. She wanted to do something great, heroic, noble—something that would make her name famous. The lives of "the saints" had been her favorite study for the past few months, and on this pleasant July day she had one of them on her knees for perusal.

She thought of herself nursing soldiers wounded in battle, or going from house to house as a ministering angel in some fever-stricken city, or going among savages to tell them of Jesus. She wondered whether an opportunity for heroism would ever come. It never occurred to her that near at hand a labor of love was waiting for her. Services, in which she could expend her devotion to her Master, might be rendered to the aged clergyman, her father, to her infirm mother, and to the sick and the poor around her. These were dull, unromantic duties, which were too prosaic for her soaring ambition. As she thought of her circumscribed lot, she sighed heavily. Her father, who was meditatively pacing the garden path, heard the sigh and peeped through the foliage at his dissatisfied daughter. "Ah! Nellie," he said, "sighing so heavily at your time of life? What is the matter, daughter?"

Nellie poured out her story freely in his attentive ears.

"So my daughter is ambitious, is she?" he said, gently. "Well, I am glad that the material for a Christian heroine is still to be found in this apathetic nineteenth century. I should not be surprised if there is a dire need of it soon. Our optimistic friends, the young preachers, are looking forward to better times and to a world regenerated by the Gospel; but that is not as I read prophecy. Very dark days must come first, and there is need even now that we stand bravely by our colors. There may be direr need soon of intrepid men and women ready to die for the truth. You would be one Nellie?"

"Indeed I would, papa."

"I am thankful, dear," said the old clergyman, kissing her gravely on the forehead. "You would not do as Peter did after declaring his readiness to die for the Saviour—go and deny Him when the crisis came. It was sad of so daring a man, was it not?"

Nellie Mortimer's Picnic.

"I could not do that, papa, if God protected me," Nellie said, quietly, though she was a little startled by the warning so delicately given.

"Yes; we must always add that, Nellie. Without God's help we are weak creatures, capable of shameful things. Well, the time of trial may come; but in the mean time what is the best preparation?"

"I do not know, papa; I never thought of preparation."

"It is not in idly waiting, is it? What would you think of Sunday-school work or visiting the poor?"

"That is so dull and wearisome," said Nellie, shrugging her shoulders.

"Yes, that is so; but don't you think that the very disagreeableness of it to you is its chief merit as a discipline? Taking up the cross is never described as a pleasant matter. If these tasks I speak of are irksome, may not they be your duty? The fact that they are irksome renders it all the more likely that they are the cross you are intended to take up."

"There is nothing grand or heroic about them," said Nellie.

"Is there not? It appears to me that the young Christian doing for the sake of Jesus any dull work that is in any degree repulsive to her is a heroine. The work you contemplate and that you call heroic is attractive to you, is it not?"

Nellie nodded and smiled.

"Then where is the self-denial and self-sacrifice in it? You would be doing it for your own sake and for the sake of the fame and honor it would bring you. It is for Christ's sake that the Christian labors who has the spirit of the Master. Think it over, my dear," and the good minister left Nellie to her meditations.

It was just a year after that interview that Nellie Mortimer was again in the vicarage garden presiding at a tea-table around which were gathered the children of her Sunday-school class and their friends. Their bright, happy faces were not more beaming than that of their beloved teacher and friend. There were families in the village who looked for Nellie's visits as the one bright spot in their monotonous lives, and invalids who smiled when she entered their room and said life would be very dull without her. There was no lack of work for her at home and abroad, and her ceaseless effort was to render every one around her happier than they were already. This was a day of pure pleasure, for it did not need much to make the little folks happy, and their merriment was infectious.

After they were gone home tired with pleasure, Mr. Mortimer joined his daughter in the garden. He led her to the nook where she had sat sighing that day a year before.

"Have you taken up the cross we were talking of here a year ago, Nellie?" he asked.

"No, papa; my work has been no cross. I have been very happy in it."

"Ah! so says every one that carries the cross. I never knew any one who had any other story to tell of it. It seemed a heavy burden to you at first, my daughter, before you touched it; but, like all the others, the burden has become a pleasure and a delight."

THE WAY OUT.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.*

Suggestive Dreams.

LEROY went out into the night with the pathetic words with which Miss West had closed their interview ringing in his ears. He could still feel the grasp of her hand on his own, and his pulse was beating rapidly under the emotion it had aroused. He turned a little out of his direct route to his rooms, that he might think over the conversation, and realize exactly how he stood toward this fair young believer.

"It is certain," he muttered, "that she has taken a deep interest in me. She has evidently set her heart on my conversion. How profoundly she was moved by the thought of my danger! I wonder how much of personal regard there was in her anxiety. Very little I am afraid. A bright, gentle nature like hers would feel distress about any one that she thought was in danger."

He entered his rooms, flung off his clothes, and was soon asleep. Lightly as he had thrown off the tender appeal to him to fly for refuge, his mind was more deeply impressed by it than he then knew. In his sleep he was standing, as she had described him, on the edge of a precipice. A great black yawning chasm was below him, and on the opposite bank he saw an angel with white robes beckoning to him, and pointing him to a road that he could not see. Then he felt himself slip and fall down, down; and as he fell the angel wept and wrung her hands, and he saw that her face was Carrie West's. He woke with cold perspiration on his hands and face, and was trembling with his terrible dream.

No sooner was he asleep than he was sailing in imagination on a wide lake, calm and glassy, in which the stars were reflected, and which the moonlight silvered, as he remembered to have seen it once during a voyage on a summer vacation. The calm was delightful, and he leaned over the ship's side with his eyes fixed on that stream of placid light. Suddenly the moonlight took a different form. It was an angel with outspread wings shining upon him, and the light from her form was like the light that the moon had shed. He seemed to realize that the change was only perceptible to him, and that the sailors would have seen in it nothing but the moonlight as before. Then the angel raised her hand and pointed. He turned, following the direction indicated, and to his horror saw the vessel wrapped in flames. Great tongues of fire licked the masts, and the ropes cracked and parted around him. The boards under his feet became intolerably hot, and he looked all around the horizon for some way of escape from the fierce burning. There was only one, and that was a boat at the angel's feet, and she pointed to it. He leaped with all the muscular force he possessed, and struck out for it, but a wave lifted it out of his reach and he sank under the water. As he fell he caught sight of that angelic countenance, and it was that of the Christian girl who had pleaded with him some hours before. It had the same expression on it that Carrie's had worn when she said, "I utter no threats." Again he woke, and this time he felt that sleep was impossible for him any more that night.

He went to his table and lighted his lamp. Then he opened his trunk and felt for the Bible that his mother had slipped in before he left home. He found it, and when Burt awoke in the morning he saw a sight that astonished him more than any he could have imagined. It was the valiant free-thinker, the avowed sceptic sitting there reading the Bible.

"Why, Ransom," he said, "what is the matter? You look as if you had seen a spectre."

"I have had horrible dreams," Leroy answered, "so I thought I would get up and read. I was being tortured and was helpless. If I must be punished for my evil deeds, I prefer to take my punishment with my eyes open."

"And you are searching that Book to find out the details, eh?"

"No, it was not that; but I had a long talk with Miss West last night, and it ran on religion, so I thought I would just look up the points she raised. It has done no good. One needs to have the prior question settled before one can gain any light from the Bible. If these men were writing at the dictation of a God, I for one would listen humbly; if they wrote their own thoughts, they were as liable to mistake as other men."

"I thought you had settled that question long ago."

"So I had, but it is a serious one, and it does no harm to go over the ground again."

"It is that young lady who is unsettling you, Ransom. Why don't you invite me to your interviews? I should like to witness the collision of the masculine and feminine intellect at close quarters. How is it coming out? Will she convert you, or will you convert her. If I were a sporting man I think I would bet on you, for love-sick as you are, you are a pretty vigorous fighter."

Leroy smiled the smile of conscious power, and accepted graciously the homage his friend paid him. Would he be able to convert Carrie West to his opinions? He was not so sanguine of it as his friend. There were others, however, beside Burt who thought such an issue of the acquaintance possible. More than one Christian friend of the young lady was sorry to see her intimate with young Ransom. One motherly old body even went so far as to warn her against continuing the acquaintance.

If a young man of no real force of character, who did not even profess religion, but only did not avow unbelief, had bestowed his attentions on Carrie, this simple-hearted old woman would have had no objection to him. But Leroy was an infidel! That was as bad as if he had been a tippler. Why? Because a drunkard may injure himself and a few others, but the influence of an infidel is never-ending, and the seeds of error sown by him will never cease to germinate and grow, and the consequent woe will never, never stop. But there are some who throw stones at the infidel who might be better employed. If those perish who deny the existence of God but lead moral lives, what will be the fate of those who believe in Him but obey Him not? There are people whose characters are putrid with meanness and corruption, who will lift up their hands in holy horror at an infidel, when he may possess the elements of true nobleness of mind, and only needs to be led aright to become a power for good. The sneers that sceptics receive from those who ought to seek the wanderer and win him to God make them doubly sceptical, and often render them morose and unapproachable.

Others also saw with regret the acquaintance ripening between the young people, and among them was Pendleton Sanderson, a student of the same college. His motives were not so disinterested as those of Carrie's motherly counselor. While heartily disliking Leroy on principle, believing him to be a dangerous man and suspecting him of being insincere in his scepticism, he was actively opposed to him on personal grounds, which were more potent with him than religious principle. He had suffered humiliation at Leroy's hands more than once in public discussion, and chafed under a defeat which, as he knew, was due to his own mental inferiority. With the right and the truth on his side, he had failed to conquer, and Ransom, the champion of error, had carried off the crown. To wounded vanity was now added jealousy. He, too, had heard Carrie West's essay on the night when Ransom and Train were so powerfully moved by it, and he, too, was touched with admiration. He had also sought Carrie's acquaintance, but without success. He was consequently mortified when he saw the honor which he had failed to win given to one who he believed was less worthy than himself. Surely, he thought, Miss West could not be aware of the true character of the man she was admitting to her friendship. He might serve her and advance his own interests by unmasking his rival. He therefore wrote to Miss West, denouncing Ransom in terms as emphatic as they were coarse. Miss West read the letter, divined the motive of the writer, and then threw the missive into the fire.

If, therefore, any harm to Carrie resulted from the friendship, it would not be for lack of warning. She appreciated at the true value her friends' concern for her safety, but for herself she had no apprehension. Her religion was a matter of experience, and from that standing-ground argument could never drive her. Besides, she had been attracted by the young student, and believed that the very elements of his character which had driven him into scepticism would make him a valiant soldier of the cross, if they could be yoked in the Master's service. She might not be able to win him for Christ, but she would use with that object the influence she had evidently acquired over him, as far as it was possible. The influence had not been of her seeking; it had come to her involuntarily, and who could tell whether it might not have been sent of God for the purpose of Leroy's reclamation! So she decided to continue the acquaintance in spite of warning. Her decision was put through an ordeal soon afterward by a step which marked with some emphasis Leroy's attitude toward religion. He undertook to prove in public that the Bible and science were antagonistic.

The step was unpremeditated on the part of Ransom. He was led to it by a discussion which arose in the recitation-room of a genial and popular professor—Professor Rich. The good old man had seen many young men confirmed in antagonism to divine truth by repression, and it was, therefore, his custom to allow the utmost freedom of discussion in his room. His principles were well known, but the students might oppose them to his face without fear of castigation. It was better, he believed, that they should express their doubts openly than nurse them and brood over them in silence. On this particular occasion the conversation had drifted to the subject of geology, and some of the students who had devoted considerable attention to the science spoke of the vast time that had elapsed before the earth had become a fit habitation for the human race. Leroy, who had taken little part in the discussion, turned to Professor Rich and said,

"That doesn't agree with Genesis, does it, professor?"

"I have noticed, Mr. Ransom," said Professor Rich, "that you appear to have considerable trouble with the reconciliation of the Bible and science; why do not you and Mr. Wentworth make it the subject of a public discussion?"

"Agreed," said Leroy.

"I accept the challenge," said Wentworth.

"That is well," said the professor. "Now, how much time do you want for preparation?"

"Four weeks," said Wentworth; and it was agreed that in four weeks the discussion should take place.

During this time Leroy applied himself diligently to the preparation of his part of the discussion. At the head of the manuscript on which he wrote his thoughts was this question, which he was to answer in the negative: "Resolved, That the teachings of Science and the Bible are in accord." Science was first. All through that manuscript you might have seen "science" written with a capital "S," and "Bible" written with a small "b." This was an index of the estimation in which they were held by him respectively. Alas! his elaborate preparations were entered into, as we may suppose, more for the sake of victory than for the sake of truth. Leroy did not, however, bring his motives under the microscope of close analysis, and he never once observed that all through he thought more of self than of truth. He was bound to present an array of facts, or what he deemed facts, that would overwhelm his opponent and carry off the laurels; and strange to say, he never once thought of the influence of this debate—of the minds it might lead astray, or the peace of soul it might disturb. Like other infidels, he had but a very meagre sense of moral responsibility.

He gathered up all the facts of geology he could collect from its special and general literature. He collected the views of infidel and Christian geologists, and arranged them, like so many batteries, against the Mosaic narrative of creation. He consulted the works of Hugh Miller, Agassiz, Dana, Haeckel, Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, and every author to whom he could obtain access, and carefully collected every item that could be made to subserve his interest. He read discussions on both sides of the question, corroborated and emphasized the objections to Genesis, and answered and ridiculed the views of the reconcilers. At last his investigations were finished, the peroration was completed enthusiastically, and his manuscript consisted of twenty-four closely-written pages of foolscap—about an hour's speech. Then he set to work to memorize it. In his room, in bed, in the woods, he rehearsed his speech, even the gesticulations which were to accompany the most important portions.

And did he believe that he was right? He did, as near as it is possible for a man in his unregenerate state to believe sincerely. Any man with his mental constitution and precisely under the same circumstances and in an unregenerate state would have done, believed, and disbelieved much as he did.

On Thursday evening, four weeks after the first arrangement, the momentous occasion was at hand, and Leroy went for Carrie to escort her to the hall.

"You are sure you are thoroughly ready, Mr. Ransom?" she inquired.

"I am ready," he rejoined, without any appearance of egotism.

Ah, Carrie! inconsistent Carrie! you are distressed about your friend's scepticism, and have wished a thousand times you could lead him aright; but now, since it has come to this debate, you do not want to see him defeated, even though he will advocate error. You are as concerned about his victory as he is. How humiliating it would be to see him vanquished in this intellectual wrestle, and he your—what? Oh, how selfish and proud the best of us are! We would too often rather see truth suffer than ourselves humiliated.

They made their way to Literary Hall. It was full. They found a seat in front, and sat side by side. Dr. Lester, President of the College, came around, shook hands, and said: "Are you ready, Ransom?" Professor Rich's broad, friendly face and portly body came around, too. He was smiling, as usual, and as he shook hands, he said:

"You are ready for the debate, are you?"

Receiving Leroy's affirmative answer, he went upon the platform, as he was president of the meeting, called the house to order, made a few happy remarks in behalf of the disputants, then read the question for discussion.

(To be continued.)

THE MISSION OF THE SPIRIT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 12, John 16: 5-20. Golden Text, ver. 13.

The Promise of the Spirit—His Indwelling in Fallen Man—The Glory of this Dispensation—Foreseen by the Prophets—How the Spirit's Work May be Usurped—In Prayer and Preaching—The Great Need Everywhere—A Crucial Question—Personality of the Spirit—His Office in the World—Convincing—Comforting—Glorifying Jesus.

It was part of Christ's redemption work to make it possible for fallen man to receive the Holy Ghost, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive through faith" (Gal. 3: 13, 14). In this dispensation of the Spirit our glory is God's indwelling. God's people of old were never called "the temple of the Holy Ghost," "the temple of the living God" (1 Cor. 6: 19; 11 Cor. 6: 16). The promise of the blessed Spirit is one of the most precious of God's promises, and runs through the Bible. It was given through Isaiah, "I will pour My Spirit upon thy seed, and My blessing upon thine offspring" (Isa. 44: 3); it was given to Ezekiel, "I will put My Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in My statutes" (Ezek. 36: 27); it was given to Joel, "And it shall come to pass afterward" ("in the last days," Acts 2: 17), that I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions: and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out My Spirit" (Joel 2: 28, 29); and when John the Baptist came, as the forerunner of Jesus, he said, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but . . . He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Matt. 3: 11).

There are many who try to urge themselves into a spirit of prayer, but in so doing they are usurping the work of the Holy Ghost, for praying in the Holy Ghost (Jude 20), "prayer and supplication in the Spirit" (Eph. 6: 18), is that which God accounts true prayer, and that it is which obtains an answer. Who knows what might not be given to the prayer of faith if Christians, as a body, prayed "in the Holy Ghost"! "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove: and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17: 20).

There are many who, by mental effort, by thought and study, get up talented and eloquent discourses. Is not this to usurp the place of the Holy Ghost? Paul would be no party to any such preaching; he was a man full of the Holy Ghost, and, discarding "enticing words of man's wisdom," he spoke "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God" (1 Cor. 2: 4, 5). Peter tells of those "that preached the Gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." When the Holy Ghost preaches,

SOMETHING COMES OF IT.

It is God's Word, the entrance of which gives light, and gives understanding to the simple; whether in Person, or by His messengers, He speaks as One that hath authority, and not as the scribes. And yet, when we are speaking by the Holy Ghost, or praying in the Spirit, we are not conscious of ourselves, we are not pleased with our own earnestness, or gratified by a sense of power. Nothing so empties us as the presence of the Holy Ghost, for He wants all the room for Jesus, so there is none left for self. Every worker who knows anything of the power of the Holy Ghost knows how, when we have had much consciousness of power, hardly any result has often followed; but how, when we have felt empty and powerless—almost dispirited with our lack of power—the Lord has often done great things, and has thus shown us that conscious power is not always the power of the Holy Ghost.

THE GREAT NEED OF THE CHURCH

in the present day is the power of the Holy Ghost. The great need everywhere, whether in work among the heathen, in missions at home, in schools, or in families is the need of the Holy Ghost. And yet, the Holy Ghost is given, He is in the world, He is in the church, He is in every believer. But is He recognized? Is each of us living as a temple of the Holy Ghost, really yielded to Him as a house is to its owner, for His sole use? If not, let the deeds be made out, signed, and sealed; let there be a definite once-for-all yielding up to Him of His property, and a definite acknowledgment of Him as its Owner. Then things will come into order. Then God will be able to have full play in our being, and our life will begin to answer its true purpose; the life of Christ will begin to be manifest in our mortal bodies, we shall become "an habitation of God through the Spirit."

It is a question of questions with many a child of God, "Have I received the Holy Ghost in His fulness?" First let us notice that Holy Scripture always recognizes the Holy Ghost as God: "Now the Lord is the Spirit, . . . even as from the Lord the Spirit" (11 Cor. 3: 17, 18, R. V.), and always speaks of Him as "He," not it. Jesus is revealed to us as a real, living Person—a Person with whom we have to do; and just in the same way is the Holy Ghost, when we really receive Him, revealed to us as a Person. The question, "Have I received Him?" may best be answered by finding out from the Word what His office is and then inquiring,

IS HE FULFILLING THAT OFFICE TO ME?

He has an office for the world, and when we were in the world we knew Him in that office. If we have not done so we are not yet brought out of the world. "He will reprove (or convince) the world of sin and of righteousness and of judgment: of sin because they believe not on Me." It is by the Holy Ghost that every child of God has been convinced of his sin in not believing on Jesus, and it is by the Holy Ghost that he has been able, from the depth of his heart and soul, to call Jesus Lord (1 Cor. 12: 3). No man is converted by an intellectual persuasion of the truth of God. It is only as the Holy Ghost imparts to him another life that he passes from death unto life, from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (John 5: 24; Acts 26: 18). What sight is to the blind, what life is to the dead, that is the Holy Ghost to the natural man. By the Holy Ghost he is born from above, and in the Holy Ghost he has a source of life quite other than his natural life, so that he enters on a life and an experience which were foreign to him before. He sees both himself and God in a new light, he sees men and things in a new light; whereas before God was to him a mere intangible idea, now "all things are of God." The Holy Ghost lifts him up out of his own old world into the spiritual world, and he is a new man.

And just as really as it was His office to convict the sinner, is to make his sins real to him, just so really is it His office to be a Comforter to the child of God, and to make Christ real to him. Satan tries to reverse the order—he comforts sinners and discomferts saints; he seeks to make sinners at ease in their sins, and to make God's children ill at ease in their salvation; he is the world's comforter, though the world knows it not, while the Holy Ghost is the Christian's Comforter, and the Christian too often knows Him all too little. Why is this? The Holy Ghost's comfort runs on a special line. He testifies of Christ, and brings to remembrance what He has said. He does not speak of Himself, and He does not speak to us of ourselves, but only of Jesus—

"HE SHALL TESTIFY OF ME."

Are we longing to be satisfied with ourselves, our own attainments, our own prayers, feelings, or doings? The Holy Ghost will be no help to us along that line. He points, like the magnet, only one way—i.e., to Jesus. "He shall not speak of Himself." Many imagine that the Holy Spirit proclaims Himself, proclaims His own presence in our hearts; but neither that which Jesus said of Him, nor yet the experience of the first disciples, bears out this idea. Some believers who may have been convicted of living to themselves, or of yielding to sin, or of lack of power, may indeed receive the Holy Spirit in a way which they cannot but be outwardly conscious of; others receive Him by faith, without any outward consciousness; but in either case, when He has once full possession, He does not speak of Himself, but of Jesus. He sheds light upon Jesus, talks of Him, and shews Him unto us. He does not remind us of Himself, but of Jesus, "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (John 14: 26). Just as Jesus came to reveal the Father, so the Holy Ghost comes to reveal Jesus. Our blessed Lord said, "As I hear, I judge" (John 5: 30); "The words which I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself" (John 14: 10); and He says of the Holy Ghost, "He shall not speak of Himself; but whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak." The Holy Ghost not only comforts, teaches, guides, testifies of Jesus, and brings to remembrance what He has said,

HE ALSO GLORIFIES JESUS.

"He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall shew it unto you."

Now, how does it stand with us? Is Jesus the Centre of our lives, as the Father was the Centre of His? Do we cease to be discouraged by difficulties and impossibilities, because the Holy Ghost within us sheds light on Jesus within us, so able to do all things? Is a difficulty, a temptation, a trial, a thwarting in our work, only a signal for new comfort and joy of the Holy Ghost, because it means a new revelation to us of Jesus, as the One who will deliver out of the trouble? Is the Holy Ghost continually shewing us our utter incapacity for everything, and at the same time the all-power of Jesus? Do we thus know, not only by faith, but by this very experience, that the Holy Ghost has taken possession of us?

I AM HIS AND HE IS MINE.

"I am my Beloved's and my Beloved is mine."—Cant. vi. 3.

"Loved with everlasting love,
Led by grace that love to know!
Spirit, breathing from above,
Thou hast taught me it is so.
Oh, this full and perfect peace!
Oh, this transport all divine!
In a love which cannot cease,
I am His and He is mine.

"Heaven above is softer blue,
Earth around is sweeter green;
Something lives in every hue
Christless eyes have never seen;
Birds with gladder songs o'erflow,
Flowers with deeper beauty shine,
Since I know, as now I know,
I am His and He is mine.

"Things that once caused wild alarm
Cannot now disturb my rest,
Closed in everlasting arms,
Pillowed on His loving breast.
Oh, to lie forever here,
Care, and doubt, and self resign!
While He whispers in my ear,
I am His and He is mine.

"His forever, only His!
Who the Lord and me can part?
Ah, with what a rest of bliss
Christ can fill the loving heart!
Heaven and earth may fade and flee,
First-born light in gloom decline;
But while God and I shall be,
I am His and He is mine."

THE RECENT VOLCANIC ERUPTION AND EARTHQUAKE IN NEW ZEALAND.

REV. THOMAS SPURGEON,
Pastor of the Tabernacle, Auckland, New Zealand.

THE extraordinary volcanic disturbance in New Zealand which was the precursor of startling seismic phenomena all over the world has been already mentioned in our news columns. This week we publish on the first page pictures which may give some idea of the calamity, and with them portraits of three widely dissimilar persons who are all identified with New Zealand.

Thomas Spurgeon is the pastor of the large Tabernacle recently erected at Auckland. He is one of the twin sons of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, whose sermons appear week by week in this journal. He was born on September 20th, 1856, and is therefore now thirty years of age. He and his brother were educated at a school in Brighton, where they remained until 1874.

The two brothers early gave evidence of their conversion, and were baptized and admitted to church fellowship. Their first fixed sphere of usefulness was found in a densely-populated neighborhood near London, where they held services in a hired room. The little assembly soon filled the room, and better accommodation had to be secured. The young men went among their friends and collected sufficient money to buy land and erect a small church in which they preached every Sunday.

Early in 1877 alarming symptoms of illness were noticed in Thomas Spurgeon. Eminent physicians were consulted, and a sea-voyage was recommended. On June 14th he set out for Australia, hoping to return in a year invigorated by his trip. He sailed in the Lady Jocelyn, which was commanded by his father's friend, Captain Jenkins, who invited him to conduct the religious services during the voyage. His father's remark on hearing of it was: "Evidently God was teaching his youthful hands to war and his fingers to fight, in anticipation of future battles. Three months' preaching to the same audience amid the rolling of the sea is an admirable preparation for addressing crowds on shore."

He landed at Melbourne on August 28th, 1877. He was fêted and made much of, and treated in quite a princely fashion—doubtless as the representative of his honored father. Numerous preaching services and presentations, and another short voyage, brought him, on the 16th of September, 1878, to Adelaide. On the 19th he set sail for home. His sojourn there was a brief one. In the climate of England the old symptoms of which he had been free during his absence returned, and again he had to fly for his life. This time he went to New Zealand, where he received a warm welcome. The Baptist friends at Auckland, learning that he could not live in England, urged him to remain with them. He consented, and a substantial and commodious church has been erected for him, which has been named the Tabernacle in remembrance of his father's Tabernacle in London. It has a membership of six hundred, and the congregation is about double that number.

Thomas Spurgeon is more manly and vigorous of speech than his brother Charles, who visited this country some two years ago, but he is less strong physically. In the New Zealand climate, however, he does not suffer as he did in England, and there is reason to hope that his life may be prolonged.

TAWHIAO,
King of the Maoris.

THE grim, tattooed personage on the right of the first page picture is the King of the New Zealand Maoris. His people are now chiefly located on the North Island, and are becoming civilized more rapidly than our Indians. There are about forty-five thousand of them. They are fierce fighters, and in battle they have more than once held their own against the English soldiers and artillery. They have learned the white men's vices more readily than his virtues, and have graduated in drunkenness with remarkable facility. None of the aborigines have displayed such a passionate love of intoxicating liquor as the Maoris.

King Tawhiao is the son of Potatan te Whero-where. Tawhiao succeeded his father under the title of Potatan II. He was known at the time as Matutaera, but subsequently took the name of Tawhiao, by which he is now most commonly known. Among the Maoris birth and rank exercise as potent an influence as they do among more civilized races. No Maori chief is truly great unless he can trace back his descent to the arrival of the first Maoris in their canoes from Hawaiki in the fourteenth century. Tawhiao can do this, his ancestor being Hotonui, who came in the canoe Tainui, which made the land at Kawhia, a picturesque port on the east coast.

The king is tall and slim, with a very dark skin, much darker than that of many of his subjects. His face is elaborately tattooed, and he wears a piece of green-stone suspended from the lobe of his right ear. His forehead is high, the crown of his head being pyramidal. He wears European clothing, in which he looks as awkward as he feels; but in his native costume he is more imposing.

Two years ago he made a voyage to Europe with a number of his chiefs. There was a dispute between the Maoris and the white settlers, and Tawhiao, failing to get judgment in his favor from the New Zealand Government, resolved to appeal to the British Government. His people raised $15,000 to pay his expenses, and he went to London to plead his cause in person.

Tawhiao has taken the total abstinence pledge, and has received Christian baptism. The first effort to preach the Gospel to the tribe was made in 1814 by the apostolic Samuel Marsden, who repeatedly visited the islands in the interests of the Church Missionary Society. In 1818 the Rev. S. Leigh paid his first visit to the country, and some time afterward a Wesleyan Methodist Mission was regularly organized. Besides the flourishing centres of Christian influence now belonging to the Episcopal and Wesleyan Methodist Churches, the Baptists have organized an active evangelistic agency in New Zealand.

TE WHITI,
The Maori Prophet.

IN the centre of the first page picture is a medallion portrait of the man whose fiery harangues aroused the Maori people to an attack on the white settlers in 1882. Two years before this an attempt was made to settle permanently the disputes constantly arising as to the ownership of land. A drunken Maori would sell his own land, or land belonging to some one else, to a white man, and when the money was spent desired to reclaim it. In this and other ways trouble was made, until finally the British Government offered the Maoris a reservation of 260,000 acres, which, under certain conditions, they might hold as an inalienable possession.

The majority of the Maoris accepted, but Te Whiti contemptuously rejected the proposal, and collecting all the disaffected around him, made a stand against the New Zealand Government. He went from camp to camp making speeches of rough eloquence (see illustration on first page), and exciting the people. He led them to believe that an insurrection would be miraculously helped, and that the white men might be easily driven into the sea. His followers increased daily until the Government became alarmed and sent a force of seventeen hundred volunteers to arrest Te Whiti and disperse his camp. On November 5th, 1882, the volunteer force, under Major Tuke, surrounded Parihaka, where Te Whiti was encamped with his followers. A council was being held, but with an audacity which seemed to paralyze the warriors with astonishment, Major Tuke went boldly into their midst, seized Te Whiti, and carried him away prisoner. Te Whiti made no resistance, and after his ignominious surrender the resistance of the Maoris collapsed. They dispersed to their several quarters without striking a blow, leaving arms and ammunition behind. It is hoped that peace is now firmly established.

THE NEW ZEALAND HORROR.
Earthquakes and Volcanic Eruptions.

UNTIL June 10th of this year the district of the Rotomahana Hot Springs was a place of rare beauty, with natural characteristics which caused it to be known as "the wonderland of the world." Now it is a place of horror and desolation, for Mount Tarawera, the towering mountain which overlooked the wondrous scene, has suddenly vomited forth lava, fire, cinders, and ashes over the plain, and an earthquake has rent the rocks in all directions.

In all books about New Zealand is described as an extinct volcano, and as no eruption had occurred from it within the memory of man, and as the Maoris, whose traditions go back five hundred years, had never heard of an eruption from it, there was apparently good reason for supposing it to be extinct. There is, however, a tradition of some disturbances about the year 1776, when a large portion of rocky land about twelve miles from the mountain was hurled into the lake. The temperature of the lake at the time of this convulsion rose above the boiling point, and thirty natives were scalded to death.

Mount Tarawera is more than two thousand feet above the level of the lake which surrounds its northern and western sides. Its top was barren, and was divided into three rocky tables by two volcanic craters. It looks bare and scarred, its steep walls rising up black and terrible as if blasted with lightning, and when clouds gather round its summit and roll in heavy masses along its sides, driven by the fierce winds that play about the crest, it requires no active imagination to people it with weird and spiritual terrors.

TARAWERA LAKE,

which laps the sides of the mountain, is singularly clear and pure, reflecting every cloud which passes across the sky above it. About a year ago the water suddenly changed color, and became nauseous and unwholesome. Tarawera water remained unusable for nearly a year, its color during that space being of a dirty green. Then it changed to perfect purity again. The lake is about eight miles long and six miles wide. Its shores are steep and rocky. Two miles away was which has now disappeared, and in its place is a volcano. A visitor thus described the lake as he saw it, not many months ago: "Its form is very irregular on the south side, where the shore is formed by swamp; three small creeks are meandering and discharging themselves into the lake. In many places warm water streams forth. At its north end the lake grows narrower. The quantity of boiling water issuing from the ground, both on the shores and the bottom of the lake, is truly astonishing. About eighty feet above the lake, on the fern-clad slope of a hill from which in various places hot vapor was escaping, there lies the immense boiling cauldron in a crater-like excavation, with steep reddish sides thirty or forty feet high, and open only on the lake side, toward the west."

THE TERRACES

were the most marvellous of this scene of marvels. They were formed in the rocky side of the lakes, and hot water dripped slowly from step to step down from the upper to the lower lake. Mr. James A. Froude, who visited the region last year, thus writes in his fascinating work "Oceana": "Of these terraces, which he calls the eighth wonder of the world: 'Stretched before us we saw the White Terrace in all its strangeness; a crystal staircase, glittering and stainless as if it were ice, spreading out like an open fan from a point above us on the hillside, and projecting at the bottom into a lake, where it was perhaps two hundred yards wide. The stairs were about twenty in number, the height of each being six or seven feet. The floors dividing them were horizontal, as if laid out with a spirit-level. They were of uneven breadth; twenty, thirty, fifty feet, or even more; each step down being always perpendicular, and all forming arcs of a circle of which the crater was the centre.

THE PINK TERRACE

on the opposite shore of the hot lake was formed on the same lines as the other, save that it was narrower, and was flushed with pale-rose color. Oxide of iron is said to be the cause, but there is probably something besides. We could stand on the brim of the crater and gaze as through an opening in the earth into an azure infinity beyond. Down and down, and fainter and softer as they receded, the white crystals projected from the rocky walls over the abyss, till they seemed to dissolve not into darkness but into light. The hue of the water was something which I had never seen, and shall never again see on this side of eternity. Not the violet, nor the harebell, nearest in its tint to heaven of all nature's flowers; not turquoise, not sapphire, not the unfathomable ether itself could convey to one who had not looked on it a sense of that supernatural loveliness. Comparison could only soil such inimitable purity."

All this beauty is now destroyed by the eruption of June 10th, which covered the terraces with lava and by the earthquake which shook their foundations. (A picture of the Pink Terrace as it was and another of it in its present condition are on the first page.)

of June 10th occurred soon after midnight.

The earth began to shiver and crack. Loud reports followed, which were distinctly heard three to four hundred miles away. In Auckland, about two hundred miles in the north, a reporter was sent several miles by one of the newspapers to see if a ship could be found in distress, the loud reports being mistaken for distress signals. Then followed scenes which baffle description. For hours upon the shaking earth it was difficult to stand erect. Thunder, lightning, and hail reminded the terror-stricken residents of Martin's picture of the "Great Day of His wrath." Mount Tarawera burst forth with fury. From a dozen other centres balls of fire and streams of stones, ashes, and hot mud were hurled into the air, and the atmosphere was thick with dust and charged with a sickening sulphurous smell.

The most graphic account of it is that furnished by Mr. McRae, whose hotel was destroyed in the convulsion (a picture of its ruins is on the first page). Mr. McRae says: "About half-past twelve A.M. the place began to shake, and shook continuously for an hour before the eruption broke out. When this was first seen it was just like a small cloud on the mountain, with flashes of lightning of great brilliancy. Then a pillar of fire, a thousand feet high, shot up from the mountain-top, and shortly afterward what seemed to be heavy hailstones came pouring on the roof, which continued about every quarter of an hour. This was succeeded by a heavy fall of stones, fireballs and mud, the lava falling after the manner of rain. The weight of these substances upon the roof soon began to tell upon it. It gave way at about half-past four A.M. with a loud smash, and the whole of the upper story collapsed, the debris falling into the rooms below.

"The back part of the house, in which was the dining-room, gave way next, and all of a sudden we heard a fearful crash and roar, as if thousands of tons of stuff were falling, and we heard the balcony come down. At this we agreed that we should make an effort to save ourselves, and with this object we determined to leave the hotel.

"At half-past six I went up to the residence of the Hazard family. The house was in ruins and in flames. I then could see no signs of Mr. or Mrs. Hazard and their children. As soon as a glimpse of daylight came we commenced to dig for the bodies of the Hazards, and to our great astonishment discovered Mrs. Hazard alive. Her two children were found dead beside her, but she was not greatly injured. We continued operations until we were quite exhausted, but found no more bodies." Mr. Hazard, an earnest Christian man, was the schoolmaster of the section, and the whole family was greatly respected for its Christian worth. When they saw the fate that awaited them, Miss Hazard took her seat at the cabinet organ, and they joined in a hymn. Soon the crash came. All the family perished but Mrs. Hazard and two children. Mr. Bainbridge, whose tragic death was described in this journal on August 26th (page 533), was a guest at McRae's hotel.

The district devastated is sixty square miles in area. If a dense population had been in the neighborhood, scenes as tragic as are recorded in connection with Herculaneum and Pompeii would have been enacted. As it is, more than a hundred people, mostly natives, were buried alive. Little native settlements that nestled near the deadly mountain have entirely disappeared. Of one tribe a solitary representative alone remains. The region was the scene of the labors of Mr. Fairbrother, a missionary from Spurgeon's College. Mr. Fairbrother removed a short time ago to another charge in a farming district, about fifty miles away. When tidings of this calamity reached him he rode over to see his former flock, and has since been rendering what help he could. Clothing and other necessities are being sent, at his request, from the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon's Tabernacle at Auckland. The natives in districts that have not been injured have also behaved well, dividing freely with their afflicted brethren their own supplies of food and clothing.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Victim of False Pride.—A Friend Related at a recent meeting: "I knew the case of a man who waited on Major Whittle for advice and help. He had been keeping away from Christ because he did not want any one to know that he was anxious about his soul; and how anxious he was no one knew but God and himself. He was in constant misery; not a happy day had he; but pride kept him back from telling any one. He thought it was such a humbling thing to confess that he was a poor sinner, and needed salvation. He was led to Christ, and speedily found forgiveness and peace through faith in Him; but how much anxiety would have been saved him if he had only confessed before. If you let pride hinder you from showing that you need salvation, you are doing it at a great and terrible risk to your own soul."

A Light-Bringing Monk.—The Rev. Mr. Henderson said: "On one occasion Luther was reading a copy of the Bible, and as he read the truth of the Gospel flashed upon him, and he saw his sins standing out in fearful distinctness; his conviction deepened, and he rose and paced his cell exclaiming, 'My sins, oh, my sins.' Just then a monk entered the cell and heard these words of Luther, and began to try and soothe him by reading out of the Prayer Book. Luther listened with rapt attention as the monk, in pity, read article by article until he came to the creed, 'I believe in the forgiveness of sins.' Thousands of times Luther had read that before, but that little article had a new meaning for him now. Light was suddenly thrown on his darkened soul; he seemed to leap up with new life and gladness, and from that time Luther was a new man, and was sent forth to do a glorious work for the Lord."

A Carter Behind a Hedge.—A Devoted Christian worker remarked: "A carter was slowly driving his cart from a country village to Glasgow when he noticed a friend of his own on the road. He invited him to take a seat beside him, as they were going the same way. When he was fairly seated the carter remarked, 'So I hear, Jack, that you have turned revivalist; is that so?' 'If you mean by that,' replied Jack, 'that I have given up my old ways, and found a higher and a nobler calling, then it is all right, for I have done so.' 'And do you mean by that, that you will not join us any more in our merry evenings?' 'Yes,' replied the other; 'much of my time has been spent in rioting and drunkenness, and God says, "He that soweth iniquity shall reap vanity." I mean no more to sow such seed.' And then he said, 'Oh, friend, beware of those moments of temptation, for the end of all things is death.' Jack had reached his destination. The carter pondered the words of his friend until he was again on the quiet road on his return. He then jumped from his cart, and getting behind a hedge, knelt down and cried to God for mercy. For a fortnight he was in deep concern, but at the end of that time he came out clear and bright for Christ, and I have not in all my experience seen a more decided or brighter Christian."

The Opinion of Peter's Mother.—An Evangelist said: "God may answer prayer without our intervention. At a country town, the other day, where we have been holding a series of evangelistic meetings, an experienced worker entered a house where a young girl lay very ill (I fear she is dying, but she is trusting in the Lord, and her mother also is a Christian). This worker asked them if they had any one for whom they would like the interest of the prayers of our meeting. They first said no, that they could not recollect any one just then; but then the girl said: 'Mother, might we not ask them to pray for Peter?' 'No,' said the mother, 'there is no use in praying for Peter; he is foolish. I have prayed for him until I am tired, and I have given it up some time ago.' The worker reproved the mother for her faithlessness, and asked who Peter was, and was told that he was her son. He said he would do what he could for him, and took his departure. The worker, after some difficulty, found Peter, and asked him if he would come to the meeting, but his reply was: 'No, I'll come to none of your meetings.' A few young men who were very recently led to Christ had brought a young fellow into the meeting, hoping that he would meet with Christ, and at the close we found him on his knees, and with tears he was crying to God to have mercy upon him. He was a stranger; no one knew anything about him, but we afterward learned that he was no other than foolish Peter, who had cried for mercy and found Christ that night."

A Dying Daughter's Request.—Captain Hatfield said: "Not long ago, when passing down a certain street, I stood for a few minutes at an open air-meeting, and as I stood there I noticed a poorly clad woman with a little child in her hand, hurriedly going through the crowd, inviting them into the meeting in a neighboring hall. I watched the woman's movements as she went up to one after another, and said: 'Won't you go into the meeting?' She did not go into the meeting herself, but left the crowd and walked up the street as if in great haste to get home. In a few moments I overtook her, and asked her reason for the interest she had taken in the meeting. She answered, 'Some time ago my daughter, who is now at the point of death, was standing at a meeting just at that spot, when some one kindly invited her to go inside. She went, and when there she was led to give herself to the Saviour, and since then she has been so filled with gratitude for what the Lord had done for her that every night, as long as she was able, she went to the open-air meeting and urged people to go inside, that they too might share in this blessing which she had received. The Lord has seen fit to lay her on a bed of sickness, from which she never will recover, and since she has been laid aside she pressed upon me to go out to this open-air meeting and invite the people to enter. I have done so since her illness, and I earnestly pray that this part of the work may not be in vain, for it is a great trial to me, sir, to leave my dying girl alone.' Is there not a lesson here for some Christians who are satisfied by being saved themselves, and are not putting out a hand to save some perishing sinner from the fearful doom that is awaiting every unsaved soul?"

A SALUTATION AND A PLEA.

Dr. Talmage's first Sermon after his Vacation, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Sept. 5, 1886, in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

"Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child?"—II KINGS 4: 26.

National Forms of Salutation—The Renovating Vacation—The Suffering Poor—A Glorious Thing to be Well—The Widened Interest—The Conjugal Love Surviving Years—The Blessing of Children—A Philanthropist on a Steamboat—The Old People—Your Spiritual Welfare—A Startling Contrast—Brooklyn and Charleston—An Epileptic World—Earthquakes of the Past—The Lesson of the Earthquake—The Coming Universal Earthquake.

THE forms of salutation are as different as the nationalities. An Egyptian meeting an Egyptian in that hot land has for salutation, "Do you sweat copiously?" A Chinaman meeting a Chinaman in his native country has for salutation, "Have you eaten your rice?" A Frenchman meeting a Frenchman in his native country has for salutation, "How do you carry yourself?" An American meeting an American has for salutation, "How do you do to-day?" In some lands they shake hands. In others they drop on one knee. In others they put the right hand in the sleeve of the left. Almost every nation having its own peculiar form of salutation. Well, in the text was the ordinary mode.

had been blessed with just one child, and that child went out into the harvest field and got sunstruck, and putting his hands to his temples he cried out, "My head, my head!" and expired before noon. The mother, instead of preparing the child for sepulture, starts out to meet Elisha the prophet. After a while she comes up. Elisha sees her, and he says to his servant Gehazi, "I wonder what is the matter with that Shunamite woman? Go out and meet her." Gehazi the servant starts, and he comes up to this woman, and he cries out, "What is the matter? Are any of you sick? Has anything happened? Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child?"

Standing before you in the first Sabbath after some weeks of absence, I have thought that this text might be very appropriate. Gehazi, in asking these questions of this woman, expressed an anxiety in regard to her personal health; and when I meet you now, after the severe months of the summer have passed and sicknesses have been abroad in different parts of the land, and many of you have been amid perils of railtrain and steamer, it seems to me that the question that Gehazi asked of the woman of Shunem is as appropriate for me to ask this morning of my beloved people when I cry out, "Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child?"

There is hardly a family represented in this house to-day that has not in some of its members been afflicted with some style of physical disorder, but by the ministry of mother, or wife, or friend, or medical attendant, the disease was balked, and you are in the house of God to-day, while Greenwood and Mount Auburn and Laurel Hill have added mightily to their silent populations. Through days or weeks some of you have breathed the tonic of the mountain air, and the tides of health have come into some of your pulses with the rising tides of the sea. There is more color in your cheek, there is more fire in your eye, there is more nerve in your purpose, there is more capacity in your nature to serve God. But we all know that is not the case with many. As God looks down upon these great cities, through the beautiful streets and the dark alleys, oh, how many of disease! They rest not day nor night. The two fans swinging on either side the couch cannot bring relief. The cup is put to the crackling lip, but the thirst rages on. The hot pillow is turned, but the fever burns. The tonic is taken, but the cough exasperates. The tonic is applied, but the strength still fails. Groan passing through the street is swallowed of other groans, and pain shrieks to pain, and hospital calls upon hospital, and from all the great cities of our land there is heard to-day—whether you hear it or not—the wailing of a great agony. It is not, therefore, a trivial question, but one of momentous interest, when I propound it this morning and say to you personally, "Is it well with thee?"

We run so many risks, we have so little foresight, we violate so many laws of nature, there are so many elements of destruction in breath, in wave, in cloud, in sea, it is a matter worthy of indestructible record if this morning, after all the exposures of the summer, you can answer these interrogatories of my text in the affirmative, and put you hand on brain, or lung, or heart, and say, "It is well." Oh, it is —to have free foot, and clear eye, and easy digestion, and alert ear, and stout muscle. Strong men and women, have you thanked God for your health? If not, go and listen to the cry of those who in the morning say, "Would God it were night," and in the night say, "Would God it were morning." If you are seated in the house of God to-day in comfortable health, let your soul go out toward the throne of mercy while you say within yourselves, "It is well."

A GLORIOUS THING TO BE WELL

But my subject goes still further, and it indicates that Gehazi was not only anxious in regard to the personal welfare of this woman of Shunem, but he was anxious in regard to the comfort of her whole family. Standing here to-day, looking into your friendly faces, I am anxious to know not only how you fare personally, but how it is with

YOUR HOUSEHOLD.

There was a time when you were wrapped up in yourself. The question was, "My health," "My well-being," "Where shall I go?" "What shall I do?" "What will happen to me?" That is changed now, and your life is wrapped up in the life of others. Your soul is more vulnerable than it used to be. God has set you in a family, and there are influences all around about you, circling and widening and widening out. It may have been many years ago, but not far enough back to make you forget when you took the oath of conjugal fidelity. One in hope and one in affection, you have walked up the path of life to this hour. God has put many blessings in and while sometimes you walked under the clouds and through the woods, and have halted at the brink of a grave where your hearts both broke at once, you this day ought to send up one long, loud, exhilarant song to the God who chose your habitation and gave you such pleasant surroundings. Perhaps you have thought it was merely a chance walk, or a chance call, or a chance look, or a sudden impulse that conjoined your two destinies. Ah no! It was under the control of that God who, in the presence of Abraham's servant, brought Rachel with a pitcher to the well, showing her whose wife she should be.

Has that early love faded out, or is it a Christian benediction? Have the kindly offices, the offices of gentleness, become more rare now that the light has gone from the eye, and the hair is getting a little gray—snow on the raven's wing? As you get further off from that time when you took the vows amid the flowers, and the music, and the blithe hearts, and the congratulatory assembly, and you come on to the time when that tender link will be broken against the marble slab, and between you shall open the rift of a grave—as you go further on in that journey, are you less careful for each other's welfare and less patient with each other's foibles? Has the caress become silly because so long the honeymoon has passed? Will there be a mound after awhile growing a harvest of nettles and nightshade, snake-infested, devil-haunted?

Oh, your larger house, your brighter associations, your greater prosperities, my brother, my sister, cannot atone for the lack of that kindness which characterized you when you started life together! Then the tallow candle flickering on the homely stand was brighter to you than the light of a chandelier in an emperor's palace, and the evening meal to which you came wearily from work—and there was one at the other end of the table—had more attraction for you than the banquet where attendants lift the lids from smoking viands to the sound of well-drilled orchestra. Oh, is it well with thy husband? Is it well with thy wife?

But my subject takes a step further. You know that almost every house has the

BLESSING OF CHILDHOOD.

Indeed, this blessing seems, to be given in great profusion in proportion as other blessings are denied. There are thousands of homes in which the only light is in the child's eye and the only music in the children's footsteps. You almost pity the poor man because he has so many little ones in his cot. Talk to him about its being a pity! Ask him which one of the flaxen-headed pets he would spare from the household. Why, that one has its mother's eyes, and another its father's mouth, and another the different points of all the family, and all of these peculiarities commending them to the parental heart. Not one could be spared.

On a western steamboat a philanthropic and generous gentleman walking the deck saw a man and his two children, and they were all covered with the marks of great poverty and destitution. This kind-hearted gentleman said to this man, "I think I will adopt one of your children; I will take one of your children, and I will make him heir to my estate. It seems to me you are very poor, and I would like to have one of these little ones." "What," said the man, "you want to cut off my right arm, you want to pluck out my heart from the roots! If there is any man in all the world poorer than I am, God pity him; but you can't have one of these children; I can't spare them." In all the largest flocks of children, where is there one lamb that we could afford to spare?

Ah! the welfare of your children has become a study with some of you—what to teach them, what example to set before them, how to curb that impetuosity, how to fire that sluggishness, how to control that evil proclivity, how to meet the duties you owe your little ones. "Is it well with the child?" Sometimes

YOU GET DISCOURAGED.

Just at the time when you think you have extirpated the last evil proclivity, the old habit breaks out in a new place, and though you say it to no one else, you say to yourself: "I wonder if anybody else has such trouble with their children as I have!" O Christian brother, every Christian man has a right to take a hopeful view of his children! Evil in childhood is not the precursor of coming ruin. When you were their age you were no better, and if common report in regard to some of you is true, you were worse! Ah! my friends, God's blessings hover over the heads of the righteous, and though children may go wrong, and their behavior may be ruinous, the God of Jacob will bless the lads. Many a Christian parent, after long years of praying, and watching, and struggling, and despairing in regard to a child has left him a vagabond, but by the rivers of heaven and under the arches of eternal salvation has after awhile celebrated the return of that prodigal and held high jubilee in celestial palaces because that, after all, after all, after all, it was well with the child.

O Christian parent, whatever you do for your children, or neglect to do, do not neglect their eternal salvation! Do not make the mistake of that family who, when their house was on fire, secured all the household goods, but forgot to ask, until too late, "are the children safe?" Oh, what terrific neglect! When the elements shall melt with fervent heat and the world shall burn, will your children be safe? will your children be safe?

But my subject takes a step further, and I am permitted, in carrying out the idea that hovers above the text and is suggested by the text, to ask you this morning, how it is with that have come to spend their last days in your house, O man! O woman! Do you give them a room on the fourth story? Do you make them eat at the second table? Have you as much patience with the weaknesses of their second childhood as they had patience with the follies of your first? Ah! smooth the steps for those aged feet, for they will soon stop on the way. Do you not notice that the step is getting shorter and shorter? Plough not the old face with any more wrinkles. Trouble and care have marked it full enough. Put not on those stooping shoulders any more burdens. They stoop now by carrying the burdens of your early waywardness. Shakespeare put it with tremendous power when he said:

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child."

And the inspired writer puts it with still more force when he says: "The eye that mocketh at its father and refuseth to obey its mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." How is it with the old folks? How have they got through the summer? Is there greater pallor on the cheek? Is the cough more persistent? Are they still alive? Is it well with thy father? Is it well with thy mother?

But my subject goes one step further, and makes inquiry as to

YOUR SPIRITUAL WELFARE.

A man may be sound in body, and he may have luxuriant investments, and have high social position, and yet instead of being well with them there may be everlasting diseases wasting his soul, and awfully and overwhelmingly it may be ill with him. All those estates will go out of your hands, all these friends will vanish from your earthly association; but God has planted in you a light which will burn on after the last ember of a consuming world is trampled out and extinguished.

"There is a life that always lives,
There is a death that never dies."

Considering the fact that you are so invested, and that eternity presses on toward you, and that soon your naked soul will step out and up into the presence of the eternal God in judgment, ought not the question of my text to resound through the deepest depths of your immortal nature while I cry out: "Is it

WELL WITH THY SOUL?"

You know all about the Christly sacrifice, and you know the hope that was kindled for our world from the wood of the cross, and you know that the tears of Christ poured until they made a fountain, and that from that fountain there runs forth a river so deep that all the armies of earth may wash in it, and on its banks all the empires of heaven may sing. Are your sins pardoned? Are your sorrows comforted? Is your soul saved? Is it well with thee for time? Will it be well with thee for eternity?

Now, there may be in the audience many who are disposed to complain. Hardships have come upon them, and losses, and perhaps especial griefs have come upon them this summer, and they are more disposed to answer the question of the text in the negative. So I draw a contrast:

BROOKLYN—CHARLESTON!

Oh, when you think of the sorrows of that city, cannot you thank God for your homes? Cannot you thank God for your privileges? Cannot you thank God for the quiet of this holy Sabbath? while in that city millionaire and beggar crouch together in the open parks. I have been accustomed to create gratitude in my soul by going down among those who have not a comfortable home and who have not comfortable surroundings; and to-day compare your condition with the condition of the fifty thousand affrighted people in that sad city. What a time of trouble our world has had ever since by the hand of God it was bowled into space! It is

AN EPILEPTIC WORLD.

Convulsion after convulsion. Frosts striking it with sledge-hammer of iceberg. Fires melting it with furnaces seven hundred times heated. Meteors darting by grazing it on one side, meteors darting by grazing it on the other side, and none of them slowing up for safety. Whole flotillas, whole navies, whole argosies of worlds rushing past. It is an amazement to me that long ago it was not run down and destroyed. Why, our world is like a fishing smack off the coast of Newfoundland while the Etruria and the Umbria and the Great Eastern whirl by.

And then our world by sin has been smitten with internal disorders, and the machinery of the world has all been damaged so that sometimes the furnaces burst, and the walking-beams of the mountains are broken, and islands ship a sea, and this great hulk of a world is jarred with accidents that threaten its immediate demolition. Thirty-six earthquakes last year in the United States and Canada; but seven thousand earthquakes reported in the catalogues of the British Association in the two centuries.

Long ago as Trajan goes to Antioch on a visit, amid the splendors of a public reception an earthquake meets him and it takes his life. At one o'clock on November 1st, 1755, Lisbon, fair and beautiful—six minutes after 60,000 perished, so that Voltaire, writing in regard to it, says for that region it was the Day of Judgment, nothing wanting but the trumpet. That vibration shaking the two hemispheres. And so in all the times, but especially

IN OUR OWN CENTURY.

In 1812 Caracas caught in the grip of an earthquake. In 1822 in Chili 100,000 square miles by volcanic forces upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation. In 1854 Japan felt the geological agony. Naples shaken in 1857, and Mexico in 1858. Medosa, the capital of the Argentine Republic, in 1861. Manila terrorized in 1863. The Hawaiian Islands by such forces upheaved and let down in 1871. Nevada shaken in 1871. Antioch in 1872. California in 1872. San Salvador in 1873. In 1883 Ischia, the beautiful Italian watering-place, the home of historical reminiscences and of all beautiful surroundings. Yonder Naples, the Paradise of art, the city, the island let down into the trough of the sea disappearing. A few months after Java, the most fertile island in all the earth, mountain after mountain going down, and city after city, and that island which yields the healthiest beverage in all the world became the scene of the greatest disaster of the century. One hundred and twenty thousand people dying, dead. At the mouth of the Ganges, three islands ten years ago—convulsion in the land, and cyclone in the air, and of 340,000 population, 215,000 perished.

"Oh," we said, "we live in a land that will never be disturbed; such volcanic forces cannot strike us, and even if sometimes on the Pacific coast there are disturbances, not on the Atlantic coast." Then God comes in this last week and He

SHAKES THIS WHOLE CONTINENT.

It is felt in San Francisco, and it is felt in New York. God is shaking terribly the nations, and it seems to me there is a lesson which this pulpit and every pulpit ought to interpret for the people. God is teaching America, and He is teaching all nations, that this world is a poor foundation on which to build. Oh, we thought if we had everything insured in the fire insurance companies all would be well. Where are the insurance companies that could help that Charleston calamity? God is thundering from the heavens, "Build on the rock, the Rock of Ages." Build on the eternal God. That is the foundation that never can be shaken. Do not build on this earth. Set not your affections on things on earth.

And yet the painter worships his picture, and the architect worships his building, and the merchant worships his enterprise, and we cling to this world; but it is a very poor portion. Isaac Newton's dog "Spot" destroys in a little while the manuscript that it took him many years to produce. A worm in the hulk of the vessel sinks the ship that was the pride of its builder. A child's hand effaces a painting that was to be immortal. A piece of costly sculpture, the work of genius, is dropped, and the grandest arches and the stanchest pyramids and the mightiest cities must come down. The time will come when Charleston, and Chicago, and New Orleans, and Brooklyn, and New York, and Boston, and London, and Paris, and Vienna, and St. Petersburg, and Peking, and Canton will be caught in what St. John, in the Book of Revelation, calls "a great earthquake." The world is a poor foundation on which to build. If the American people do not learn that lesson, it will be bad for them.

But oh, it seems to me there comes to those suffering people. There is not a city on this continent, it seems to me, that has so many reasons for calling for the sympathy of the country to-day. Just think of it! Have you counted up the scourges that have come upon this city? First, the scourge of war, then in a few years the scourge of fire, then in a few years the scourge of cholera, last year the scourge of cyclone, and now the scourge of earthquake. And the people do not want "God-bless-yous." All our prayers will not amount to anything unless accompanied by positive beneficence. The pleading hands come up from the débris of that fallen city, saying, "We are hungry, give us bread; we are homeless, give us shelter; we are sick, give us cordials." Palsied will be the ear that will not hear, and palsied will be the hand that will not help.

FOR THE HOMELESS.

I stand here to-day to plead for the hundreds of households that have been despoiled of their living. I plead in behalf of homes there, and some of us have enjoyed their hospitalities. I plead in behalf of children whose fathers have perished under the fallen walls. I plead in behalf of women whose hour of anguish has come, and there is no pillow and there is no roof. Aye I plead in behalf of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it to these, ye did it to me."

I know you will not turn your back upon this suffering. Let the officers of the church, as they go through these aisles, go slowly, remembering the amount they gather will decide whether some groaning men and women shall live or die. By so much as we expect mercy from the Lord in the last day, let us have mercy for others. Oh, Thou self-denying One of Gethsemane, drop upon us Thy Spirit!

[The collection taken up at the service amounted to over six hundred dollars, and more money is being sent to the treasurer.]

A Massacre of Christians in China was Reported last week. A despatch from Shanghai, dated September 1st, states that advices were received from Ching Foo-Foo, the chief city of the province of Sechuen, of an attack by the natives of the eastern part of that province and those of Northern Cochin China on the Christians. The natives, it said, "are massacring them and destroying their property. This active persecution is attributed to the imprudence of the English and American missionaries. In Cochin China alone fifty Christians have been killed, their houses burned and their farms destroyed. In Sechuen a general massacre of Christians is reported to be in progress, and they are killed wherever found. It is said that whole villages occupied by Christians have been destroyed, and that all lands occupied by the professors of that faith are being devastated. The foreign consuls barely escaped from Sechuen with their lives. No efforts had been made up to the latest reports to quell the disorder, and so far as is now known it continuous unsuppressed." The report is evidently from a French source, and must be accepted with caution. Further details are anxiously awaited.

EARTHQUAKES IN DIVERS PLACES.

THE visitation of Tuesday night, August 31st, will be a memorable event in American history. It is also a remarkable one in the record of seismic disturbances in general. Never before has there been in any land an earthquake so registered and described simultaneously by so large a number of independent observers, scattered over so wide an area. As the vibration passed over the vast region from Mobile, Ala., in the South, to Omaha, in the West, and New York, in the East, a telegraph operator in every city, without opportunity for consultation or comparison, sent off a dispatch recording the exact time and character of the shock. We have thus a record more reliable and more extensive of this earth-wave than has ever been secured before. The facts thus gathered will doubtless be of great value to science, and will afford material by which to test the theories that have been propounded as explanations of these mysterious phenomena.

In whatever way the earthquake may be explained by scientists eager to exclude the great First Cause from the control of His universe, it is impossible for the Christian student to read the columns of telegrams which the daily journals printed on Wednesday morning without being reminded of the words of our Lord on the Mount of Olives. His disciples had listened with surprise to His discourse, and desiring more detailed information about the terrible events which He declared would attend the close of the Age, they went to Him privately, and asked Him what would be the sign of His Coming and the end of the world. Among the events that He specified, as precursors of the final consummation, were "earthquakes in divers places." These, He said, are

"THE BEGINNING OF SORROWS"

(Matt. 24: 8). Being placed thus among the earliest intimations of the approach of that momentous time, we are justified in regarding such a phenomenon as that of August 31st as one of profound significance. While we admit the possibility of this earthquake being, like those that have gone before it, merely a natural phenomenon not belonging to those specified by our Lord as the distinctive signs, yet there are circumstances connected with it which suggest the contrary opinion, and should startle every one, who has ears to hear, into an attitude of watchful expectation. Not only may it be the sign indicated by our Lord—a message to those who look for His appearing—but it probably is such a sign, as intelligent Christians must see if they read the description in prophecy of the state of the world and the Church in the last days, and compare that with the state of the world and the Church to-day. This sign does not come alone; it comes in combination with other signs of our times, each one of which has its own special significance. Those other signs—ecclesiastical, social, and political—have been frequently pointed out in these columns during the past few months, and to them is now to be added, as if to render the identity of the period on which we are entering unmistakable, this special sign clearly and explicitly predicted.

It is worthy of notice that not only does this earthquake exactly fulfil by itself the prediction, "Earthquakes in divers places," with the characteristic of the fulfilment of the prophecies of the Bible, but it does not come alone. The convulsion in New Zealand on June 10th was still thrilling the minds of the world when, on August 28th, an earthquake was reported in Greece, in which six towns were entirely destroyed, six hundred persons were killed, and one thousand seriously injured. Only three days later our own continent trembles under a shock unprecedented in modern times in the extent of the area affected. Men who attach no importance to the words of our Lord may be excused for regarding the combination as merely a coincidence, but to those who know that every word that fell from those Divine lips is of importance to the world, these events are pregnant with solemn meaning. "The end is not immediately," said our Lord (Luke 21: 9, Rev. Ver.). A brief space at least remains, during which Antichrist will be developed and the terrible events of the last days will follow each other in rapid succession. How ought that interval to be used by the disciples of a Master whose coming is near at hand!

THE TREMBLING CONTINENT.

THE following extracts from telegraphic dispatches received in New York and published in the daily journals of September 1st will show how widespread was the earthquake of the previous night, and how general was the terror it produced.

CHARLESTON, S. C.,

was the city which suffered most severely. "The earthquake," says a dispatch to the Sun, "has caused a destruction of about one half of the city and the loss of nearly one hundred human lives. The first shock was felt approaching at 9.50 last evening, and, before people could realize what the trouble was, they were being thrown around and their houses were falling down upon them. Every one ran screaming into the streets, and in a few seconds the city was wild with human beings, perfectly crazed with fright.

"The first shock, which was by far the most severe, was followed immediately by another, which increased the terror of the people. On all sides could be heard exclamations such as 'My God! save us!' 'God have mercy upon us sinners!' and men and women could be seen kneeling everywhere in groups, offering up prayers. The shocks continued at intervals, each succeeding one being less severe, until up to 10 A.M. on Wednesday there had been ten distinct shocks. To add to the terror of the situation, fires broke out in five different places soon after the first shock, and the city was soon illuminated with flames, thus leading all to believe that what was left by the earthquake would be devoured by fire. However, the Fire Department was so well divided and handled that the fires were gotten under control by day light. From fifteen to twenty residences and stores were consumed.

"The night was hideous with the groans of the dying, the screams of the wounded, and the prayers of the uninjured. The city is wrecked, the streets are encumbered with masses of fallen bricks and tangled telegraph and telephone wires, and up to an early hour it was almost impossible to pass from one part of the city to another. Broad streets presented a spectacle of the utmost horror. Even women, armed with hatchets, fought valiantly to rescue the imprisoned unfortunates. Meeting Street, from Broad to Hasel, is a wreck, and is lined with homeless persons. St. Michael's Church is shattered and the steeple will come down, likewise the steeple of St. Philip's. The porticos of Hibernian Hall and the main station-house are demolished. Hardly a house in the city escaped injury, and many are so shaken and cracked that a hard blow would bring them to the ground. Fissures in the earth are noticed from which fine sand, apparently from a great depth, exudes a sulphurous smell, and is very noticeable. The city is wrapped in gloom, and business is entirely suspended. Hardly one hundred houses are occupied, the people generally remaining in the streets in tents and under improvised shelters." The editor of the Charleston News and Courier says: "While engaged in his usual duties in the second-story room of the News and Courier office at the time of the first shock, the writer's attention was vaguely attracted by a sound which seemed to come from the office below, and which was supposed for a moment to be caused by the rapid rolling of a heavy body, as an iron safe or a heavily-laden truck, over the floor. Accompanying the sound there was a perceptible tremor of the building, not more marked, however, than would be caused by the passage of a street car or dray along the street.

"Then the long roll deepened and spread into an awful roar that seemed to pervade at once the troubled earth and the still air above and around. The tremor was now a rude, rapid quiver that agitated the whole lofty, strong-walled building as though it were being shaken by the hand of an immeasurable power. The floors were heaving under foot, the surrounding walls and partitions visibly swayed to and fro, the crash of falling masses of stone and brick and mortar was heard overhead, and without the terrible roar filled the ears and seemed to fill the mind and heart, dazing perception, bewildering thought, and for a few panting breaths, or while you held your breath in dreadful anticipation of immediate and cruel death you felt that life was already past, and waited for the end, as the victim with his head on the block awaits the fall of the uplifted axe.

"It is not given to many men to look in the face of the destroyer and yet live, but it is little to say that the group of strong men who shared the experience above faintly described will carry with them the recollection of that supreme moment to their dying day. The uproar slowly died away in seeming distance. The earth was still—and oh, the blessed relief of that stillness!—but how rudely the silence was broken! As we dashed down the stairway and out into the street, already on every side arose the shrieks, the cries of pain and fear, the prayers and wailings of terrified women and children, commingled with the shouts of men.

"Arrived at his home, the writer found the same scenes of distraction and wreck which marked nearly every other home in the city. All the houses in the neighborhood had suffered seriously, and streets, yards, and gardens were filled with the fallen chimneys and fragments of walls, while the walls that were left standing were rent asunder in many cases from top to bottom, and were badly shattered in every instance. Women and children, roused from sleep or interrupted in their evening pursuits by the sound of the ruin being effected above and around them, rushed out into the streets and huddled together awaiting the end, whatever it might be. Invalids were brought out on mattresses and deposited on the roadway. No thought was given to treasures left behind in the effort to save the peculiar treasure of life itself, suddenly become so precious in the eyes of all, the invalid woman and the robust man alike.

"Until long after midnight the streets were filled with fugitives in sight of their homes. Through the long hours that followed few were the eyes even of childhood that were closed in sleep. Charleston was full of those who watched for the morning, and never in any city in any land did the first gray shades that mark the approach of dawn appear so beautiful and so welcome to eyes as they appeared to the thousands of people who hailed them this morning from the midst of the countless wrecked homes in our thrice-scourged, but still patient, still brave, still hopeful, still beautiful city by the sea."

IN WASHINGTON.

The earthquake lasted for fifteen or twenty seconds, and was distinctly perceived all over the city. In the neighborhood of the Treasury Building the shock was sufficiently severe to rattle windows and set rocking-chairs in motion. The desks in the Associated Press office in the Corcoran Building began to vibrate in a peculiar but unmistakable fashion that suggested an earthquake. A few minutes later the janitor reported that the upper stories of the building were rocking back and forth, and the night manager of the Western Union Telegraph office made a similar announcement, with the additional information that the clock on the western wall of the room had stopped. Telephone messages from a gentleman connected with the Associated Press office, who lives on Massachusetts Avenue, and from other points in the city, reported that the ornaments on mantelpieces were rattling. The telegraph operators in Atlanta a few minutes before this had notified the Washington operators that the "shake" was coming, and to look out for it; but no attention was paid to the warning, as it was regarded as a joke.

Two shocks occurred, the second shock of longer duration and more severe than the first, and a few seconds later. It was felt in all parts of the city, and created considerable consternation. Several meetings in progress in various parts of the city were broken up by the frightened members, thinking the buildings were falling, rushing into the street. At Albaugh's Opera House the large audience became frightened by the shaking of the building, and a stampede ensued. The occupants of the galleries, mainly gentlemen, jumped to their feet as soon as the shaking began, and rushed pell-mell down the stairs, falling over one another in their efforts to escape from the building, and stopped for nothing until they reached the street. People on the street did not feel the shock, and the first knowledge they had of the occurrence was obtained from the sight of the frightened inmates of houses rushing from them into the streets.

IN RICHMOND, VA.,

the terror reached its height in the Penitentiary, where the shock of earthquake was very violent, the building being on a high hill. The convicts were terror-stricken, and a fearful scene followed. They cursed and swore. The females especially screamed in such agonizing manner that their cries penetrated into the city. Finally two convicts in their mad struggle succeeded in forcing the prison doors, and rushed wildly about, it is supposed, to liberate their fellow-prisoners. Only the night force of guards were on hand at the time, and they were not able to cope with the eight hundred maddened convicts who tore at their cell doors. Many of the maniacs for the moment were frantic from fear. They cried and implored some one to open the doors. The ringing of the fire-bells added to their terror, for they imagined that the place was on fire. The entire police force was hastily summoned to the grim place, and finally the volunteer military were ordered to proceed at once to the penitentiary fully armed and equipped for action. The convicts were quieted, but the whole city was aroused, and there was a scene of general excitement such as the city never saw, even in the war.

IN COLUMBIA, S. C., the earthquake was felt at 9.45 P.M. The whole city swayed and shook like an aspen leaf. Men, women, and children rushed from hotels and houses into the streets in wild alarm, some in night robes. Walls of buildings were cracked, crockery rattled, and strong men found it difficult to stand on their feet, and walked as if on sea legs. Nothing so alarming has ever occurred here. The streets are filled with frightened people. An immense mass-meeting was being held in the Court House, and the massive brick swayed from cellar to dome. The audience rushed for the exits and the speakers deserted the hall.

IN RALEIGH, N. C., the shocks continued nearly six minutes. Buildings rocked, walls cracked, floors broke loose from their supports, chimneys fell, lamps were overturned. The shocks lasted over five minutes. The motion of the earth was very decided. Streets rapidly filled with people. Screams of frightened persons could be heard. Negroes were in great fear. Such decided shocks were never before felt here. Reports show that the shocks were felt all over the State. At Wilmington they were very severe, and came near wrecking several buildings. It is safe to say that no such excitement was ever known here as this earthquake has caused. The shocks rang the church-bells. They also rang door-bells in houses.

IN SAVANNAH, GA.,

people in every part of the city were thoroughly terrified, and rushed from their houses into the streets, and sought the open squares and other places where they would be out of danger of falling buildings. Negroes were particularly demonstrative, and ran about the streets wringing their hands and giving vent to exclamations of terror. Chimneys fell, and many buildings suffered other damage of similar nature. Clocks were stopped and lamps and ornaments shaken from tables and mantels. No buildings were demolished, so far as is known, and no lives were lost or injury to person reported. Despatches from the surrounding towns report similar experience.

THE UNLIMITED INVITATION.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for the Christian Herald.)

Marching on the Wrong Side—A Figure from the Caravan—Passing the Word Along the Line—The Wife as a Preacher—The Elect and Non-Elect—A Nomination for Every Sinner—What God will not Do.

LET him who heareth say come. Do you get the idea there? Wherever you hear the Gospel as it comes into your ear and passes out of your mouth, you say to the next man to you: "Come, come." I admire that man who, confessing that he is wrong, says: "I wish I was right." I like a man that comes out and says, "I am a sinner," but says, "Say, boys, let us serve God the balance of our days, and do right and go to heaven." I like that sort of a sinner. I have seen them rise up in a great congregation and say: "I have fought and all my life, but, boys, join with me, and off with our cartridge-boxes and lay down that old musket, and never fire that old gun again on the devil's side. I march with my hands thrown up to-night, and say: "O God, I surrender to Christ!"

Let him that heareth say come. If you hear the call of God not only come yourself, but turn to every man in hearing and say come. We get this figure from the caravan crossing the desert. The water is out and the whole caravan is perishing. Now they send one man on ahead—in five minutes another—then another—and another. They keep just within halloing distance of one another. When the head man finds an oasis, he cries back: "Water! come!" and the next man catches up the words, and passes them on, and down the line, until it is shouted into the ears of the caravan, and they all, with accelerated speed, make their way to the oasis. God shouted it from His throne above, the angels caught it up and brought it to the earth, and the preachers passed it to the Church, and the Church to the world, and, brethren, let us pass it down the line, until we shout the blessed Word right at the gates of hell.

PASS IT DOWN,

the water of life. Come, ye famishing ones, drink and never be dry again. Let him who heareth say, "Come." If you have ever heard the Gospel, go speak it into some one else's ear. A father has just heard the Gospel, and he says: "My son, my daughter, let us be religious." He is talking to his children now. The wife says, "Husband, I have heard the blessed Gospel. Let us serve God." She is preaching it to her husband now, and, thank God, we may all turn to be preachers as we go away from here to-night. And we can preach it to every man we meet. Do not tire of preaching God's Word. He says eat and satisfy your hunger. He stands with the water of life and says drink and quench your thirst forever. And the hungriest man gets it first, and the thirstiest man is the one He comes to first. Lord, give us such hungering and thirsting to-night that the angels will rush down and give the bread and water of life to every hungry, famishing soul.

Whosoever will. That is the word, brother, and I am glad in my heart of hearts that every pulpit in this earth is coming right up to the grand old "Whosoever will" of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. If I live until this head is gray, I expect to see the day when every minister of Jesus stands flat-footed on this God-blessed word, and begs the world to come to Christ. He has taught me, glory to His name, that the Gospel is intended to save all men everywhere and bring them to the cross of Christ.

You say, "Don't you believe in the elect?" Yes, I do; but I know who the elect are, too. The elect are "whosoever will," and the un-elect are

"WHOSOEVER WON'T."

That is the doctrine from bottom to top. If you will, God will; if you won't, God won't, and that is the whole question. The closest definition of elect I ever heard was that given by an old colored man. His master one day went out to hear a hard-shell sermon on election. He came back and said to the old colored man, "Uncle, your preacher bamfooled me to-day. He preached on election. I didn't understand him. Uncle, do you know—tell me what election is?" The old negro could not explain the theory of it, but said he could tell this much: "No man is elected 'ceptin' he's a candidate." There is the whole doctrine. And I don't have to be nominated. I can run independent and be elected. Thank God for such a glorious race. These Democrats and Republicans are moving heaven and earth to get the nominations; but, brethren, Jesus Christ on Calvary in the universe. Now be a candidate, old fellow, and you will be elected by a large majority, and take your seat in paradise.

NOMINATED EVERY SINNER

Thank God for a Gospel that saves the whole race of man. But, says the agonizing man at the altar, "I am one of the reprobates. I am a reprobate unto eternal death."

The preacher hardly knew what to say. Finally, he said: "My brother, you doubt whether Christ died for you. Your name is James B. Green."

"Yes," said he.

"If I could reach and take down the Lamb's Book of life and show James B. Green written there, would you believe it?"

"No, sir; there are other people in this world by that same name."

"Well, brother, if I could show you James B. Green, Screven County, would you believe it was you?"

"There may have been others by that name before I was born in this county."

"Well, if you could see it James B. Green, Screven County, 1886, would you believe it was you?"

"No; there may be somebody in this county now with my name."

Then said the preacher, "God saves all that trouble." He said, "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely," and the poor fellow cried out: "Glory to God; that means me! No doubt about that!"

Thank God for such

as that. Listen, brethren; I am preaching on God's last message to man. You can count on it; you can bank on it; you can die on these last words, and you will die safe. Listen! "Whosoever will"—it doesn't say, "whosoever feels," or "whosoever mourns," or "whosoever cries," or "whosoever shouts," or "whosoever has a happy experience," but it says, "whosoever will"—will! There is the supreme power, the will. I am trinity in unity—the will, the intellect, the sensibility. God comes up through my intellect, perception, conception, memory, judgment, reason, magnetism—through every avenue of my mind. Not a door to open or to shut. When He runs up through sensibility and intellect He reaches the door of the human will, and stands and knocks, and says: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock, and if any man open unto Me I will come in and save that man, and he shall sup with Me."

Oh, my dear brethren, this very night God knocks at the door! Open to Him, and bid the heavenly guest to enter. God will do anything except break down the human will, and God Himself has never done that. It is your will that opens heaven to your soul or shuts you up in hell forever.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Most Remarkable Statement, which Deserves the attention of every patriotic citizen, was issued by the Treasury on September 1st. It appears from the figures it contains that the public debt is now reduced to $1,378,176,580, which is less than half of the amount at which it stood twenty-one years ago. On August 31st, 1865, the total liability, less cash available for its reduction, was $2,756,431,571. The reduction, astonishing as it is in bulk, is still more surprising when its proportion to the population then and now is taken into account. In 1865 the debt represented a burden of $78 for every person in the country; now each individual's share is $24. The United States have now a smaller debt than any of the great countries of the world, Germany alone excepted. Austria comes next with $1,900,000,000. Italy's debt is $2,200,000,000, Great Britain's debt is $3,700,000,000, more than twice as large as ours, and France owes $6,000,000,000, or more than four times the debt of the United States. The strain of so large a reduction in so short a time has been a severe one, but it has been borne with little complaint. Taking into account the present condition of the country and the low rate of interest being paid on the debt, the doubt is suggested whether it is wise to continue the process of reduction at so rapid a rate. The people are entitled to some relief. Even those who can afford to pay the taxes could do better with their money than use it to pay off a debt that costs only three per cent of interest.

The Campaign in Maine Continues to Attract the attention of politicians. This is due not to its intrinsic importance, but to the active part Mr. Blaine is taking in it. His speeches are regarded as manifestoes having relation rather to national than to State politics. He has given marked prominence to the tariff question, which, in his opinion, is the great national issue. An impression prevails that Mr. Blaine is mistaken. Recent events indicate that the tariff question divides the sections of the country rather than the parties. In the last session of Congress it was seen that neither party was solid on the subject. Some Republicans were seen voting for tariff reduction, and some Democrats against it. At present the younger voters, who were not engaged in the great struggles of the past, and therefore are not so enthusiastically loyal to party as their fathers are, look rather to the character of individual candidates than to their party affiliations. Mr. Blaine's attack on Neal Dow on September 2d, at Dover, has caused much amusement. Dow worked earnestly for Blaine in 1884, and made some effective speeches in praise of the Republican Party. He is now fighting vigorously against the Republicans, and Mr. Blaine made some telling points by comparing the speeches Dow has made on the two occasions. With withering scorn Mr. Blaine has attempted to prove that Neal Dow is not only an inconsistent, but a most untruthful man. About this fact the country is not greatly concerned; it made up its mind about Neal Dow long ago; but that Mr. Blaine should undertake to expose him is a surprise.

The New Minister to Mexico to Succeed General Henry R. Jackson, who has resigned, is Judge Thomas C. Manning, of Louisiana. There is a somewhat bitter division of the Democratic Party in Louisiana, so that Judge Manning's appointment is not unanimously approved there. He belongs to the section not now in possession of the State government. Apart from politics, however, the new minister appears to be generally popular. On one occasion he was placed on the Supreme bench at the demand of the people. As a lawyer and a judge he enjoys the confidence of his fellow-citizens, and as a politician he is supported by many men of character and influence. Judge Manning is fifty years of age. He is one of the trustees of the Peabody Educational Fund.

The Immigration Returns for the Past Fiscal year show a continuance of the falling off previously noticed. The total number of immigrants landed during the year at the six ports which receive ninety-five per cent of the arrivals, was 328,917. In the previous year the total number was 349,030. Three years ago the number for the year was 788,992. The largest decrease is in the contingent from Germany, which is less by a third than last year. The immigration from Bohemia, Hungary, and Poland is about the same as last year; that from Italy has increased from 13,587 to 21,503.

The Earthquake which Shook the Whole continent on Tuesday, August 31st, appears to have caused no serious injury outside of Charleston, S. C., though it produced terror and consternation over a wide area. Telegrams describing the shock and its effects in various cities were received in New York, and some of them, which are fair specimens of the whole, are published on page 566 of this issue. The centre of the disturbance appears to have been in South Carolina, and though it was felt distinctly in Florida and as far west as Omaha, its direct course was in a north-easterly direction. In Chicago there were several shocks, lasting altogether not more than half a minute. The houses quivered, windows rattled, doors swung to and fro, and the pictures on the walls were moved. In New York persons in the upper stories of high buildings were greatly alarmed. The rocking motion was very perceptible, and imparted an unpleasant suggestion of falling to the earth. In the tenement districts families ran down-stairs and into the streets, some of them in their night-clothes. No damage was done in any part of the city. A remarkable fact, which scientists are unable to explain, is the sudden activity of hot springs immediately before the earthquake; it was noticed here, as in the recent calamity in New Zealand. The Excelsior Geyser in Yellowstone Park, the most powerful geyser in the world, suddenly broke out at 3 P.M. on Aug. 27, and continued to play for over twenty-four hours. The Excelsior had been quiet for over four years.

Help for Charleston is Called for, and the Response is coming promptly from all quarters. How sorely it is needed the telegrams from the stricken city clearly show. Thousands of the people are homeless, their houses lying in ruins. Others, whose habitations still stand, are afraid to enter them. They fear that the tottering walls may fall upon them should a strong wind arise or another shock agitate the foundations. The public squares and parks are crowded with about thirty thousand persons, some of whom sleep in tents, and others, not so fortunate, under the open sky, where the mosquitoes attack them. Ninety tents have been sent from Washington, but they go a very small way toward satisfying the demand. Food also is needed, for business is suspended, and no money can be earned. At the close of last week there was no indication of restored confidence. Indeed, there was little ground for it. Slight shocks of earthquake were still visiting the city, and though little more damage was done, it was impossible to feel secure. On Friday night a distinct shock was felt, which brought down one large house and killed one person who was passing. On Saturday night there were two more shocks, which scared every one who had intended sleeping in-doors. It is impossible to learn the exact loss of life. Thirty-three persons are known to have been killed, and over one hundred were wounded; but how many bodies are under the ruins no one knows. The loss of property must be enormous. Reporters who have ventured through the streets assert that four buildings out of every five are either overthrown or must come down. The taxable property of the city aggregates twenty-two millions. Besides this there are churches, schools, and philanthropic institutions which are not assessed, and those are worth fully ten millions. Then there are the ruined stocks in the stores and personal property buried under the ruins. Collections were taken up in the churches of New York on Sunday for the fund opened by Mayor Grace, and money is coming in rapidly. Every one feels the deepest commiseration for the citizens of the desolated city.

The Week in the British Parliament was consumed in futile debates on Irish affairs. It is evident that the bitter hostility between the parties increases. Personal abuse, which is unusual in the House of Commons, was uttered freely on all sides. The Parnellites were taunted with being supported by "American gold," which they did not deny, but contended that it was no disgrace to receive gifts from members of their own race in America. They were also stigmatized as traitors, and other opprobrious epithets were applied to them. The spirit displayed did not tend to pacification, and as the Irish contingent has the power to materially retard legislation and embarrass the Government, there is a probability of their using it. Mr. Parnell has obtained leave to introduce a bill which, if it is passed, may do much to alleviate the present distress in Ireland. Its object is to prevent eviction when the tenant deposits a certain proportion of the rent due. It is expected that if his proposals are moderate they will receive the support of both sections of the Liberal party. If so they will be carried in the House whether the Conservatives agree with them or not. It will be merely a provisional measure to check the wholesale evictions now in progress, which threaten to provoke disturbances but little short of civil war.

Prince Alexander of Bulgaria Returned to his capital on September 2d. He was received with the utmost enthusiasm. In compliance with the advice of Prince Bismarck and other foreign statesmen, the Prince offered terms of pardon to the regiments which had taken part in the conspiracy to drive him from the throne. Throughout the two countries recently united the desire that the Prince should continue to reign appears to be general, but Russia is hostile to him, and in the face of Russian hostility it may be doubted whether his position is tenable. Alexander is perfectly aware of the fact. He has addressed an abject letter to the Czar, in which he declared himself ready to give decided proofs of his unalterable devotion to the Czar, and intimated that he would abdicate if the Czar desired it. The Czar's reply was decidedly unfavorable. He said bluntly that he did not approve of the Prince's return, and that he reserved to himself the right to judge what Russia's interests required of him. Rumors are current that if Alexander has the courage to remain and Bulgaria is solidly in his favor an armed interference on the part of Russia will bring Austria into the field for the Prince's protection, and that England may also be expected to interfere in opposition to Russia. A cable despatch received on Saturday states that the Prince has decided to abdicate rather than be the cause of a war which might involve half Europe.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $14. They are from : Seaward, Me., $10 ; New Providence, N. J., $2 ; Janelew, W. Va., $1 ; a friend, N. J., $1. One of the ministers supplied from this fund, writing from Savannah, Ga., on August 31st, desires us to express here his gratitude to the friends who have contributed to the fund. He says that so limited in means are he and others of his brethren who are laboring for Christ among the colored people of the South that they find it impossible to obtain books to help them in expounding the Bible. They "have found THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," he says, "a library in itself, and of invaluable service to them." Their congregations have doubtless benefited, too, so that one copy alone has been the means of good to many persons.

A Correction Kindly Supplied to us by One of our subscribers is gladly made in this place of a paragraph which appeared here on August 12th. In that paragraph it was stated that a despatch had appeared in the New York Times describing a new sect which existed in Cincinnati, founded on the blasphemous pretensions of a lady to be Christ manifest in the flesh. Our correspondent's letter proves that the despatch was the work of an unprincipled person either ignorant of the facts or wilfully perverting them. The lady in question makes no such pretensions, and is not worshipped. In early life she became acquainted with Dr. and Mrs. Palmer, of New York, Dr. Inskip and others, and was led by them to believe in the possibility of leading a perfectly sinless life. She recently said to a visitor : "I have since pushed my way on beyond them all, guided by God alone. That is the complaint the church has to make against me. Inskip and McDonald were filled with the Holy Ghost ; I am filled with the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." It is probable that such an utterance, heard by some flippant reporter, led to the publication of the despatch which we quoted.

The Triennial Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church will assemble in Central Music Hall, Chicago, in October. The arrangements for the sessions are nearly completed and ten thousand dollars have been subscribed toward the expenses. The proceedings will be unusually important, and much anxiety as to its decisions is manifested both in this country and in Europe. The revision of the Prayer Book will, of course, be the most prominent question before the convention. It is rumored that the decisions of the last two conventions on this subject may be reversed by the delegates in October.

An Excellent Arrangement has been Made to benefit the sick poor in New York, which may serve as an example to other cities. In New York Bay is Bedlow's Island, a tiny spot in the river, on which the statue of Liberty is being erected. The Charity Organization Society recently applied to the War Department for permission to erect a tent there, and the department has consented. Invalids and convalescents, women and children especially, are taken there every day free, or at a small cost. The invigorating breezes from the sea blow across the island and give them new life. New milk but no other refreshment is provided for them. The cost of this enterprise is trifling in comparison with the boon conferred.

The Murderers of the Rev. Mr. Haddock, in Sioux City, have not yet been found, though large rewards have been offered for their apprehension. So far from having helped the liquor dealers, the murder has inspired their foes to more vigorous efforts. The Voice says that the words "Remember Haddock" are a watchword now throughout the State. It also reports an increase in the threats of outrage elsewhere. In Illinois the chairman of the Cook County Prohibition Committee has received an anonymous letter calling for his resignation from his post if he would have many more days to live. In New York, near where the new aqueduct is being built, saloons are being established to get the wages of the workmen, and a citizen who has been active of late to keep these rumshops away from his residence in that locality found a dynamite bomb secreted in his carriage-house the other day. In Pittsburg one of the active supporters of law and order received, a few days since, a letter threatening him with death if he did not cease his efforts. There are many similar cases not reported, all of which show that, like the silversmiths of Ephesus, the liquor-dealers are aware that their craft is in danger.

Weird Sightings at Sea are Reported by the United States revenue steamer Ewing, which left Fortress Monroe on Tuesday, August 31st, the day of the earthquake. All went well until between eleven and twelve o'clock that night. At that time a strong gale came out from the north, catching the Ewing in the vicinity of Smith's Point. All at once there was a strange and weird appearance about everything. Nothing looked natural. In the heavens the stars were shooting in all directions, and the breaking seas were charged with phosphorus to such a pronounced degree that no one on board recollected ever seeing such a display. The fixed stars seemed to move, and balls of fire first appeared on one bow, then on the other, which Pilot Madigan thought were vessels' lights, and kept an anxious watch as he progressed. It was only when they became general that the pilot found that they were due to atmospherical disturbance. In reading of such appearances the Christian is reminded of our Lord's solemn words of warning (Luke 21 : 25, 26).

A Remarkable Prognostication in Regard to the earthquake was made on the evening preceding by the Rev. E. Zara, Pastor of the Italian Church of Del Emanueto, Philadelphia. The Record of that city says that Mr. Zara is a native of Italy, has experienced a number of earthquakes both there and during his travels, and has made a study of the phenomenon and its surroundings. While he was speaking to several members of a neighboring family on Monday evening he remarked that he noticed certain indications of an approaching earthquake—principally in the state of the weather. While not predicting that an earthquake was at hand, he said he would not be surprised if one came, as the indications were similar to those attending earthquakes he had witnessed in Europe. It was probably thought at the time that the clergyman had slender ground for his prognostication. It turned out, however, that he was right. Warnings have been uttered for some time past that we are now approaching a period when an earthquake far more extensive and destructive than that of last week may be expected, and those warnings are based on the sure Word of God. No Christian should neglect them (Rev. 16 : 18, 19).

An Unusual Charge in a Farmer's Bill is mentioned by the Boston Beacon. It appears that a lady spending her vacation in rural Massachusetts arranged with a kind-hearted farmer to drive her around the country. The worthy man seldom undertook such services, but, prompted by kindness, made an exception in the case of this lady. He did not realize the caste distinctions so clearly recognized in Boston, and during the first drive attempted to place himself on a friendly footing with the lady by pointing out objects of interest, and expatiating on the state of the crops and the country generally. Such familiarity was resented by the dignified lady, who said, with chilling arrogance : "Sir, I engaged you to drive for me, not to talk to me." The farmer was amazed, but made no reply, and after that the drives were taken in silence. When the vacation weeks were over the lady sent for her bill. The farmer brought a curious document, remarkable for its peculiar caligraphy and ingenious spelling. The lady looked it over and asked, "What is this item?" pointing to a charge of five dollars. "That, madam," said the farmer, "is for sass. I don't often take it, but when I do, I charge." As the farmer did not live in one of our great cities, he was not aware that we have lost the distinction that has been our boast for a century, that we have no classes in our democratic land. Unhappily they are found now not only in society but in the church, where the apostolic injunction is too often forgotten (1 Peter 3 : 8).

A Case of Heartless Ingratitude Came to light in New York last week. A Brazilian merchant temporarily residing in this city found himself completely penniless and in urgent need of a small sum of money. When he came here, a short time ago, he brought with him thirty-five thousand dollars in cash. He became infatuated with an actress who is leading an impure life, and lavished money freely upon her, giving her costly presents, among which were some magnificent diamonds. The lady reciprocated the affection represented by the diamonds, but when the Brazilian's funds were exhausted her cordiality diminished. Last week, in his dire extremity, he asked her to lend him one of the diamonds to pawn, that he might be able to live until a remittance could be received from Brazil. She flatly refused, and showed him the door. It appears that the character of her kind has not improved since Solomon described it (Prov. 6 : 26).

A Failure to Gain Sympathy Resulted in suicide in New York on September 3d. A tradesman in good business has for several months suffered severely from dyspepsia. He was unable to get relief, and frequently spoke to his friends about his sufferings. He looked so well that they laughed at him. His wife tried to laugh him out of his fancies. He went on a vacation recently, and returned looking apparently well. He said he was a wreck, and he was laughed at more than ever. On Friday he became so depressed and miserable that he went into his bedroom and shot himself. He left a letter telling the coroner that he had committed suicide because he had not received the sympathy he was entitled to. In spiritual maladies the sufferer frequently finds himself so cut off from human sympathy. Unawakened sinners are unable to see in his case any reason for distress. It is then that he realizes the blessing of knowing that he has a High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of his infirmities (Heb. 4 : 15, 16).
